THE GOD OF THINGS AS THEY ARE

AN IMPORTANT ANNOUNCEMENT

CHICAGO

The Gospel of the Kingdom

These lessons in Social Christianity, edited by Josiah Strong, who has done as much as any one man to enlist the modern church in the social enterprise, have awakened a response among wide-awake progressive pastors and church workers in all parts of our country. Back of Dr. Strong is an Advisory Committee of thirty leading representatives of the various denominations. Hundreds of groups—Men's and Women's Clubs, Young People's Classes, Adult Bible Classes, Y. M. and Y. W. C. A. classes as well as prayer-meetings—have been using these lessons during the three years of their existence.

So wide-spread has been the interest in this line of study that the Publishers of the Bethany Graded Lessons have made arrangements to co-operate with the American Institute of Social Service in supplying the maturer classes of our Sunday Schools with this literature.

No one will take exception to the statement that these Lessons on Social Service are the most vital, timely, thought-provoking, reverent and satisfying treatment of the big problems of the social order that has even been offered to Sunday-schools.

And not the least of their value is that they elicit an interest at once in every one to whom their subject-matter is mentioned. New classes can be easily organized for this study. Old classes can be doubled and trebled! The Lessons fit up close to the every day life of the people.

Frank W. Allen, pastor at Paris, Mo., one of the most successful social service leaders of men and young men among the Disciples, thus writes concerning this series:

"I have used THE GOSPEL OF THE KINGDOM with the Greyfriars Class since October, 1908—the first issue—and it is the only Sunday School help that is really worth while for adult classes. It has actually built visible, tangible things for this municipality."

Published in magazine form and issued monthly. The subscription price—50c a year—makes them less expensive than the usual adult lesson literature.

Pastors and church leaders who wish to put into their church work new zest and inspiration will recognize at once the value of starting these clesses in the study of Social Reform.

Send 5c in stamps for a single copy of the magazine.

The Best

Many Sunday School classes will wish to study the life of Christ in 1913. They want the very best text for young people's or adult classes that can be found. This is simply to remind them that there has never been offered to the Sunday School world a Life of Christ so practical, so usable, so true to the best scholarship, so bristling with questions that wake up the pupils, so well proportioned, as Dr. Loa E. Scott's LIFE OF CHRIST in Fifty-two Lessons. It is being widely used in Sunday Schools and Y. M. C. A. classes. You must have it in your school. Price 50c. In quantities of 10 or more, 40c each.

THE GOD OF THINGS AS THEY ARE

There is vociferous demand that we worship the God of Things as They Are.

The demand is made by those who decry ideals.

Life is to be estimated, they tell us, on the basis of what the five senses reveal; all beyond this is imagination and very likely delusion.

There is a school of art that worships the God of Things as They Are. Its worship does little honor to the deity which it proclaims. It makes of art what Tennyson called a "lord of hell."

There is a school of fiction that worships the God of Things as They Are. It uncovers the nakedness of the human heart at its worst, and tells us that this is real life.

There is a school of journalism that bows before the same graven image. It puts a triple head on the last scandal and affirms that goodness has no real news value.

There is some danger that people will get the idea that the things that really are are vile and base things. If so, the God of Things as They Are can hardly be otherwise than the Things which reveal him.

What Things are?

What things are there, which we must consider as making up the essential things of life?

Poverty, pain and sin are. Labor and privation and ignorance are. Crime and superstition and degradation are. Strife and disappointment and bloodshed are. The material things with which our life concerns itself are swords and plowshares to work and fight with, tables and food to satisfy the gnawings of hunger, chairs and couches to relieve the weariness and fatigue of daily toil. Nearly everything we touch in life is marked somehow by our labor and our pain. These are among the things that are.

Now, what kind of a God must be the God of things as they are, for we know God through the things that He has made? The God who made a world of pain and sin, what kind of a God is He? What kind of a God can He be? Is He any better than the world which He has made, any better than the passions with which He has endowed humanity, any better than the fierceness which He has put into the tiger, any better than the terror which He inspires in the lightning and the storm? What kind of a God is the God of things as they are?

Do not fail to note that, even as judged by these things, men have insisted on the discovery of a God of goodness in things as they are. Christianity reveals the best idea of God, and a God most kind and loving, yet Christianity is not the only religion that insists upon a good God. Judaism revealed a stern Jehovah, but a God who pitied his children with the pity of a father. Buddhism, centering life's hopes in the elimination of all desire in Nirvana, still is a religion of compassion and pity, a religion whose God is kind.

Strange as you may think it, things as they are have disclosed to men a God of gentleness and grace. To be sure, not every religion has thought of God as loving and good. That is not strange. It is rather strange that any religion should thus have conceived of its God.

This leads us to assure ourselves that things as they are cannot be hopelessly bad, and it brings us back again to inquire, What things are? Poverty, pain and sin are, as we discovered and admit. Yes, but these are not the only facts of life. Joy and hope and love are. Not only so, but the spiritual vision of humanity insistently refuses to believe that pain, sin and death are the final facts. Life and love and hope are the final facts. Pain and sin and death are undeniably here. They are conditions to be reckoned with, but the faith that is deep in the human soul refuses to accept them as finalities.

Now this very faith is one of the things that are. We cannot consider the things that are without taking into account this quality in the human soul. We cannot ask what kind of God is the God of Things as They Are without inquiring what kind of a God implanted this faith. If anyone objects that faith is not a thing, the answer is that faith is a creator of things. It is faith that gives substance to things hoped for. Faith must be reckoned with, not only as one of the assets of the future, but as one of the indubitable facts of the present. Facts are said to be stubborn things, and of facts faith is said to be one of the most stubborn. Faith looks into the face of pain and smiles. Faith gazes into the grave and lifts its tear-filled eyes and discerns the hope of eternal life. Faith says to this mountain, "Be thou removed and be cast into the midst of the sea." Faith is not only the most stubborn of facts, but is one of the greatest of all things that are. With Faith are Hope and Love, and these abide. We cannot worship the God of Things as They Are without exalting faith and hope and love.

We take account of stock of the world just as we find it and we behold mind triumphant over matter, health conquering sickness, pleasure triumphing over pain, good subduing evil, and life asserting its mastery over death. These things we discern dimly, but we reckon with them as among the indubitable realities. These are of the things that are, and The God of Things as They Are is the God of all these things.

It need not discourage us that these qualities have not yet brought forth their full fruition. The present contains the germ of the future. The thing that is to be already is. The God of things as they are is the God of the eternal realities and these are life and love and joy.

The God of the toiling present is the God of the golden future.

The God of things as they ought to be is the God of things as they are.

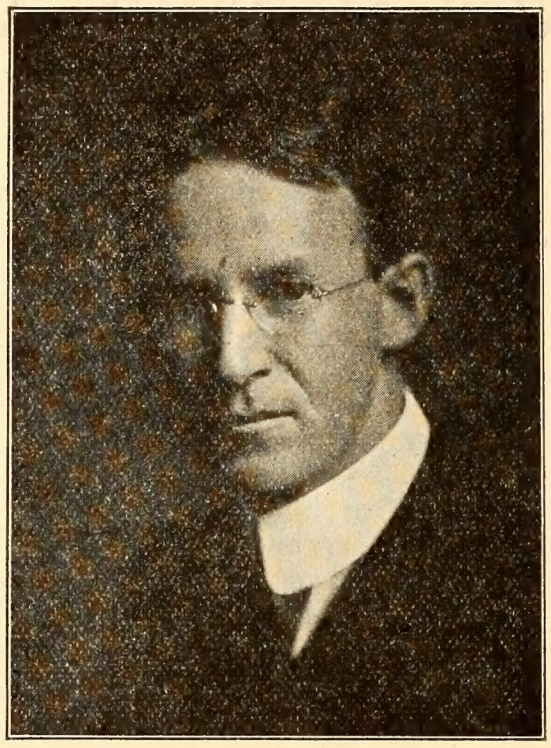
Social Science and Home Missions

A new chair has been established in that unique institution, The College of Missions, at Indianapolis, called the chair of Social Science and Home Missions, and Frederick Elmore Lumley, Ph. D., has been appointed to fill it and has been duly installed therein.



Professor Frederick E. Lumley, Ph. D.

Dr. Lumley is a Canadian by birth. He received his preliminary education in the schools of Ontario and in St. Clair College at St. Thomas. Later he graduated in arts at Hiram College and took his M. A. at McMaster University, Toronto. In 1909 he received his B. D. at Yale and in 1912 his Ph. D. While at Yale he was honorary university fellow for two years, and served as assistant in Anthropology. His graduate work was done chiefly in the department of Sociology. The theme of his doctorate thesis was "The Beginnings of Hebrew Industry." Professor Lumley has had experience in educational procedure, and has held successful pastorates at Wychwood, Ont., Aurora, Ohio, and Northford, Conn. He is a member of the American Sociological Society, and also of the Social Service Commission of the Disciples of Christ, appointed at the Louisville Convention.

The occasion of his installation as head of this new department in the College of Missions was one of rare brilliancy and yet of simple and solemn dignity and fervor under the chairmanship of President Charles T. Paul. After the installation address by Dr. I. N. McCash of the American Christian Missionary Society, Dr. Lumley made his response in a well prepared address setting forth the purpose of the new department. He said in part:

"Thousands of distinguished men and women have sacrificed themselves in the fight for human welfare and they have found out some things which all should know. They have proven the worthlessness of many proposals and it is foolish to repeat these sacrifices and ignore all that these noble people have done. The same discipline by which students are properly equipped to interpret the social phenomena in which they may be interested will aid in a rational selection of suitable programs of action. Before startling the world with the last bit of wisdom on the tenement house problem, it is surely worth while to inquire whether someone else did not think of that and prove its impracticability two decades ago. Before demanding that crime be abolished it would seem reasonable to know whether any schemes have yet been proposed to accomplish this highly desirable result. Before social agitators utterly abandon themselves to any cause, they should be capable of perceiving some of the bad as well as the good consequences of their endeavors.

"It is from a lack of wide acquaintance with the theories and plans of the most scholarly interpreters of social evolution, that many of us find ourselves the willing advocates of impossible schemes. The keenest of students get fooled by appearances and I am persuaded that there is no field where more may be attempted and less really accomplished to the eminent satisfaction of all concerned. The complex relations in social life have been compared, by a great German scholar, to the mycelium and the competent social worker finds that the illustration is not overdone. Such complexity cannot have a single explanation and countless of the world's great have fallen down here,—Malthus and Karl Marx and Henry George among the number. And yet, detailed familiarity with the field of social pathology, careful discipline in the art of correct analysis and exact knowledge of the most expedient remedial measures are insufficient. They must be supplemented by a consuming enthusiasm for race regeneration. The facts show the stupendousness of the undertaking, careful training shows the difficulties of it and wide study of the proposed program reveals, most often, only the frailties of the reformers.

"Now all this is stunning to the unsophisticated young people who are impelled by a highly commendable Christian enthusiasm to enter this type of work. To many a student this thorough-going introduction to the real social problem is similar to the introduction of a lighted match to a stream of water; the fires of idealism die down as the on-rushing tide of evidence comes up. The ideal world of the youthful imagination crumbles into the real world of suffering, sorrow, broken and crumpled bodies, poverty, crime and vice, which he sees about him. And the realization of these conditions multiplied many thousand times in all this country and every other, is surely an awakening of a very serious nature. His gaze is fixed by the horror-smiting realities of his own city and every future picture of things as they ought to be, is colored by them. Optimism is inclined to give place to pessimism, and departed hope leaves but an aching void. This is a highly critical period in the life of students who study any science and the appearance of a clap-trap, dogma-bound unsocial theologian at this serious juncture completes the ruin and there is nothing left but the smouldering fires of a once noble ambition.

"On the other hand, the tender ministrations of Jesus Christ in the person of some intelligent, devoted servant of the outcasts, who has done something for somebody, and who still has hope in humanity and who can be scientific and yet Christian, will save the flickering embers from being finally extinguished. One of the best conservators of this splendid enthusiasm is some actual service, of the less precarious sort, during academic training.

"And for this very purpose courses in social labratories are being carefully co-ordinated with the more speculative studies. Relations have been established with the Foreigners' House and the West Side Mission, and they will be established with various other philanthropic agencies, with which, as we may congratulate ourselves, this city is well supplied. Wise council, a fine Christian atmosphere, and actual social endeavor, will prove to the most perplexed students the final values of life and will save the mere theorist from auto-intoxication, and his theories from auto-extinction. There is no criticism of the splendid training to be found in all the colleges of our land, but the sadness of it all is that the acquisition of what passes for an education, too many times means the dissipation of a great enthusiasm. In this respect students pay too much for their whistle. This college in all of its departments, purposes a ministry for the conservation of Christian enthusiasm along with the careful scientific training.

"And finally, when the preparation is complete, it is hoped to relate the students, in a discriminating way, to particular forms of service for which they are fitted by reason of disciplinary, tempermental and physical endowments. The various Home Mission Boards and philanthropic organizations will send here for leaders and we shall recommend only those who will certainly reflect credit upon the institution and upon themselves by doing the work undertaken in a masterful way. Every person is not fitted for every work; individualistic tendencies and limitations reduce to nothingness the cure-all pretensions of many. For those who show undoubted capacities along certain lines, the correspondent openings will be highly recommended. And it is hereby seen that the type of training is not to be confined to denominational by-paths but that as rapidly as is consistent with thoroughness,—and I pause here to enforce this; the scholarly standards are to be constantly raised and never lowered for the dubious glory of presenting to the world each June a large bouquet of academic wall-flowers—as rapidly as is consistent with thoroughness, any and every social need will receive all the painstaking scientific, broadly Christian and financial attention these brave women and their co-laborers can give.

"Here is a field without limitations as to the appeal for workers. The Chicago and New York schools of civics and philanthropy cannot begin to supply all the leaders demanded. All students of social conditions in America proclaim the peril of the times and the demand for skilled servants of the people. Any institution which acts as a skillful mediator between the great numbers of splendid college men and women and the cess-pools of iniquity and contagion in our land, that is, between the social forces and the resisting influences, will render an imperishable service to many people, to a great nation and to the loving Father of us all."

The Great Need of Ministers—How to Get Them

"There are still millions of church members in America who need to be convinced that the kind of work to which Jesus Christ devoted a large part of his time is Christian work." This sentence from the volume on social service of the Message of the Men and Religion Movement is a criticism of the present leadership of the church and a prophecy of the leadership that is to be. The church needs ministers who will compel it to see what its work is. It now has many of the right kind of men, but it needs more of them.

"Religion will either mean a great deal more in America in the next ten years than it has ever meant before, or it will find itself, before the end of that time, in the way of meaning nothing at all." This is another prophetic sentence from the same source. The church is not going to be satisfied with trying to hold its own. Its work of ministering to individuals will continue, but it will also have a social gospel for the present age. It will deny emphatically that the principles of justice should be set aside to meet the exigencies of any business or political enterprise. "All souls are mine." The minister must claim all souls for God in a way that will break the power of individuals and organizations that use human beings as mere tools of industry or pleasure.

The first thing for the church to do in making its appeal for young men to enter the ministry is to define its work and to show to the world it has a task big enough for men of the highest ability and training. The spirit of sacrifice it still living. Young men are not all looking for easy methods of gaining a livelihood. But the kind of men the church needs see nothing attractive in much of the work that the minister of the present is doing. The call of the church is often made through the songs of the common worship. There is too much of medievalism and mysticism in our song services. One may admire a great deal of what the medieval church did and at the same time feel no great thrill when the call to present tasks is made in medieval terms. One may be a mystic without having much sympathy with the mysticism of "gospel hymns." We need hymns of social service. When we get them it will be easier to impress upon young men of ability the claims of the Christian ministry.

The ideal for the Christian ministry is thus expressed by Professor Peabody: "Jesus was not a law-giver, but a life-giver.' 'I am come,' he says, 'that they may have life, and have it abundantly.' The Christian Church, that is to say, is nothing less than the organization of souls for social redemption. It is the association of those who come not to be ministered unto, but to minister, and to give their lives a ransom for many. It lives by the contagion of personality. It exists to create religious leaders. But if all this is true, may it not involve an expanded definition of the calling of the ministry? Priests there must always be to administer the ordinance of worship, and prophets to speak the message of the spiritual life; but does the ministry of Jesus Christ fulfil its function in no other way than by talking? Is the field of leadership in the Christian Church to be that of exhortation and inspiration alone? Or is it more consistent with the teaching and example of Jesus Christ to reckon among his ministers that great and increasing number of the servants of Christ who are consecrating themselves for others' sakes in self-effacing and effective service? Is it by preaching alone that the field of religious leadership is to be reaped; or is it when the word is made flesh that men perceive its grace and truth? Was John Wesley a minister of Christ as he preached in the fields, and not John Howard as he worked in the prisons?"

Weaklings and cowards should be kept out of the ministry. It should not be made attractive to any but the strong and self-sacrificing. It is the sight of difficulty that brings forward the men needed. Opposition to Christ is strong. It is often strongest in those places where his name is supposed to be honored. Perhaps the church will at some time give thanks for some of the bitter attacks that are being made upon it by unbelievers, for these attacks will drive cowards out of the ministry and invite into it the men who can fight valiantly for the truth of God. The respect shown for ministers of courage and wisdom indicates that the church is not so hopelessly decadent as its enemies would have us believe. It has been a little slow in adjusting itself to new conditions. It is learning how to make its appeal to the men of the present and it will command their attention and receive their loyal support. Denominational Apology Contradicting Itself

The apologists for denominationalism have a hard time these days. Here is our good neighbor, The Standard (Baptist), saying soberly, "Our mission as a denomination is by no means at an end, as some people have of late imagined." And the very next sentence says, "On the contrary there are vast areas of human thought still waiting for those truths for which we were the first to stand, but which are now shared by most Protestant churches."

The words we have put in italics give the whole case away and nullify the chief implications of a lengthy editorial on "The New Denominationalism." If the Presbyterian and Methodist churches, for instance, now share the truths for which Baptists were the first to stand why should these truths be longer urged as reasons for one's being a Baptist rather than a Presbyterian or Methodist? Certainly mere historical priority such as Baptists claim, and as most informed persons gladly concede, is not in itself a sufficient reason for continuing a separate existence apart from those Protestant bodies who have now come to share these truths.

The Standard is publishing a series of three articles entitled "Why I Am a Baptist," by Prof. Walter Rauschenbusch, than whom there is no more admirable figure in American Christianity. He gives three reasons: (1) Baptists cultivate personal religious experience; (2) Baptists incorporate the Christian principles of society in their church constitution; and (3) Baptists possess the truest conception of worship.

With all deference to a Christian leader to whom the whole Church of today is indebted, and in complete respect for him personally, we are compelled flatly to say that the three virtues he claims for the Baptist denomination par excellence are not distinctive of Baptists at all. They afford Professor Rauschenbusch no more reason for being a Baptist than a Presbyterian or Methodist. The question Dr. Rauschenbusch is really answering is this: "Why I am proud of our Baptist history and happy in embracing my Baptist inheritance." But to thus acknowledge and evaluate ancient history is quite irrelevant when one is considering the question whether in modern times, with the new temper that has come over religion, there is justification for continuing to be Baptists, Congregationalists, Presbyterians and so forth.

The fact is that apologists for denominational separateness, whether Baptist, Presbyterian, Congregational, Methodist or Episcopalian, cannot give a reason for their distinctive position without committing a historical anachronism. The distinctions that actually exist among the leading Protestant denominations are petty. The matter of officering the church, the propriety of this or that form of administering baptism, the relative values of various types of ritual in public worship—these form the actual present-day distinctions among leading Protestant bodies.

But these points of distinction are too petty for a modern minded Christian—certainly too petty for a catholic spirited newspaper like our esteemed neighbor—to urge in justification of denominational exclusiveness. The apologist can only resort to ancient history in an endeavor to put new life into controversies which by the Standard's own admission are now dead. Or he obscures the issue by answering the question, Why I am a Baptist, or, Why I am a Presbyterian, in terms relevant only to the question, Why I am a Protestant, and all the while seems unaware of the affront given his Protestant neighbors by the cool implication that his denomination alone, or in peculiar degree, possesses the virtues which distinguish Protestantism in general.

What the cause of Christian unity, and of Christianity, needs most today is that some voice, in total disregard of denominational feelings, shall say right out, without the slightest attempt at euphemism, that there is not a single good reason why the Baptist denomination should continue its separate existence one moment longer than it will take to merge itself into the general corporate life of the Protestant Church of Christ,

And that there is not a single good reason why the Presbyterian denomination should continue its separate existence one moment longer than it will take to merge itself into the general corporate life of the Protestant Church of Christ.

And that there is not a single good reason why any Protestant evangelical denomination should continue its separate existence any longer than the Baptist and Presbyterian denominations are entitled to exist.

An Important Announcement

IT HAS BEEN a long-standing and earnest desire on the part of the editors of The Christian Century that the ownership and control of this newspaper should pass from the hands of private individuals into the common possession of the general brotherhood of the Disciples whose ideals it has for twenty-nine years been striving to interpret.

Plans now in process of maturing have been carried far enough at this time to warrant us in announcing that this desire will be fulfilled at an early date.

Application has been made for a charter for a non-profit-sharing corporation to be known as the Disciples Publication Society, to which the entire assets and good will of the New Christian Century Company will, by unanimous agreement of the stockholders, be transferred.

In consideration of this transfer of their property the stockholders have agreed to accept the notes of the Disciples Publication Society for $16,000, being the amount of stock held by them in the New Christian Century Company; said notes to be paid out of the profits earned by the new Society.

It is the purpose of the trustees of the Disciples' Publication Society to issue 5 per cent bonds in the amount of $50,000, retirable after five years, to be sold to individuals interested in the ideals of The Christian Century. Purchasers of these bonds will therefore stand in precisely the same relation to the Disciples Publication Society as do the stockholders of the old company, the notes given in exchange for the property of the old company being secured by bonds of the new corporation.

For several years the proposal has been urged upon these stockholders to donate their present holdings to such a brotherhood publishing house. While all would gladly have done so, not one of them could reasonably afford to make so large a gift outright. When at last the suggestion of the present plan was made, by which neither present stock-holders nor prospective supporters are asked to make a donation, but to invest in the bonds of a brotherhood publishing society, it seemed both a just and practical way of accomplishing what all concerned believed to be a most desirable end.

By the new arangement the ownership and entire control of The Christian Century and the publishing business now operated by the New Christian Century Company, pass at once out of private hands into the hands of the brotherhood. The profits from the conduct of the business are to be appropriated, according to the charter, to the cause of religious education, and especially the higher education of the Christian ministry. The term "religious education" is regarded by the charter as an ideal common to missionary societies, colleges, seminaries and universities, as well as various less permanent agencies, such as organizations for the promotion of Christian unity, and other forms of Christian progress.

The details of the new organization are being worked out as rapidly as possible. Among these details is the question of defining membership in the new Society. Two general plans are under consideration: First, to constitute a self-perpetuating group, large but limited in number, of which group those who hold bonds, to a specified amount, shall be ipso facto members either permanently or until their bonds are retired; or secondly, to rest the organization back, in a thoroughly democratic fashion, upon those churches that patronize the house, leaving to their representatives and those who hold the bonds of the Society the periodic election of directors, after the present fashion of our general missionary societies. The sentiment of those who have taken the initial steps in the organization leans unanimously at the present moment to the former plan, but the question is still open for further suggestion.

At the present time it is believed that the entire $50,000 bond issue need not be sold. After setting aside enough bonds to secure the notes given in exchange for the assets of the old company, not more than $25,000 of bonds need be sold. Judging from the past experience of the New Christian Century Company, which has been able to keep its deficits amazingly low considering the quality of its output and its painful lack of capital for promotion purposes, this sum will be ample to develop the business to a profit earning basis. That success could be brought about with even less capital than $25,000 is the belief of those of us who know the history and present possibilities of the enterprise. But we also know that success under such limitation would be too dearly bought by the prolonged sacrifices of those immediately connected with the administration, and by the failure of The Christian Century and the house to enter at once upon an adequate performance of their mission in this hour that calls so loudly for their service.

This plan to convey The Christian Century and its publishing house to the Disciples brotherhood is not the result of a new or impulsive idea on our part. From this newspaper more than a decade ago came the first suggestion for the creation of a representative publication society. This suggestion was discussed in national conventions, two of which appointed committees to thoroughly consider it. At the Pittsburgh convention in 1909 the committee made a report affirming that such a publication enterprise was greatly to be desired, but declaring that conditions in the brotherhood rendered its creation practically impossible. The discussion was not wholly fruitless, however. Only a few months elapsed before the Christian Publishing Company, of St. Louis, was purchased by Mr. R. A. Long who announced his purpose to operate the business as a private concern until such time as a Disciples' convention should devise some method by which it could become the property of the brotherhood. Later it seemed to become clear to his advisers that no formal acceptance was either necessary or desirable, and Mr. Long simply created a self-perpetuating board to whom he transferred the property with the understanding that its profits were to be appropriated to various missionary and benevolent societies. This generous action of Mr. Long's was praised by a great chorus of his brethren, in which chorus The Christian Century heartily joined.

By abandoning the plan to secure formal action by a convention Mr. Long came over to the position upon which the editors of The Christian Century were at that time striving to bring their directors. For many months before it was known that Mr. Long contemplated the purchase of the St. Louis house, the proposal to transfer The Christian Century to a basis of public ownership was being discussed. At that time there were but two possible methods in mind for accomplishing the transfer; one was for the stockholders to donate their holdings outright, the other was to sell to some man of wealth,—as Doctor Garrison later sold the Christian Publishing Company to Mr. Long,—who, like Mr. Long, could afford to give the property to the brotherhood. The first plan was not adopted because the individual stockholders felt that they could not afford to make so large a gift; the second was not adopted because the millionaire did not appear on the scene.

The suggestion to sell The Christian Century to the brotherhood and provide a method by which the churches could pay for it by patronizing it occurred to no one until many months later.

Meantime Mr. Long had launched the St. Louis house upon its experiment. This experiment The Christian Century has watched with much interest. Without referring now to the particular editorial policies of our contemporary or to the business management of its house we have been confirmed in three convictions:

First, that it is desirable from every point of view that a religious publishing house and newspaper be owned by a public constituency rather than a private corporation. The most intimate and mutual relationship possible should exist between such a house and newspaper and the constituency which it serves and of whose ideals it is the organ.

Second, that no single newspaper or publishing house is now adequately representing or, perhaps, can adequately represent the rich life and the historic ideals of the Disciples of Christ.

Third, that there is need of a newspaper and a publishing house to practice Christian union in the fields of journalism and general literature. The Disciples should possess and support an organ through which they can speak their message not alone to their own membership but to the larger Christian world, an organ of intercommunication between themselves and other Christian people. Such a newspaper would utter the Disciples' plea in terms adapted to gain for it a hearing in the wider circles of the Church, and would cultivate in its Disciples' constituency a Christendom-wide acquaintance and outlook and the temper of Christian unity. Such a house would foster interdenominational co-operation in the publishing of books and Sunday-school literature wherever possible, thus carrying to others the Disciples' contribution of thought and experience, and bringing the rich store of the Church's knowledge and experience into the life of the Disciples.

These three convictions which The Christian Century has held for years have, we say, been strengthened by observing the experiment of the Christian Evangelist and its house. Our readers and friends can, therefore, easily imagine the satisfaction with which we make the announcement that all technical difficulties have been gotten out of the way and that a fair—not to say generous—and practicable plan for placing The Christian Century and its publishing house in this wider place of usefulness has at last been accepted by all concerned.

More than a year ago, under stress of the conviction that our brethren with means should be enlisted to aid us in rendering a larger service to the present opportunity, a start was made in the direction of securing additional subscriptions to an increased capital stock. This was before the present stockholders had consented to surrender their holdings. The solicitation met with every encouragement, and nearly half the amount asked for was tentatively offered. That the remainder could have been secured by a vigorous campaign, there seemed to be no reason to doubt. But the conviction grew that success on the basis of a privately owned corporation was not the kind of success desired either by The Christian Century or its supporting constituency. The effort was therefore abandoned until such time as the consent of all the stockholders could be gained to a plan of brotherhood ownership. The death, last May, of the business manager, a leading stockholder, whose faithful services to the business had been invaluable during his four years' connection with the company, was a felt loss in the administration of the business and in the friendly circle of those associated with him, but it also simplified the technical problem of recasting the company upon a basis of brotherhood ownership. Since then the plans have been maturing, until at the present time we are prepared to take our friends publicly into our confidence.

It is important that all should see clearly that the Disciples Publication Society does not presume to impose a publishing house upon the brotherhood. There is nothing either presumptuous or coercive in our present action. The new Society will involve only those who care to be involved, whether individuals or churches. No official act is asked for or required to give a status to the enterprise. It is automatic in its working, as automatic as the American and Foreign Missionary societies, whose memberships are composed of contributing individuals and contributing churches. The initial organizers of the Disciples Publication Society simply believe in their cause, believe that there are many others who cherish the same ideals and who will be glad to co-operate in an enterprise for promoting those ideals, the more when they know no element of private gain inheres in it.

It is the purpose of the management to continue the same careful and economical business policy that has enabled The Christian Century to live and bear its testimony during the past five years under limitations that no enterprise actuated by merely commercial motives would have endured. There will be no premature enlargement. We cannot be tempted into making a display that is not backed up by actual resources. Meantime we shall be busy in seeking out friends of this cause who will stand with us and with others in the purchase of bonds. All bonds will be sold conditionally upon $25,000 being sold. The carrying out of our larger plans will depend upon this amount being secured, and we believe our friends' satisfaction will be increased in knowing that their investments stimulate other investments.

The practical question which the friends of The Christian Century are asked to consider is this: Shall the paper which champions our ideals be put at once in possession of resources sufficient to make it the paper it ought to be and to give it the influence it ought to have, or shall we allow it to work out its difficult way by the sacrifices of a few who are no more than ourselves zealous for the same ideals?

This question may be answered to the advantage of The Christian Century, practically, in two ways: First, by the purchase of bonds when these shall be offered for sale; and secondly, by enlarging our subscription list and turning into this house your orders for books, church merchandise, and Sunday-school supplies.

Both these services may now be rendered The Christian Century in the knowledge that the paper and the house are the absolute property of the Disciples' brotherhood and that all profits are devoted, not to enrich individuals, but to advance the cause that is dear to all our hearts.

On the editorial policy of The Christian Century we will have somewhat to say in a further statement. It must suffice at the end of the present announcement to say that not one jot or tittle of editorial independence is being surrendered by the terms of the new enterprise. The Christian Century will stand for the same ideals and principles as hitherto. We feel, however, that with respect to some matters we have at last made a clearing, and that from now on certain points, while by no means taboo, may be taken for granted more than formerly, while we go forward with our readers into the discussion of issues of universal, though of hardly less vital, interest.

But we wish it to be made clear that by the new arrangement our continuance in the editorship is entirely in the control of the supporting brotherhood. In this we ourselves find great satisfaction. If at any time the brotherhood wishes other editorial leaders it is within its power to secure them and we will gracefully give way.

Our unfeigned prayer to God is that He will add the blessing of his providence to the plans and sacrifices of which this article is the first disclosure.

The Largest Granite Statue

The largest statue ever hewn out of a single block of granite has just been hoisted into place above the new Union Station in Washington. It is a statue of Truth, one of five which represent the last work of Augustus Saint-Gaudens.

Special devices capable of lifting an almost inconceivable weight were required to swing the huge granite mass clear from the ground and hoist it into the air, for it weighed almost 50,000 pounds. All this must be done with great delicacy when the twenty-five tons are a finished statue. Carefully did the workmen watch as the elevating power was turned on, but in a moment the great figure was slowly creeping up. The actual time consumed from the moment it first left the ground until it was safely placed was less than thirty minutes. The block from which Truth was cut weighed ninety-five tons. Other statues are to represent fire, electricity, old mechanic arts, agriculture, freedom and imagination.

—Rarely has an editorial in a Disciple newspaper received such wide reprinting and so favorable comment by the religious press as the article in which the Christian Evangelist condemns the use of "The Christian Church" and approves the title "Disciples of Christ" as the appropriate title for its brethren to wear.

*The particular wording of this announcement has not, of course, been approved by Doctor Willett who is in the Orient at the time of its writing. But before his sailing the whole enterprise was thoroughly discussed with him in all its details many times, his hearty consent gained, and the legal means of executing his part in the transaction provided for.—C. A "Question and Answer" Evening

By Charles Clayton Morrison

NOTE: During an eight-day series of addresses and sermons delivered by Mr. Morrison at Lexington, Missouri, recently, dealing with "The Great Present Day Tasks of Religion," the interest of the audiences expressed itself from night to night in many inquiries presented personally to the speaker. To meet these inquiries in a general and, it was thought, more adequate way, the Saturday evening preceding the last Sunday was set apart for a "Question and Answer Service." The people were given opportunity of bringing written questions with them that evening, which were collected after the devotional exercises and answered by Mr. Morrison instead of the usual address. The questions indicated that the audience had been following with keen interest the discussion of fundamental Christian problems and afforded a valuable commentary on the high order of intelligence of the community. A handful of these questions was preserved and Mr. Morrison has endeavored in the following article to recall and set down as nearly as possible verbatim his responses.

Has not modern science exploded the Christian religion and all other religions by reducing them to superstitions? For example, does not the law of evolution take the place of God the Creator? And if we are in a world ruled over by law how can you still teach that there is a God who will change these laws in answer to man's prayer?

Modern science has by no means exploded religion. It has purified our conceptions of religion, rooting out certain superstitious elements, but it has not and cannot touch the foundation of religion itself. Religion, we are learning today, is not dependent upon the changing views of science, although in actual experience, it is not divorced from science as some mystics teach. It uses science and scientific ideas to promote its own ends. Your reference to evolution is a case in point. When the Darwinian hypothesis was first put forward and began to be accepted many feared that it meant the annihilation of God, just as they felt when Newton and Leibnitz worked out the law of gravitation. They called Leibnitz a blasphemer because he proposed a "law" to do what only God could do. Likewise the scientists have been called blasphemers and atheists because they proposed the "law" of evolution to do what only the divine Creator could do. Law and God were set up as rivals; if God stayed in there is no use for law. If law came in, God went out. But now we have reached the place where we see plainly that "law" does nothing; it is not an entity, a cause. There is nothing creative in a law. We see that a law is simply a description of the way God does things. And because He acts consistently we are able to observe His habits, and having found one of God's habits we call it a law, whether of gravitation, evolution or some other law. Evolution, therefore, instead of "taking the place of God," only describes the way God created the world. It says He created it not abruptly but gradually, through a long period of time, and by means of forces resident in the unfolding process itself.

With this conception of law as God's self-consistent habit there should be a revival in our hearts of the assurance that He hears and answers prayer. Prayer is itself a law, just as truly as evolution and gravitation are laws. It is God's nature and habit to hear His children when they call upon Him. And He can bless them through this law, if they will approach Him by means of it, as He cannot bless them otherwise. There is no reign of law; there is only the reign of God, a God who delights when we discover His laws or habits so that we can then co-operate intelligently in His creative and redemptive purposes.

I do not mean of course to solve the mystery of prayer by this response; I only hope to remove a false notion of God and of law and of prayer which inhibits at so great cost the intimate communion with God which every soul hungers for.

Has not the higher criticism destroyed the authority of the Bible?

Quite otherwise, I should say. The authority of the Bible was bound to be forever destroyed for multitudes of men if that authority was made to depend, as it once was, upon an uncritical view of the Bible. The higher criticism has given us back the Bible with a richer authority inhering in it than it ever before possessed. We do not now trouble and strain our intelligence to make the Bible a self-consistent book from beginning to end. We see in it a progressive unity not a static unity. We do not think now that David and Moses conceived God and duty in precisely the same way that Paul and John conceived them. We now find the authority of the Bible not in any doctrine of inspiration as applied to its writers, but in the Man in the Book. He is our authority. All writers, Bible writers too, are to be tested by him, by his teaching, by his spirit. The higher criticism has helped us to see Jesus by showing us the insecurity of some of the things to which we had pinned our faith as to the Bible's authority. I am not a higher critic, myself, having found my chief intellectual interests in other fields of study, but I like to believe with respect to those who work in the critical field, as with those who choose any other department of scientific specialization, that they are honest searchers after the truth and may as a whole be trusted to give us truth, just as astronomers and psychologists, for instance, may be trusted to give us truth.

Please give your ideas of the soul or spirit after death. Do you believe it goes to its destination immediately or what becomes of it? And do you believe one is judged according to the deed done in his body? And what of degrees in heaven?

Yes, I believe that the soul goes at once to its destination, and that it keeps on going to its destination for all eternity. I can only speculate about it, and give you my guesses in exchange for your guesses, but I see no reason to assume that life beyond death will be essentially unlike life here. Its conditions will be altered but its nature will not. Yes, judgment is according to deeds done in the body; I do not speculate in saying that but rest my conviction upon Scripture also. And if the future life is progressive, as is this life, there will surely be degrees in heaven, albeit the pain and inequity of our earthly social conditions will not there bring undeserved sorrow as here, but love shall equalize and socialize all.

Did you mean to teach Socialism in your sermon Monday night?

No, I am not a Socialist. I have profound sympathy with the Socialist program, but this program is not the same as the social program upon which the Church must more and more project its endeavor if it is to bring in the Kingdom of God.

The Bible says that the faith was "once for all delivered to the saints." It also says that "Jesus Christ is the same yesterday, today and forever." Will you please reconcile these passages with your sermon on the Reinterpretation of Christ?

In the sermon referred to I pleaded for a reinterpretation of Christ in terms that would show him to be an adequate savior and leader for modern men and women conscious of needs of which older generations were not keenly aware. And I said that the glory of Jesus is that he is perennially reinterpretable. This is why he is the same from age to age—just because he is changing! He meets—or rather he anticipates—the new-born needs of humanity. Better yet, it is he who creates these needs. He makes problems and he solves them; he prompts demands and he satisfies them. To believe in him as thus progressively reinterpretable is to possess "the faith once for all delivered to the saints."

You said last night that you did not agree with Alexander Campbell on baptism. Will you take a few words to tell in what respect you do not agree with him? And how can you still remain a member of the Christian church and not accept Campbell's teachings?

First of all let me say to my courteous inquirer that Alexander Campbell would be the last man to insist that my acceptance of any views of his should be made a test of my right to be a member of a Disciples church. I can imagine that the very suggestion of this idea would make him turn over in his grave. For he insisted all his life, at great cost, that he possessed the God-given right, and that every man possessed the God-given right equally with him, to read the Scriptures for himself, and that a difference of opinion between two honest readers of God's word was not sufficient occasion for strain or separation in Christian fellowship. Hence I feel sure that I rest under the approval, rather than the disapproval, of this great teacher, when in good conscience I express my divergence from his opinion about baptism.

Mr. Campbell believed and taught that, in the New Testament, baptism is immersion in water. I believe and teach that baptism, in the New Testament, is not immersion in water but is the conferment and acceptance of membership in the Church or body of Christ. With him I agree that neither sprinkling nor pouring was practiced in connection with apostolic baptism, and, together with other reasons, I plead, on the ground of its primitive precedent, for the administration of baptism today by immersion only, and I so practice. But Mr. Campbell regarded baptism as a physical act, immersion, submitted to by a believing penitent, in obedience to Christ, for the remission of sins. I do not find that Christ ever commanded immersion or referred to it at all. I regard baptism not as a physical act but as the spiritual or moral act of a believing penitent in accepting membership in the Church of Christ, in obedience to Christ, for the remission of sins. This membership in Christ's body cannot be conferred or accepted save by the use of some outward physical sign. There are reasons many and sufficient why immersion only should be used as this sign. But there are reasons many and grave why the essential baptismal act should not be regarded as identical with this outward sign.

What teachings or practices would the Disciples have to surrender in order to realize Christian Union?

What teachings or practices the Disciples may have to surrender in order to realize ultimate Christian union I could not guess. No man can tell what new light or what new duties the morrow may bring forth. But I know of only a single practice the Disciples must abandon in order to be actually practicing Christian unity today, and by practicing Christian unity I mean occupying true union ground, unsectarian ground. We have abandoned sectarian names, sectarian creeds, sectarian communion, sectarian polities, sectarian forms of administering baptism. At one point, however, we still keep up a sectarian practice—at the door of our churches. We have not yet been made willing by God's good Spirit to receive into the fellowship of our churches all whom Christ has received into his Church without discrimination against any. When this sectarian practice is abandoned we will be standing on true catholic ground.

What do you consider the greatest obstacle to Christian Union?

Sheer, sordid, sectarian inertia and lack of the vision of what a united Church would mean.

How do you account for John the Baptist's recognition of Jesus as the Messiah? Was it miraculous?

A good principle to follow in reading the Scripture is to explain as much as we can by natural and normal means, falling back upon the miraculous only when ordinary explanations fail to explain. This we should do without prejudice against the miraculous, as such. We should constantly remember that the presence of God in an event is not infallibly indicated by the mere power displayed but by the quality of the thing done. Giving a cup of cold water is as truly an exhibition of the divine life as was the raising of Lazarus. Jesus tried patiently to emancipate his disciples from the habit of looking for "signs," and to implant in them such a knowledge of the divine character as should enable them to discern the divine presence in commonplace as well as in extraordinary happenings. In the case of John's recognition of Jesus it should be borne in mind that the two men were cousins, that their mothers were intimates, possessing in common certain mysterious foregleams of their sons' greatness. That as youths and later as grown men John and Jesus had conversed together on the great themes of their own and Israel's life, there is no reason to doubt. That his acquaintance with Jesus would have begotten in John a profound respect, to say the least, and a humble sense of his own inferiority, is a perfectly natural and valid inference. So when Jesus came to John to be initiated into John's society of repentant men, John felt the incongruity of it. "I cannot lead a movement with you in the ranks," he said. "I cannot think of inducting you into my enterprise. I have need to be initiated by you into a higher order of righteousness than that of which I am the leader. I have need to ally myself with you, not you with me." Whether John's specific idea of Jesus' Messiahship had been a gradual growth or was a sudden inspiration arising at this moment from the unexpected appearance of Jesus while the prophet was solemnly fortelling the near approach of the Messiah and the people were eagerly drinking in his words, it is impossible to say, and it is also unimportant. The important thing is that John discerned Jesus' superiority and divinity. Whether his discernment was by natural mental processes or by special miraculous illumination does not affect the fact or the value of the fact.

Why does the church insist on converts making the confession?

It is not so much the fact that the church insists upon the confession as that the convert himself insists upon it. If Christ truly enters the heart of a man that man's lips, like Peter's, "cannot but speak."

Do you think the present position of our people needs revision?

Not in any fundamental principle. The temper of some of our people needs revision. I have seen some members of Disciples churches who were just as sectarian in mind as any Presbyterians or Baptists I ever saw. There ought not to be one such among us. The very name Disciple should be made by us a symbol of the spirit of unity, And our churches ought continually to challenge their procedures and customs to see if there be any way of sectarianism in them. One vital point at which we are not living up to our fundamental principles is in discriminating against certain members of the Church of Christ whom we will not receive into our fellowship without rebaptism. This practice needs revision, and happily there is a growing sentiment among us favorable to it.

Is immersion essential to the salvation of a soul?

No.

Don't you think that at least the beginnings of faith are intellectual and produced by evidence?

My idea is that the developed and experienced faith is more likely to become intellectual and to rest upon evidence. The beginnings of our faith are probably traceable to other people's faith. This faith of other people is, of course, a species of evidence, but it is evidence that is not so much intellectually discerned as it is just caught.

Faith accumulates its evidence as it goes along, in actual experience. So that the mature Christian has what the theologians call an "apologetic" which the "babe in Christ" cannot in the nature of things possess. I hope I am grasping the point of the question when I say that the intellectual element in faith increases with the increase of Christian experience.

Do you believe that baptism is essential in salvation?

Yes, it is an essential factor in the salvation which Christianity contemplates.

Can the unregenerated sinner lay hold on faith before being born of the spirit?

This question exhibits what seems to me to be a confusion of terms, or more accurately, a needless separation of terms. "Being born of the Spirit" and "laying hold on faith" are one and the same thing described in different terms. To lay hold on faith is to be born of the Spirit, and vice versa.

Is the Bible inspired? I used to think that it was written by the hand of God and that every word was divine. I have since come to believe that it is inspired only in the sense that Shakespeare and Tennyson are inspired. I therefore do not think it has any authority greater than any other good book. Am I right or wrong?

You are wrong, and very sadly wrong. The subject of inspiration is altogether too big a subject for us to enter upon tonight. I have only this suggestion to make in response to your frank question. You are fixing your attention upon the the method or process by which the Bible was made and overlooking entirely the Bible itself. I am ready to agree with you that the Bible was not written literally by God's fingers—because I do not think God has any fingers, except yours and mine. And I am ready to concede, for the sake of aiding you to see my present point, that the very mental processes by which the various parts of the Bible were conceived and composed by their respective human writers were not different psychologically from the mental processes of Shakespeare and Tennyson. But I call your attention to the output of these mental processes. It is in this output that I find inspiration; it is here that I find the uniqueness of the Bible. In the sphere of religion and the moral life I find no writings anywhere in the world comparable to the Bible. Its authority does not inhere in the singular process by which it may or may not have been produced. Authority is inherent in the product itself. To my conscience its teachings are self-evidencing. They need no prop of miracle to uphold them. And so far from the Bible being on a level with Shakespeare and Tennyson, if you should ask either of those teachers he would say summarily that whatever note of religious authority is found in his writings is but the echo of the message of Holy Scripture.

What did you mean last night when you said that the personal Christ was the true creed of the church? I do not see how a person can be a creed.

I meant that faith is not fundamentally a thing of the understanding or intellect, but of our whole personal nature. It does not consist in an intellectual belief about Jesus, nor in an intellectual agreement with Jesus, but in profound personal confidence in Jesus, whoever he is, and however difficult it may be to agree with his teaching. In the old sense of "creed" a person cannot be a creed. I used the term in this unaccustomed sense in order to displace the error which rests upon its traditional use.

Who Was the Braver?

By Charles L. White

Upon no class of people has this winter's weather fallen with greater severity than upon the missionaries of the frontier. But, with few exceptions, and even when the thermometer registered from twenty to forty degrees below zero, they have kept their preaching appointments, and what is more, this arduous service has been rendered with patience and joy. No complaints have come from churches that the missionaries have slighted their work, and no intimations have been received from the missionaries that the work was too strenuous.

Through stormy days, when the blinding snow almost cut the flesh; in the clear cold nights, when the piercing wind chilled the hands till the horse was left to take his unguided course, the faithful servants of Christ have ridden, the true knights of the best crusade, that ends not in defeat but in victory.

If the mountain trails marked by the cold benumbed feet of Christian missionaries, and the plains, which see the brave and constant conflicts with enemies more tenacious than Saracen soldiers; if these make a holy land, then the western states form one whose glory is not in the past, but in the future.

Many of these winter appointments are kept by men who ride alone over the western prairies. Often the trail is marked only by the section fence that here and there emerges from the snow, and occasionally the tired missionary must rest his horse, which is too exhausted to eat, and warm his own hands and feet at some rancher's shack.

Is it any wonder that a little girl, fond of her dogs and ponies, should say, as the faithful animal bears the missionary once more out into the cold and snow-filled air, "Mamma, if any horses go to heaven, I think the missionary horses will surely be there."

The mother smiles, and gives an evasive answer, but goes to the window to watch the brave man of God pass up the long trail, further and further away until he and his faithful horse are lost in a cloud of whirling snow.

The husband soon returns to the house, and says, "Mother, it's an awful day, and that missionary is a hero. It is only the love of Christ that will lead a man to do that, and I understand that there is a church back East that called him last month to be its pastor at a salary of $2,000, and he said "No." Recently I was told, too, that now he gets only $850 a year and keeps his own horse, and I have never heard him mention money. The only way I learned about that call down East, was that a telegram was telephoned over to Blackstone and came to Jack Johnson's house and he told me. Jack is a deacon in one of the branch churches, you know."

"Well," said his wife, "with flour so high, and potatoes out of sight, eggs as precious as diamonds, butter almost worth its weight in gold, and sugar rising every fortnight I wonder how he and his brave little wife make ends meet."

"Perhaps they don't," said her husband. "There is a rumor that he has a sister who teaches school in Connecticut and helps them out every quarter."

Connecticut! That magic word to the mother brought back the picture of a happy childhood, a Christian home, the day of her conversion, and a bright afternoon when she was baptized. But now, when she considered her lonely prairie life, her neglect of prayer and the Bible and her devotion only to earthly things, she could not keep the tears from her eyes.

That evening, after the little girl was in her crib, the father and mother sat in their kitchen for a cup of tea, and each thought of the days when they were both active members of the church.

At length the wife said: "Edward, we must get back the old joy and peace once more, not only for our sake but for the sake of dear little Mary. When she prayed tonight for the missionary and his poor cold horse, my heart smote me."

Just then they heard a pony neigh near the window, and in a few minutes, the faithful creature having been cared for, the missionary was thawing himself out once more by the little stove. The drifts had grown so deep that it was impossible to go the last five miles of the return trip.

Glad to share their humble home with so good a neighbor, the bread, ham and coffee were brought out and then they talked about the storm and the events of the day, as the hungry missionary shared their simple fare.

"This reminds me," said their guest, "of a wild afternoon, when I played half back in a great football game in the East. It was freezing cold, and the snow was so deep that we couldn't see the five-yard lines o that tempestuous Thanksgiving Day."

"Did they play the game through in the storm?"

"Yes, and the halves were twenty-five minutes long, too. One time-keeper froze his right hand, and the referee his ears, but we put it through until the end. The game stood nothing to nothing until the last minute of the second half, when a member of our team, with a foot as cold as ice, kicked the goal from the forty yard line."

"Who was it who kicked the goal?"

"Well, I did, but probably I could never have done it again in a thousand attempts on a pleasant day."

"I suppose," said the wife, "the cheering on the side lines helped."

"Perhaps so, but it was great sport, for our hearts were in it."

"Well," said the farmer, "you are playing this missionary game the same way, even if there isn't much cheering on the side lines. But there are some of us along the trail who feel like cheering you on, even if we don't make much noise about it or go to meeting very often."

"It's good to hear you talk that way."

"It is the way we both feel."

"I thank you, but I didn't know that you and your wife cared for these things much now, although I suspect you once did back East. But do you know, ever since I went away this afternoon, I have been thinking of that dear little Mary; for her sake—"

The missionary did not finish the sentence, for just then the mother bowed her head on the table and remained strangely quiet. She was evidently trying to control her feelings and especially because she knew Mary was awake in the next room, and was hearing all that was said.

A long pause followed, and at last the father said, "Elder, yes, the truth is that back East we both did serve God and tried to keep his commandments, but somehow out here we have forgotten him and his book. However, we are going to begin again tonight."

As he said this, his wife rushed to her husband's side, and throwing her arms around his neck, burst into tears. It was only, however, for a moment, and then controlling herself, she hurried into the next room and brought out the long-neglected family Bible. As she gave it to the missionary, she left the room again, and a moment later returned with little Mary in her arms.

The family altar was set up again that night, and, it is believed, will never fall into ruins again. The home at once became a place of light and peace, and if other children come with the years to share the little house with Mary, their earliest recollections will be of their happy, Christian home.

Only one thing marred the missionary's joy, and as they rose from their knees they spoke of it almost at the same minute; their visitor had no way of letting his lonely, anxious wife know that he was safe. They always understood, however, that "no news was good news," and he had frequently been detained a part or all of many nights.

But this storm had increased with such severity that she who shared the privations of the missionary's life could not but feel anxious concerning the safety of her husband. As the long evening wore on, she waited hour after hour, gazing with anxious eyes out into the dark, boisterous night. At last when the clock struck twelve the lonely mother once more kissed her two little children good-night, and for at least the twentieth time again committed her brave husband to Him who long ago ruled the storm and brought the endangered disciples in safety to their home. Then, to be ready for any sudden call, without undressing she threw herself upon the couch and waited for the day. Nature is kind, and in a few moments, the tired woman was peacefully sleeping and dreaming of the beautiful "Daisy Chain" at Vassar.

But happy dreams, even, must be denied this weary mother, for at two o'clock her little boy of three years suddenly gave a croupy cough, and in an instant she was by his side. For an hour, with slight success from her simple remedies, she gently cared for the child, and in her anxiety many times peered out through the window to see if deliverance might not be at hand.

As the little clock struck three, her heart leaped for joy, for she heard her husband's long whistle and his cheering voice singing "There's No Place Like Home." He had anxiously lain awake until one o'clock, when, noticing that the wind had subsided, he aroused his neighbor, buckled on the ranchman's snow-shoes, and started toward home with a light and happy heart. As he seldom used such shoes, his progress was slow, but at last he reached his loved ones.

An hour later the delirium had passed, and the little boy was resting quietly.

Who was the braver?

Do We Know Jesus?

By Professor James Denney

The great question regarding the Gospels is this: Do the evangelists put us in communication with Jesus in a way that we can depend upon? Can we really see him and know him through their testimony? And if we can, is he whom we thus see and know able to take still the place in faith which he holds in the New Testament, and has held throughout the history of the church?

To know Jesus is the same kind of experience as to know anybody else. It is to know what he is, not to know all the details of his career. We may be ignorant of much about a man, we may even be mistaken about many things, yet know him thoroughly. This is how it is with Jesus. Of far the greater part of his life neither we nor the evangelists know anything at all. Even in the part of his life which is covered by the gospels we are liable to misapprehensions of various kinds, and so no doubt were they. But there are things about which it is impossible and inconceivable that they should be mistaken, and these the very things which matter, the very things in which we see what Jesus is.

Could Not Be Mistaken.

They could not possibly be mistaken about the attitude which Jesus assumed to men, or about their own attitude to Jesus. They could not possibly be mistaken about what he did for them, won from them, and was to them. Here their testimony is beyond criticism or suspicion. But here also are the very realities in which Christianity has lived from the beginning, and lives still; here is that which gave Christ his place in faith, and will keep him in it to the end. A few illustrations will make plain what is meant.

Jesus received sinners; there can be no possibilty of doubt about that. He received them in a superficial and formal sense, sitting with them at the same table, but also, as they knew, in a sense which no words could fathom. Men and women who had been deeply estranged from God and goodness, and who found no way back elsewhere, found a way through him. It is inconceivable that the gospels should have misunderstood or misrepresented Jesus here. The parable of the prodigal son is a wonderful story, but wonderful as it is, it would have lost much of its power had there been any schism between the Speaker and his words. But there was none.

Receiving Sinners.

The parable was spoken as a defense of receiving sinners by one who was impeached in the very act. What it meant in detail we can see in stories like that of the penitent woman in the house of the Pharisee, or of Zacchaeus giving half his goods to feed the poor, or of the thief on the cross, to whom Jesus said, To-day shalt thou be with me in Paradise. Historians may make what they can of one incident in the gospel or another; they may find it easier to realize this, and not so easy to envisage that; but sinful men, longing for restoration to God, will have no difficulty in believing that Jesus receives sinners, except the difficulty that it is too good to be true. And this is a difficulty, like all the ultimate difficulties in the gospel, with which history alone cannot deal. History may open the door, but it cannot compel us to enter in. This gracious compulsion comes when the Spirit of God seals the evangelist's testimony to Jesus as the sinner's friend upon our hearts; and when we yield to it, we have the witness in our selves. It is not borne to anyone but Jesus, but in virtue of it we can say with all assurance: I know whom I have believed. The place of Jesus in faith is secured, and it is all his own.

Absolute Devotion.

Again, Jesus won an absolute devotion for himself; there can be no possibility of doubt about that. We can quite well imagine that an evangelist should have been misinformed about the way in which some particular person on some particular occasion gave expression to his devotion; but it is simply inconceivable that that attitude of his disciples to Jesus in virtue of which they were disciples indeed should be misrepresented in the gospels. The earliest disciples, who were Jews, expressed this in their national Jewish way by calling Jesus Christ—that is, the King. When the gospel was carried beyond national limits, and became a universal religion, instead of the Jewish Christ they spoke of the Lord. In either case what was meant was that the bearer of the name was entitled to unreserved homage.

The Homage Due.

The homage which they offered was his due, and it was received as such. Striking proof of this has been afforded by the recent concentration of gospel studies on the eschatological teaching of Jesus. For what is the cardinal point in that teaching? It is that Jesus himself is the central and sovereign figure in the Kingdom of God for which men wait. Its coming is inseparably one with his coming. God reigns as the sovereignty of Jesus is realized. Here again, indeed, we may say that though history opens the door it cannot compel us to enter. "No man can say Jesus is Lord but by the Holy Spirit." But no man can doubt on historical grounds that his followers called Jesus Lord, and that when they did so they only acknowledged him to be what he himself knew he was. When the idea is simply derided that a Christian is a person who takes Christ at his own estimation, a question is raised which history cannot answer. The tacit assumption in such derision is that Jesus is dead, and that his thoughts of himself, like those of other men about themselves, are open to revision by subsequent generations. A relation to Jesus under these circumstances means a relation to the ideas he represented, not a relation to the Person. But what if Jesus is not dead? What if he is a living person, with whom it is impossible to have any relations unless he is taken at his own estimation?

A Vital Point.

This brings us to another vital point in regard to which it is impossible to conceive the gospel witnesses to have been in error: His death eventually made no difference in the relations between Jesus and his disciples. It did indeed make a difference for a moment, but it was annulled by the resurrection experiences which presently followed. Jesus was revealed in power, but he was otherwise the same Jesus. He still was all that he had been, he still did all that he had done, he still commanded the devotion he had always inspired—but now without limitation in space or time. No one nowadays doubts that the apostles sincerely believed themselves to have seen the Risen Saviour and in the long run it is not possible to take seriously the separation of the Easter Faith and the Easter Message. It is doing no injustice to most of those who draw this distinction to say that the Easter Faith is not for them what it is in the New Testament.

The Burden of Their Testimony.

They may not deny it, but it is not the burden of their testimony to Jesus, asserting itself in every breath, carrying and inspiring the whole life. If it cannot be historically proved, still less can it be historically disproved, that the true state of the case is this: it was not the disciples who raised Jesus from the dead in the glow of their faith and love; it was God who raised him, and who begot them to a living hope in the same act. It is on this Christianity depends, and whatever the difficulties of the resurrection narratives may be, the value of the primitive testimony to the resurrection is beyond dispute. Faith in the Risen Christ does not indeed make his life on earth worthless or insignificant. He says himself, As long as I am in the world, I am the light of the world. He is the world's light still, but only through that life which he lived on earth. If he had wasted a single moment of that life, the radiance of the light would now be dimmed. It was there he accumulated all that the Spirit now uses to illumine God and the life of men.

A Living Saviour.

But that alone could not sustain the Christian religion; it needs the living Saviour to evoke the faith, the love, the devotion—in a single word, the worship—of which he was the object in the church from the beginning. It is here we are most conscious of the difference between the Gospels and much that is written about them. The evangelists never look back, they look up, even when their minds are full of the past; and it is vain to try to understand them if what is the greatest of realities for them is for us not a reality at all. This is the need of the hour in the church; not historians, nor apologists, but evangelists; men who know that he who received sinners and won the allegiance of souls is seated at the right hand of God, yesterday and to-day the same, yes, and forever.

MODERN WOMANHOOD

Conducted by Mrs. Ida Withers Harrison.

Mrs. Harrison will be glad to receive communications from any of her readers offering suggestions concerning woman's welfare, criticisms of articles or inquiries concerning any matters relevant to her department. She should be addressed directly at 530 Elm Tree Lane, Lexington, Ky.

THE LETTERS OF GEORGE MEREDITH

The death of Andrew Lang, a few weeks ago, brings a sense of personal loss to a large circle of readers; while he was not one who grappled with the deep things of life, yet his keen perception of the beautiful, his accurate scholarship, his delightful versatility won a place for him in the hearts of the English speaking world. He wrote history, poetry, essays, criticism, fairy tales—seventy volumes in all. How busy he was in his chosen line of work, and how happy he must therefore have been! While he cannot be classed with those great students and interpreters of life—Tennyson, Browning, Carlyle, George Eliot, Stevenson and Meredith—yet he was intimately associated with them, and his passing reminds us anew of the closing of a great epoch in the world of letters.

Letters of George Meredith.

One of the most notable of the Christmas publications is the "Letters of George Meredith," for they bring back to lovers of literature much of the "grace of a day that is dead." They have been collected and prepared for publication by his son, who has been at work on this task ever since his father's death, three years ago. They extend over a period of fifty years. They are written to members of his family, and to his life-long friends, and reveal a noble and lovable personality. They begin about 1860, and continue up to the time of his death in 1909. I have read the works of Meredith with deep appreciation, but I find these letters of equal interest with his imaginative writings. They give a revelation of temperament and character, of personal relations, of opinions, even of moods, that is unsurpassed by any similar collection known to me. Now and then they throw a search light on his motives and point of view in his interpretations of life.

On Woman.

None of our modern writers has treated women with greater sympathy and discrimination in her difficult task of adapting herself to new conditions, than George Meredith. What finer studies in the whole realm of fiction of the complex women of our day, in their efforts to solve the problems of their lives, than "Diana of the Crossways," or Clara Middleton in "The Egoist!"

In a letter written in 1905, Meredith says, "Since I have been able to reflect, I have been oppressed by the injustice done to women, the constraint upon their natural appetites and faculties, generally much to the degeneracy of the race. I have not studied them more closely than I have men, but with deeper affection, and more interest in their enfranchisement and development—being assured that women of the independent mind are needed for any sensible degree of progress."

Of marriage, he writes, "By and by, the world will smile on women who cut their own way out of a bad early marriage, or it will correct the present rough marriage system. No young woman knows what she gives her hand to; she will never be wiser, until boys and girls are brought up and educated together."

In speaking of the "rough marriage system," Meredith is presumably alluding to the English divorce laws, which are not the same for men as for women; a husband there can secure a divorce for infidelity alone—a wife has to prove infidelity, coupled with cruelty and desertion for two years. In "Diana of the Crossways," the husband had heaped every indignity upon the wife that a selfish, unloving heart could devise—yet she could not be freed from him, because she could not prove the statutory cause.

His plea for boys and girls to be educated together, also refers to English customs and systems, where co-education has never had the vogue it has obtained in America.

His Religion.

Meredith is usually accounted an agnostic, yet various passages in these letters express a profound belief in the fundamental virtues of religion. His special religious grievance seems to have been with the clergy and the church—and is that not one of the social problems of our day? We hear much talk from many sides about the widening gulf between the church and the laboring man, as well as the man of thought. May not the church take some blame to itself for this estrangement? Should not those who voice its message study conditions today more closely, and pitch their message on a key to reach the great troubled heart of the world about them?

Meredith speaks with much bitterness of the "parsonry" as he calls the clergy. In one letter, he says, "The Parsonry are irritating me fearfully—they are a terrific power. They are interwoven with the whole of the middle class like poisonous ivy—Oh, for independence, that I might write my mind of these sappers of our strength!" In another place, he speaks, "Of God, so much obscured by the churchmen." Again, he says, "Ecclesiastical dogma is an instance of the poverty of humanity's mind hitherto."

Religious Counsel to His Son.

His advice to his young son, written in 1872, is in terms of spiritual perception that many a minister of the gospel might envy. He writes to him at school,

"Christian teaching is sound and good . . . Look for the truth in everything, and follow it, and you will then be living justly before God. Let nothing flout your sense of a Supreme Being, and be certain that your understanding is at fault, whenever you chance to doubt that he leads to good. We grow to good, as surely as the plant grows to life."

"And do not lose the habit of praying to the unseen Divinity. Prayer for worldly goods is worse than fruitless. But prayer for strength of soul is that passion of the soul, which catches the gift it seeks."

And in 1906, thirty-four years after, he writes these words on prayer to a dear friend:

"Be sure that the Spiritual God is accessible at all moments to the soul desiring him, and would live in us, if we would keep the breast clean. Only, we cannot ask him to strike between us and his laws."

His correspondence shows a full life up to the close of his more than four score years. While lonely after the death of his wife, and the marriage of his children, yet his spirit is ever brave and unrepining. His last letter, written a few weeks before his death, is a lament over the passing of Swinburne, whom he deeply loved and admired. I. W. H

THE BUSINESS OF BEING A WOMAN

Ida Tarbell's New Book.

Miss Ida Tarbell is a great woman, and she wrote this book on "The Business of Being a Woman." Miss Tarbell knows her subject for she has had no other business to attend to but just this; she has not had to be a wife, or "door mat" or anything that way, she writes well, almost brilliantly, and with considerable force. Her book is published by the Macmillans, who when they happen upon a good writer get out a book worth while. Like many other books, this volume puts much of its substance, quality and color, in the first chapter. Therefore some extracts from this chapter will give the reader a good idea of the cleverness of the volume. Miss Tarbell begins with the

and of her she says:

The most conspicuous occupation of the American woman of today, dressing herself aside, is self-discussion. It is a disquieting phenomenon. Chronic self-discussion argues chronic ferment of mind, and ferment of mind is a serious handicap to both happiness and efficiency. Nor is self-discussion the only exhibit of restlessness the American woman gives. To an unaccustomed observer she seems always to be running about on the face of things with no other purpose than to put in her time. He points to the triviality of the things in which she can immerse herself—her fantastic and ever-changing raiment, the welter of lectures and other culture schemes which she supports, the eagerness with which she transports herself to the ends of the earth—as marks of a spirit not at home with itself, and certainly not convinced that it is going in any particular direction or that it is committed to any particular worth-while task.

Disturbing.

Perhaps the most disturbing side of the phenomenon is that it is coincident with the emancipation of woman. At a time when she is freer than at any other period of the world's history—save perhaps at one period in ancient Egypt—she is apparently more uneasy.

Those who do not like the exhibit are inclined to treat her as if she were a new historical type. The reassuring fact is, that ferment of mind is no newer thing in woman than in man. It is a human ailment. Its attacks, however, have always been unwelcome. Society distrusts uneasiness in sacred quarters; that is, in her established and privileged works. They are the best mankind has to show for itself. At least they are the things for which the race has slaved longest and which so far have best resisted attack. We would like to pride ourselves that they were permanent, that we had settled some things. And hence society resents a restless woman. And this is logical enough.

Embroiled.

Embroiled as man is in an eternal effort to conquer, understand, and reduce to order both nature and his fellows, it is imperative that he have some secure spot where his head is not in danger, his heart is not harassed. Woman, by virtue of the business nature assigns her, has always been theoretically the maker and keeper of this necessary place of peace. But she has rarely made it and kept it with full content. Eve was a revoltee, so was Medea. In every century they have appeared, restless Amazons, protesting and remolding. Out of their uneasy souls have come the varying changes in the woman's world which distinguish the ages.

Society has not liked it—was there to be no quiet anywhere? It is poor understanding that does not appreciate John Adams' parry of his wife Abigail's list of grievances, which she declared the Continental Congress must relieve if it would avoid a woman's rebellion. Under the stress of the Revolution children, apprentices, schools, colleges, Indians, and negroes had all become insolent and turbulent, he told her. What was to become of the country if women, "the most numerous and powerful tribe in the world," grew discontented?

Now this world-old restlessness of the women has a sound and a tragic cause. Nature lays a compelling hand on her. Unless she obeys freely and fully she must pay in unrest and vagaries. For the normal woman the fulfillment of life is the making of the thing we best describe as a home—which means a mate, children, friends, with all the radiating obligations, joys, burdens, these relations imply.

This is nature's plan for her; but the home has got to be founded inside the imperfect thing we call society. And these two, nature and society, are continually getting into each other's way, wrecking each other's plans, frustrating each other's schemes. The woman almost never is able to adjust her life so as fully to satisfy both. She is between two fires. Euripides understood this when he put into Medea's mouth a cry as modern as any that Ibsen has conceived:

Of all things upon earth that grow,
An herb most bruised is woman. We must pay
Our store of gold, hoarded for that one day,
To buy us some man's love; and lo, they bring
A master of our flesh! There comes the sting
Of the whole shame. And then the jeopardy,
For good or ill, what shall that master be;
'Tis magic she must have or prophecy—
Home never taught her that—how best to guide
Toward peace this thing that sleepeth at her side.
And she who, laboring long, shall find some way
Whereby her lord may bear with her, nor fray
His yoke too fiercely, blessed is the breath
That woman draws!

False Mating.

Medea's difficulty was that which is oftenest in the way of a woman carrying her business in life to a satisfactory completion—false mating. It is not a difficulty peculiar to woman. Man knows it as often. It is the heaviest curse society brings on human beings—the most fertile cause of apathy, agony, and failure. If the woman's cry is more poignant under it than the man's, it is because the machine which holds them both allows him a wider sweep, more interests outside of their immediate alliance. "A man, when he is vexed at home," complains Medea, "can go out and find relief among his friends or acquaintances, but we women have none to look at but him."

And when it is impossible longer to "look" at him, what shall she do! Tell her woe to the world, seek a soporific, repudiate the scheme of things, or from the vantage point of her failure turn to the untried relations of her life, call upon her unused powers?

Tried All.

From the beginning of time she has tried each and all of these methods of meeting her purely human woe. At times the women of whole peoples have sunk into apathy, their business reduced to its dullest, grossest forms. Again, whole groups have taken themselves out of the partnership which both nature and society have ordered. The Amazons refused to recognize man as an equal and mated simply that they might rear more women like themselves. Here the tables were turned and the boy baby turned out—not to the wolves, but to man! The convent has always been a favorite way of escape.

The inference from all this is that the Business of Being a Woman, as it has been conducted heretofore by society, is of less importance than the Business of Being a Man, and that the time has come to enter his world and prove her equality.

Certain Assumptions.

There are certain assumptions in her program which will bear examination. Is man the calculating tyrant the modern uneasy woman charges? Are her fetters due only to his unfair domination? Or is she suffering from the generally bungling way things go in the world? And is not man a victim as well as she—caught in the same trap? Moreover, is woman never a tyrant? One of the first answers to her original revolt came from the most eminent woman of the day, Harriet Beecher Stowe, and it was called "Pink and White Tyranny!" "I have seen a collection of medieval English poems," says Chesterton, "in which the section headed 'Poems of Domestic Life' consisted entirely (literally entirely) of the complaints of husbands bullied by their wives."

Will It Stifle Her Unrest?

Again, will doing the same things a man does work as well in stifling her unrest as she fancies it has in man's case? If a woman's temperamental and intellectual operations were identical with a man's, there would be hope of success,—but they are not. She is a different being. Whether she is better or worse, stronger or weaker, primary or secondary, is not the question. She is different.

And she tries to ease a world-old human curse by imitating the occupations, points of views, and methods of a radically different being. Can she realize her quest in this way? Generally speaking, nothing is more wasteful in human operations than following a course which is not native and spontaneous, not according to the law of the being.

Believe in Their Task.

If she demonstrates her points, successfully copies man's activities, can she impress her program on any great body of women? The mass of women believe in their task. Its importance is not capable of argument in their minds. Nor do they see themselves dwarfed by their business. They know instinctively that under no other circumstances can such ripeness and such wisdom be developed, that nowhere else is the full nature called upon, nowhere else are there such intricate, delicate, and intimate forces in play, calling and testing them.

To bear and to rear, to feel the dependence of man and child—the necessity for themselves—to know that upon them depend the health, the character, the happiness, the future of certain human beings—to see themselves laying and preserving the foundations of so imposing a thing as a family—to build so that this family shall become a strong stone in the state—to feel themselves through this family perpetuating and perfecting church, society, republic,—this is their destiny,—this is worth while. They may not be able to state it, but all their instincts and experiences convince them of the supreme and eternal value of their place in the world. They dare not tamper with it.

Principle of Preservation.

Their opposition to the militant program badly and even cruelly expressed at times has at bottom, as an opposition always has, the principle of preservation. It is not bigotry or vanity or a petty notion of their own spheres which has kept the majority of women from lending themselves to the radical wing of the woman's movement. It is fear to destroy a greater thing which they possess. The fear of change is not an irrational thing—the fear of change is founded on the risk of losing what you have, on the certainty of losing much temporarily at least. It sees the cost, the ugly and long period of transition.

Brings Patience.

Moreover, respect for your calling brings patience with its burden and its limitations. The change you desire you work for conservatively, if at all. The women who opposed the first movement for women's rights in this country might deplore the laws that gave a man the power to beat his wife—but as a matter of fact few men did beat their wives, and popular opinion was a powerful weapon. They might deplore the laws of property—but few of them were deeply touched by them. The husband, the child, the home, the social circle, the church, these things were infinitely more interesting and important to them than diplomats, rights to work, rights to property, rights to vote. All the sentiments in the revolting women's program seemed trivial, cold, profitless beside the realties of life as they dreamed them and struggled to realize them.

It is this same intuitive loyalty to her Business of Being a Woman, her unwillingness to have it tampered with, that is today the great obstacle to our Uneasy Woman putting her program of relief into force.

Fixing the Blame.

However much certain of the assumptions in her program may seem to be against its success, there is much for it. It gives her a scapegoat—an outside, personal, attackable cause for the limitations and defeats she suffers. And there is no greater consolation than fixing blame. It is half a cure in itself to know or to think you know the cause of your difficulties. Moreover, it gives her a scapegoat against whom it is easy to make up a case. She knows him too well, much better than he knows her—much better than she knows herself; self; at least her knowledge of him is better formulated. And she has this advantage: custom makes it cowardly for a man to attempt to demonstrate that woman is a tyrant—it laughs and applauds woman's attempt to fix the charge on man.

It gives her a definite program of relief. To attack life as man does; to secure the same kind of training, enter a trade or profession where she can support herself, mingle with the crowd as he does, get into politics—that she assumes to be the practical way of curing the inferiority of position and of powers which she is willing to admit, even willing to demonstrate. That a man's life may not be altogether satisfactory, she declines to believe. The uneasy woman has always taken it for granted that man is happier than woman. It is an assumption which is at least discussible.

The civic committee of the Chicago Woman's Club has been engaged in a piece of good work. In Chicago an investigation of 413 buildings in the Twentieth ward by the committee showed 1,666 violations of the sanitary ordinances. The investigation, covering a period of nearly nine months, was carried on by members of the committee aided by an expert who spoke six languages. The district chosen for study lay between Clinton and Morgan streets and Taylor and Sixteenth streets. This includes the heart of the Ghetto. Reform in the sanitation laws is urged in the report. One step in the reform of the law, it is pointed out, will be taken when societies having good housing at heart form a central organization. "While permanent reform must come from no less than three sources," reads the report, "the tenant, the landlord, and the city, it is a coincidence that a few weeks after the committee's work began waste collections from the district almost doubled." From the 413 houses visited complaints were sent to the sanitary bureau for violations as follows: Toilets, 316; sinks, 146; calcimining necessary, 213; defective means of ventilation, 231; filth dangerous to health, 60; repair of house necessary, 161; flats having entirely dark rooms, 235; filth in yards, 59; defective plumbing, 235; houses unfit for habitation, 9.

J. N. Scholes, Bellaire, O., to First, Johnstown, Pa.

W. R. Foster, Maxwell, Ia., to Mason City, Ia. Accepts.

H. L. Davenport, temporary supply at Leavenworth, Kan., to be settled pastor. Accepts.

A. A. Doak, Washington, to Vacaville, Cal. Accepts.

J. H. Wright, Harristown, Ill., to Farmer City, Ill. Accepts.

A. L. Ward, Pueblo, Colo., to Lebanon, Ind. Accepts.

J. M. Smith, Brownwood, Tex., to Plattsburg, Mo. Accepts.

Arthur Sebastian, Mount Healthy, O., to Forest Ave., Buffalo, N. Y. Accepts.

ADDITIONS TO THE CHURCHES.

Russian Mission, Chicago, Basil Kensseff, leader; 4 by baptism.

Charleroi, Pa., E. N. Duty, pastor; 6 by baptism on Dec. 22.

Council Bluffs, Ia., Edgar Price, pastor; 131 in past year.

RESIGNATIONS.

J. P. Pinkerton, Bentonville, Ark.

G. W. Kitchen, Coffeyville, Kan.

W. W. Denham, Carthage, Ill.

John A. Stevens, Baton Rouge, La.

EVANGELISTIC MEETINGS.

Bouler, Colo., J. L. Thompson, pastor at Greeley.

Topeka, Kan., Third, H. J. Corwine, pastor; W. T. Brooks, evangelist; 43; closed.

Danville, Second, L. N. Early, pastor; J. A. Barnett of Third, Danville, Evangelist; 94; continuing.

Long Beach, Cal., F. M. Rogers, pastor; E. E. Violett, evangelist; 153; continuing.

Cherokee, Okla., C. R. L. Vawter, evangelist; 126; continuing.

San Antonio, Tex., Hugh McLellan, pastor; W. J. Minges, evangelist; 134; continuing.

Central Church, DesMoines, Ia., recently burned a $25,000 mortgage of twenty years' standing.

F. E. Day, formerly pastor at Shubert, Neb., is expected to be made private secretary to Governor-elect J. H. Morehead, of Nebraska.

The death on Christmas day of Mrs. Lena B. Knights removes from Englewood church, Chicago, and from the organized activities of Chicago Christian women of all denominations an influential and capable leader.

A $25,000 Sunday-school building with individual classrooms and a regulation gymnasium is nearing completion as an addition to the Englewood church, Chicago, of which C. G. Kindred is pastor. A trained instructor will be employed for the gymnasium work.

Wallace Tharp, who has been conducting a series of special Sunday evening lectures or addresses in his Northside church, Pittsburgh, completed the series two weeks ago with an address on "Ben Hur." In response to the invitation at the close of the address there were twelve who made the confession of faith.

David Teachout, Cleveland's active and resourceful Disciple layman whose message in the million dollar campaign for missions stirred hearts and opened pocket-books, will start on a trip to China this month accompanied by his wife who is a daughter of Prof. and Mrs. F. E. Meigs, of Nankin University.

The edifice of First Church, Fayetteville, Ark., was destroyed by fire Dec. 20. The building and furniture are a total loss. N. M. Ragland, the pastor, says the membership, while sorely smitten by the catastrophe, is not discouraged but will build another house where the ruined structure stood.

During the year there have been 135 additions to the Beatrice, Neb., church, a net gain of 119. The present membership is not far from 1,200. The financial reports of the various departments show that $14,729.03 has been raised for all purposes, exclusive of a donation of $2,000 from Mr. Carnegie toward the organ and some special gifts of certain members to mission schools in China. Of the total amount mentioned above $1,436.28 was for missions. C. F. Stevens is the pastor.

213 CHURCH BUILDINGS ERECTED WITH OUR ANNUITY FUND

What It Is!

THE ANNUITY PLAN

How It Works!

In Our Church Extension Fund

at Kansas City, Mo.

What It Is—Through our Annuity Plan you can administer upon your own estate by putting your money into our Church Extension Fund. This is far better than making a bequest because the Board will pay you 6 per cent, in semi-annual payments, if you are fifty years old or more, and the interest will be paid to your wife if she survives you. Between the ages of forty and forty-nine the rate is 5 per cent, and 4 per cent between the ages of twenty-one and thirty-nine.

ITS GREAT ADVANTAGES TO YOU

1. You can see your money work while you live.
2. You have no trouble or losses in making reinvestments.
3. You have no taxes nor attorneys' fees to pay and your income is regular.
4. The Society is perpetual and is incorporated. Its funds are perpetual and are loaned only on first mortgages where titles are absolutely good.
5. Your money is safe because the Annuity Bond which the Board issues you is as good as a Government Bond because it is backed up by all the assets of the Fund, which now amount to over $1,015,276 and which will constantly increase.
6. We receive remittance of $100, or as many hundreds or thousands as you can send, and your money will be received at any time and the Bond will be dated so that your interest begins at once.

How Your Money Works—The Board does not invest your money in some secular enterprise and WAIT FOR YOU TO DIE before using it in the work of Church Extension. All of our Annuity money is loaned at 6 per cent to aid promising congregations to build. The money is returned by the churches using it in five equal, annual installments, and as fast as it returns it goes out again and again to build churches. Your money is thus in a PERPETUAL WHIRL OF DOING GOOD, because we have more demands for Annuity money than we can answer. Our mission churches in the new Southwest are glad to get Annuity money from the Board of Church Extension and pay 6 per cent, which is only 2 per cent more than is charged for the regular funds. They then have their loans in the hands of their friends.

Our Annuity Fund has received 355 gifts and $354,257.26, with which 213 church buildings have been erected.

We can use $100,000 this year. Send remittances at once and give your full legal name and your age. Write to

G. W. MUCKLEY, Cor. Sec., NEW ENGLAND BLDG., KANSAS CITY, MISSOURI

By means of a combination of four denominations in the little town of Alma, Mo., there will henceforth be an English-speaking church service maintained with regularity every Sunday. The denominational families represented in the federation are Presbyterians, Baptists, Methodists and Disciples. Henry W. Hunter, pastor at Higginsville, Mo., in the same county, preached for them once recently and received five confessions of faith. He was to pay a return visit. "The situation looks good to me," he says, and he means to help as he may be able, to solve some of its problems and to aid its progress.

Dr. Hillis has said, "Earth knows no tragedy like the death of the soul's ideal." Dr. Jowett recently spoke of "forked lightning declining into harmless sheet lightning." In a recent sermon on "The Tragedy of Lukewarmness" John R. Ewers, of East End Church, Pittsburg, used these words: "The passion for saintliness has cooled into a mild desire for common respectability. The heroic devotion to ideals has fallen into a petty round of conventionalities. The indignation at sin has degenerated into broad toleration. The organ music of sublime love has changed into the mechanical clank and clatter of mere duty."

Dr. Willett in Japan

Dr. H. L. Willett, of Chicago Universiy, on his way around the world with a Mission Study Class, gave one day to Osaka. The church was crowded to the doors to hear his great lecture on "Christianity's Approach to the Nations." This lecture did much to make the church a power and influence in this part of Osaka and mightily convinced the people that we were trying to be a blessing in the community. At this time we were planning for our special evangelistic services, so that this lecture increased our constituency and opened the way into many hearts and homes. Mr. Kurihara, secretary of the Y. M. C. A., of Kyoto, interpreted for Dr. Willett.

In the afternoon Dr. Willett had a conference with the missionaries of Osaka, at the residence of Dr. A. D. Hail, who has been nearly 35 years in Osaka. At this conference, such questions as "What effect does the revival of Shinto and Buddhism have on Christianity in Japan;" "If the missionaries left Japan now, would Christianity maintain itself;" "What are the main difficulties of the work;" "What message have the missionaries in Japan for the churches at home" and other very interesting subjects, which were discussed by veterans who have been here for thirty years and upwards. Doubtess Dr. Willett will give to the people at home, through the papers, the main lessons and points of the various conferences which he held in Japan. Secretary Fisher, of the Y. M. C. A., Tokyo, said that the conferences that Dr. Willett held in Tokyo, both with the missionaries and with Japanese workers, were the best conferences he had ever attended in Japan.

A Month of Encouragement

The first month of reports from the Bible schools shows a splendid increase in the offerings for American missions. The total amount contributed is $20,241.93, which is a gain of $3,250.41 over the corresponding period of 1911-12. This also lacks only about $2,000 of being the total offering of the entire year of 1912-11. We are greatly encouraged in our hope that the schools will raise $50,000 from the schools for American missions in this fiscal year.

Many of the largest contributors have not yet sent their offerings but are awaiting to collect outstanding pledges. Hundreds of schools are planning to take an offering at a later date and to all such we are glad to send literature free. We are seeking to make this offering unanimous during this Silver Jubilee Year for Home missions.

Foreign Society News

The church at Springfield, Ohio, enters the living-link column in the Foreign Society H. E. Beckler, the minister, and the whole church greatly rejoice.

Dr. L. F Jaggard, Monieka, Congo, Africa, speak of the very, very hot weather at that place He has been on the sick list. He says there are favorable reports from the outposts round about. He reports $155 received for medical service.

A. F. Hensey, writing from Bolenge, Africa, under date of October 31, and referring to the Steamship Oregon, says, "The hull is now in as good condition as when she was launched. The men scraped and painted the bottom and then painted her all over. I can assure you that she never looked better. A new flagstaff was also put in." It will be remembered that this was the ship that was dedicated at the Centennial Convention in Pittsburg in 1909.

Last week the Foreign Society received an annuity gift from a friend in Ohio. This was the second gift on the Annuity Plan This is the season of the year when many should respond with annuity gifts.

H. C. Saum, of Bilaspur, India, says, "Our work is doing real well. Six evangelists are out touring. I am going tonight to be with them. I baptized one young man on Sunday, November 10th.

On December 7th. William Durban, of London, England, entered into the life that is Life indeed. He was in his seventy-third year. He had been active as a Christian worker for half a century. He had been in the employment of the society for many years.

Notice to Pastors

The pastors of all the churches included in the Federal Council are earnestly requested to obtain from the office of the Council, 215 Fourth Avenue, New York, in sufficient quantities for distribution to the members of the churches, the letter issued by the Committee on Correspondence, giving a summary of the deliberations and the most important actions of the recent Quadrennial session at Chicago. This will be supplied at the cost of printing, which is 75 cents per hundred The Committee on Correspondence was instructed to bring the information contained in its report to the attention of the churches and the only way by which this can be done and the members brought to understand the work of the Federal Council, is by the means hereby suggested. The records of the Council and the various reports will appear later in bound volumes, and the separate reports will also be obtainable for distribution among the churches.

A Summer Home in Winter

Owing to the expected crowded condition of Eustis during the coming winter season there is a greater demand for good accommodations than can be secured. At the earnest solicitation of friends Mrs. W. T. Moore has consented to offer six large rooms at The Palms for the accommodation of Christian people. A northern lady, who is an expert caterer, has been secured to take full charge of the comforts of the guests, and enjoyable home living is assured. For particulars address The Palms, Eustis, Florida.

DISCIPLES PUBLICATION SOCIETY

THE DISCIPLES PUBLICATION SOCIETY is a non-profit-sharing corporation whose charter has recently been granted by the state of Illinois. It is organized for the purpose of publishing books, Sunday School literature and a weekly religious newspaper. Its profits are not to go to individuals but are to be appropriated to advance the cause of religious education, especially the higher education of the Christian ministry. The term "religious education" is regarded as an ideal common to Sunday Schools, missionary societies, colleges, seminaries and universities, and other organizations that promote Christian progress through Christian education. The New Christian Century company has agreed, by resolution adopted unanimously by the stockholders, to sell the entire assets and good will of the company to the newly organized Disciples Publication Society for the sum of $16,000 and to accept the notes of said Society for that amount. The trustees of the Disciples Publication Society have agreed to purchase the business of the New Christian Century Co. on these terms. To provide capital for enlarging the business the trustees are issuing 5 per cent bonds in the amount of $50,000, retirable after five years, to be sold to persons interested in the ideals of The Christian Century. It is believed at the present time that the entire issue will not need to be sold, but that, in addition to the bonds set aside as security for the notes to be given to the stockholders of the New Christian Century Co., not more than $25,000 of bonds must be sold. Subscriptions for the purchase of these bonds are now being solicited by C. C. Morrison and H. L. Willett, editors of The Christian Century. During Dr. Willett's absence in the Orient correspondence may be addressed exclusively to Mr. Morrison. Full information as to all details will be given upon inquiry. The essential purpose of the agreements and proposals herein described is to provide a way for the general brotherhood of the Disciples of Christ to buy the entire interest of the New Christian Century Company and to pay for it by patronizing it. The bonds and notes are to be retired out of the profits earned by the Society.

The purchasers of bonds, therefore, will stand, with the holders of notes, in the position of sustainers or supporters of the enterprise while the brotherhood's patronage is paying for it and increasing its value. The question of defining the membership of the Disciples Publication Society is still open, and upon it the organizers will be glad to receive suggestions. It is the purpose to make it thoroughly democratic and representative. The five trustees named by the charter will act for the Society until the basis of membership has been determined and the members elected.

CHURCH LEADERS HAIL BROTHERHOOD OWNERSHIP

The response to our announcement of the organization of the Disciples Publication Society comes in like a tide, rising higher and higher with every mail as we go to press. The following letters speak for themselves and needs no introductory or interpretative word. They are for the most part addressed to Mr. Morrison and contain many personal felicitations, intended for Dr. Willett also, which were omitted in preparing them for publication. For all these words of approval, congratulation and support the editors take this occasion to speak their gratitude.

We are glad to give first place to the Christian Evangelist's cordial word of welcome written even in advance of our announcement. We pay our best compliments to the news getter of that paper who, to our complete surprise, was able almost to "scoop" The Christian Century in its own affairs! The following editorial appeared last week, simultaneously with our announcement:

By THE CHRISTIAN EVANGELIST.

ANOTHER BROTHERHOOD PUBLISHING HOUSE.

It is said that another publishing house among us desires to be known among the brethren as a brotherhood publishing house. This is good. The process of becoming a real, genuine brotherhood publishing house is easy. Let an incorporation be formed with a board of directors to hold forever this property in trust for the benefit and profit of the brotherhood. Then all the holdings of this publishing house can be turned over to said board of directors. They will be of such ability as to administer this trust in the interest of the kingdom at large and will turn over all its earnings to the general benevolent and missionary organizations of the Disciples.

There is room for another real, genuine brotherhood publishing company among us.

By HOWARD T. CREE, Augusta, Ga.

Your editorial announcing the fact that now The Christian Century is to be placed upon a sound financial basis which will permit it to carry out its policies unhampered by lack of funds is indeed a matter of great congratulation. I join with a host of others in extending you my very best wishes and in praying for the paper a long and honorable career of faithful service. What matters it if all do not sympathize with your editorial policies? You are doing a great work, you are an influential part of our great brotherhood. We are all striving to honor our common Master, and I applaud every advance you make in an effort to express your message to an increasingly larger group. This program, it seems to me, is in line with the spirit of the Louisville convention and means a closer articulation of our religious papers with our religious ideals as represented by a larger number than is now possible. God bless you in all your plans, and lead you in the spirit. Please continue my subscription.

By IRVING S. CHENOWETH, Philadelphia.

I am glad for any progress made toward tury and the Bethany Sunday-school Supplies. I heartily believe in their educational value and feel sure that our brotherhood will profit by the co-operation desired by the present managers.

By BURRIS A. JENKINS, Kansas City, Mo.

I congratulate you most highly and a larger usefulness for The Christian Censincerely hope the new plans will all carry out as you desire. With kindest regards.

By H. O. PRITCHARD, Bethany, Nebr.

Allow me to congratulate you on the prospects of making The New Christian Century Company the property of the brotherhood. I should rejoice to see the brotherhood own all of our religious journals, for I feel it would be the solving of many of our difficulties. Yours is a step in the right direction. I desire also to congratulate you upon making higher education the recipient of whatever profits may accrue. No cause among is so needy and at the same time so neglected as the cause of higher education. All our institutions of learning are suffering seriously for lack of endowment. May this be means of awakening renewed interest in this great cause. I wish you abundant success in this new venture.

By IDA W. HARRISON, Lexington, Ky.

Permit me to congratulate The Christian Century on this achievement of the hopes of many years. May its consummation mean an entrance upon an even wider field of service and usefulness than it has yet known during its nearly three decades of effort for the glory of God, and the good of humanity!

By JAMES M. PHILPUTT, New York City.

The plan which you outline for the future control of The Century seems altogether feasible. You deserve great credit for bringing the paper to its high efficiency—for making it a necessity to the progress of our church. No doubt there are many who will be glad to take hold with you and assist in enlarging the sphere of its usefulness. I congratulate you on the well-wrought plan to make it in the future a "brotherhood paper." It will commend itself, I think, to our people generally. With best wishes for your complete success.

By HARRY D. SMITH, Hopkinsville, Ky.

For many years it has seemed to me very rational and wholly desirable that our publishing of all sorts should be done by societies representatives as far as possible of the brotherhood. I hail, therefore, with considerable satisfaction this second notable experiment among us in such publishing.

By HILL M. BELL, Drake University.

I most heartily approve your placing this publication in the hands of a company to be known as the "Disciples Publication Society." Since the question of brotherhood ownership of publishing houses has been under discussion, I have been convinced from the first that the only way to place a publication under the auspices of the Disciples is the plan which you have outlined in this notice just received. The plan looks feasible, and I believe that you will be successful in conducting an enterprise worthy of the Disciples. I most

Short-Cuts to Success

I HAVE WATCHED WITH considerable interest the reports of a Sunday-school contest which has been going on for several weeks in a neighboring state. One school had its "big day" about the middle of the contest term. The day was heralded as one long to be remembered. All previous records had been broken. The neighboring school seemed to be hopelessly beaten. There was a tinge of sadness in its reports. But this was only a piece of religious strategy, as a day of reckoning had been decided upon which should spell the doom of its thus-far successful rival. Plans were laid which should make the boasted "big day" look insignificant, if not sick, according to the phrase of the local press.

And they succeeded. The lagging school stole the thunder of its competitor and gathered from other local Sunday-schools, from schools of our own faith and order in near-by towns, and from all parts of the county any persons who would enroll for the day. The spirit so conspicuous in much revivalism infested the entire community. Numbers rolled off the tongues of the interested in squadrons and battalions.

So far as the attendance and offerings were concerned, the contest was a great success. It did not reveal which was the stronger school. The losing school probably would have been the winner if they had chosen the last day of the rivalry instead of an earlier day, for it is certain that local pride would have massed an aggregation within the walls of auditoriums which would have set a record for all time to come.

It cannot be denied that there is merit in these contests. There is the advertising of church and Sunday-school which is worth something; there is a stimulus in great numbers; and there is the opportunity of gathering a large collection. There may be a temporary revival of Sunday-school interest. But such is often very short-lived. Rallies can be used to good purpose if the spirit of "winning" is subordinated to the spirit of increasing the school in ways of efficiency.

But it is pertinent to inquire, How many new students were gained for both schools It is to be assumed that such an important item was not forgotten. How much deeper is the conviction of the workers as to the importance of their work? Was the spirit of devotion present on the "big" days, or was it drowned in the hilarity of winning? Is there a greater desire today to do the things which the Sunday-school should do? How much better off are the crowds who came to be counted and to contribute? When will they appear again?

It may seem ungracious to raise such questions, knowing as we do, the fascination which a crowd has for all of us, the crowds which cover a multitude of sins. The task of getting the young to see the importance of making our service to Christ paramount to all the demands of ease and pleasure and excitement may be slow and even painful, but it must be done. Of course, all schools do that, but all schools need to do that a little more, and with the enthusiasm which they give to the collection of crowds on special days during the year. The cultivation of the missionary spirit, of the prayerful heart, the study of the Bible, of the spirit of self-denial, is a wearisome and at times discouraging process, but on that the church must ultimately depend for her power in the world.

And we need the same enthusiasm in this steadier task as in the assembling of a multitude which has the appearance of the crowds at Pentecost. If we get all that we desire, or any reasonable portion of our desire, by the contests, by all means let us have them. Yet the numbers we seek after will be more likely to result from our cultivation of the forces than will the cultivation of the forces result from mere numbers. There is ever the danger that we shall be pinning leaves to the tree; they are leaves, and they are on a tree, but they have no anchorage in the life of the tree. Their fate is known; the first wind will scatter them to the four corners of the earth. But where the leaves spring out of the vigor of the tree all its strength will fight with the elements for mastery.

We are trying short cuts to ministerial education these days, hoping with meagre training to supply the demand for preachers. It is likely the number will be increased, but is there not danger of losing preaching-power with this method of multiplying preachers? It is not to be expected that we shall take time, for many years to come, to produce men who will do the work which should be done in the church, if the fascination of numbers continues to hold sway.

We sacrifice quality to bulk in almost everything we do in our generation, and until the epidemic spends itself there is little hope of reversing our scale of values. On we go, but the doctrine of the survival will take care of us all. If we are fit we ought to thank the Almighty that he has saved us from the temporary ravages of the unfit; if we are not, there is reason for thanksgiving that we are not snares for the feet of those who are. If our voices cannot strike terror to the soul of the sinner, or solace the soul of the saint with gladness, nature has so ordained that the same voice may inspire the mule, while we follow the plow. The troubles of the world would be few if every man could find his place; and attempts to find a route would disappear if we could only be content to do our work patiently and wait. But waiting, to many good people, is only purgatory running ahead of time. E. B. B.

Social Survey

The Red Sox and the Black Hand

Judging from what we know as to the whereabouts of a good many Disciple ministers on many bright, blue-Monday afternoons during the "on-season," the most significant event of 1912 for not a few people in the United States is the victory of the Red Sox over the Giants in the contest for the world's championship (we take for granted our readers know to what sport reference is made.) There are many important events which have taken place in the twelve months just closed, the significance of which looms large or small according to one's point of view or previous condition of servitude. Geographical nearness is a factor which often determines for many whether or not an event is important. To Illinois people the exclusion of Lorimer from the United States Senate is an event of greater significance than to people of Connecticut or California. The coronation of King George V. and Queen Mary at the spectacular durbar at Delhi possesses a greater importance for Englishmen than for Russian subjects or American citizens. The conviction of the Camorrist brigands and the end of the Italian Camorra is of more moment to residents in Italy than to voters of New York City, although the latter are correspondingly more concerned with the conviction of Lieutenant Becker and the other murderers of the gambler, Rosenthal. There are several other events of the past year which have a relative, though not a universal importance. Among such events might be mentioned the floods of the Mississippi, the discovery of the South Pole, the Olympic games, the conviction of the McNamaras and thirty-eight other labor leaders in the dynamite cases, the completion of the Woolworth Building in New York City, the tallest office building in the world, 750 feet in height, and the continued disturbances, amounting to a state of virtual anarchy, in Mexico.

Vox Populi Vox Dei

The past year, from a purely national point of view, has witnessed some significant happenings. President Taft has continued the strict enforcement of the Sherman anti-trust law, with the result that government suits have been instituted and successfully carried on through the courts to prevent unlawful restraint of trade. Perhaps the most important piece of legislation which congress has enacted is the inauguration of the parcels post, which is bound to have a far-reaching effect and without doubt will be of utmost benefit to the consumer. One of the black marks which the recording angel of 1912 will set down against us is the failure of the senate to ratify the unlimited arbitration treaties which the department of state had formulated with Great Britain and several other countries. Equally unsatisfactory is the attitude congress has taken in regard to the Panama Canal tolls in direct violation of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty, involving us in at least a diplomatic dispute with Great Britain and putting us in the dishonorable position of repudiating our national promise. Outside of the bumper crops, which have made the farmer more independent than ever, these are the events which, with one exception, have the most national significance. As years go, 1912 is no ordinary year. Speaking politically it is not an exaggeration to say that it is the most significant period in the history of the United States for over fifty years. Since the election of Abraham Lincoln in 1861, the Republican party has held office the greater part of the time, and has been almost continuously in power. In November a Democratic president was elected for the first time in twenty years, and a Democratic majority secured in both houses of congress. But more important even than these Democratic successes was the apparent disintegration of the Republican party and the birth of the Progressive party, already a lusty infant and bidding fair to become one of the great national parties in years to come. This bloodless revolution is part of a world-wide movement in the direction of real democracy. The common people are coming to their own in England as well as in the United States. Under the inspiring leadership of that great defender of the working classes, Mr. Lloyd-George, parliament has made notable strides forward in the correction of ancient wrongs. The working out of the insurance act, the Welsh disestablishment bill, the franchise reform act, and, most important of all, the Irish home rule bill, have made 1912 an annus mirabilis in English politics.

The Old World Made New

School children in more than one part of the world from now on will have to add 1912 to the list of dates which mark the beginning of great epochs. While on the whole, this date may not be so notable for the children of the new world—with the possible exception of Mexico—for the children of the old world, 1912 will have an importance difficult to overestimate. Events have taken place which will eventually alter the maps of two continents. The Balkan War will compel a readjustment of the European concert. The balance of power between the Triple Alliance and the Triple Entente has been completely upset. Not since Victor Emmanuel entered the Eternal City in July, 1871, and thereby assured the permanence of united Italy, and practically gave birth to a new European nation, has anything so important taken place in European politics. Pan-Slavism, these many years growing in intensity, will at last find national expression. So strong has this movement become that it may mean the breaking up of the Austrian empire by the defection of the old kingdom of Hungary. Moreover, a result no less important is the practical expulsion of the Turk from European politics, where he has been a menace for centuries. Even though the Golden Horn and a narrow strip of land be left to him, his control will be nominal, and the Sick Man of Europe is now, not recovered, but non est. The most stupendous event, however, has to do with Asia. The nation that has been in a Rip van Winkle sleep for millenniums has at last yawned and stretched and is now actually awake. The throwing off of the hated yoke of the selfish, plundering Manchu dynasty and the formation of a republic in China will ever be one of the marvels in human history. The most conservative absolutism in the world has been dissolved under the leadership of Dr. Sun Yat-Sen, provisional president, revolutionary leader, and active Christian, and that great statesman and military leader, Yuan Shih Kai. China has the greatest undeveloped resources in the world, and, according to Mr. W. M. Van Norden, a high authority on Chinese affairs, this nation represents the largest aggregation of able merchants, traders, and bankers in the world. The sleeping giant is aroused and the year 1912 marks a new epoch not only in Asiatic history but in world history, for generations yet unborn in far distant centuries will put this date down as the beginning of a new era. The day of princes, and kings, and tyrants is fast passing away, and the common people, white, black, brown, yellow, are at last coming to their own.

The Insatiate Archer

The great men who have passed away during 1912 are notably Wilbur Wright, the father of aviation, who, strange to say, died a natural death, Frederick VIII., the much beloved king of Denmark, the Japanese Emperor, Mutsuhito, and General Nogi, the hero of Port Arthur, whose voluntary death by hari-kari, while it could not be justified on the grounds of Christian ethics, was nevertheless a noble expression of devotion to his deceased sovereign. 1912 will go down into history, also, as the year of the greatest marine disaster in the memory of men. That last hour of Sunday, Apr. 14, will never be forgotten by the 706 persons in the life boats of the "Titanic" as they heard the cries of 1,600 men and women struggling in the icy water and saw the "Titanic," the finest, largest, and supposedly the safest steamship in the world, sink slowly, bow foremost, into the deep. The poorly-drilled crew, the forging ahead at top speed in spite of the warnings of ice ahead, the "Californian" less than nineteen miles away, whose captain disregarded the "Titanic" signals, the seven other steamships within call of the wireless, had operators been at the instruments, only add the element of needlessness to the tragedy, though as a result Atlantic travel will be made far more secure.

A proposal to eliminate the negro as an American soldier is slated for consideration when the conference of the ranking officers of the army is held Jan. 8. Some officers are prepared to urge the proposal on the ground that in the Philippines natives are said to resent the appearance among them of the black troopers, and that there are signs of dissatisfaction in Hawaii owing to the fact that the Twenty-fifth Infantry, a negro organization, has been ordered to the islands to form a permanent garrison. Friends of the negro soldiers are preparing to make a strenuous fight in their behalf. Major E. B. Gose, commanding two battalions of the Twenty-fifth Infantry at Fort George Wright says: "I have served eleven years with negro troops and eleven years with white troops. I have found the negroes the better behaved, the more amenable to discipline and more inclined to be interested in their work as soldiers."

The True Aim of Manhood

The skilled workman can do much with inferior tools; the unskilled workman is more likely to spoil good tools than he is to produce with them articles of the first class. The church needs efficient men and women; they can get results by using the present machinery of the church. They know what new machinery is needed and when it is needed.

The object of the educational work of the church is to produce men and women whose ideals are never fully represented by what the church is doing, who are ever seeking to increase the power of the church by turning it away from useless activities and by making clear to all its real business and the proper way of attending to that business.

Spiritual alertness is needed. Leaders we must have but we ought to be wide enough awake to hear their cry of alarm when some great wrong is about to be perpetrated and to answer their call to battle in behalf of righteousnesss. We are quick to resent certain wrongs and we have a few sentiments for which we are ever ready to fight. But we ridicule today men whose teaching will govern our lives tomorrow. We might do some thinking without being forced to it.

Firmness is an element of manhood. It is not to be confused with bad manners and boastfulness. Some persons with bad manners and some conceited persons display firmness in their conduct, but boorishness and conceit are not thus shown to be necessary to steadiness of purpose. The better sort of man can hold to his own opinions without being discourteous to those who do not agree with him. Does a man adhere to any particular belief? We can tell by his life, by what he supports and by what he discourages.

We demand of men that they be reasonable. The reasonable man takes account of other human beings. He is aware that his actions affect them and that they have as much right to be heard as he has. He does not dismiss them because they are illiterate or even immoral. He knows that if he is to do them any good they must have something to say about what he is doing when he acts for them. The reasonable man awakens reason in others. The stupid leader puts the reason of the people to sleep. The autocrat may get immediate results; the reasonable man prepares for the largest returns in the future.

"It does not take long to learn the principles involved in any trade or art, but it takes a lot of practice to make one worth anything in their practice. So it does not take long to learn all the moral principles, but it takes a good deal of practice before the response and the stimulus are very definitely connected." Thus does a psychologist warn us that we must not expect to save the world by giving formal lessons in morals. The ordering of ideas is necessary. Inspirational writing and speaking have an important place in the moral life. But it is habit that counts. The passionate man may be well aware of the damage wrought by his anger and he may be ashamed of his temporary insanity, but the next provocation drives him insane again. Why does he sin against light? His habits are wrong. To save him we must assist him in forming new habits. The habit of self-control gives one power over distracting circumstances and exasperating persons.

"Now, if an individual is a 'bundle of habits,' if every one sooner or later acquires pretty definite modes of response to all the situations of life, the question of moral training becomes a very simple one in theory, however hard it may be to carry it out in practice. All that is required is to bring about on the part of the child the appropriate response, to lead to the formation of such a bundle of habits as will be most conducive to the welfare of the child and society." Moral training, then, is like all other training. Bad habits are to be avoided and good habits are to be cultivated until the individual finds it easy to do right and society has confidence in his intentions and in his ability to do the thing that promotes its welfare.

The best man is one whose habits are adapted to the uses of the universal kingdom of God. A man's habits must fit his place in the world; the good man looks to it that his work is a part of the work of the world, that it is necessary to hmuan welfare, and that it is being done so that the greatest benefit comes to the world. How much are the church and the Sunday-school doing toward forming the habits of the children? Are they lecturing the children or are they assisting them to meet every situation with the right kind of action? [Midweek Service, Jan. 15. 1 Cor. 16:13; Gen. 1:26-28; Eph. 4:11-13.]

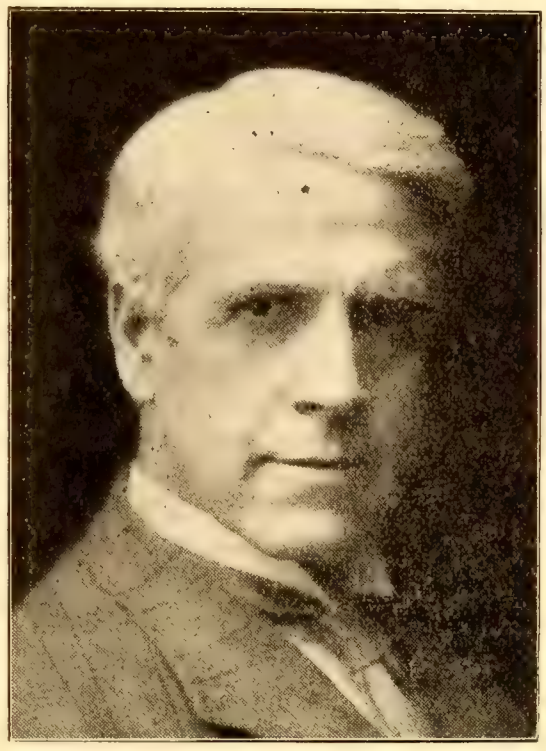
Epoch-Makers of Modern Missions

Of making books there is no end, and it is well that this is so, for out of the multitude we are always sure of finding some fact or truth of value which may indeed change the current of one's life. Words may be breath, but if they are true they will outlive the hills; they are seeds, but in them there may be glorious harvests. A book on missions is a record of what has been done in the world since the sacred deposits were sealed, though the rim of all such books, the really great books, touch the rim of those we call sacred because all are true. In fact, if the program of the Apostles be continued there is every reason to believe that all the records of apostolic men are sacred, no matter when written.



Archibald McLean, LL. D.

A modern apostle of missions, Archibald McLean, has written a book with the above title. It contains sixteen missionary biographies,—not thumbnail sketches, for the books has three hundred pages,—which are the cream of a hundred missionary biographies. The subjects are men like Henry Martyn, Adoniram Judson, William Carey, and last but not least, our own Dr. Z. T. Loftus. Every friend of missions will welcome this volume as a compendium of missionary biography. Revells are the publishers.

The title is suggestive; it reminds us of the upheavals in the pagan and heathen world. It reminds us that God and the missionary have ploughed deep in the nations that know not the name of Christ for future sowing. The same hand that strikes planets into space like sparks from an anvil, fixing their metes and bounds, brings into the eye of the Christian nations those peoples who have sought for God in the open fields, before altars, or in vast temples the magnificence of which the temples of Christendom have scarcely surpassed. It is no longer poetry or prophecy that a nation has been born in a day.

Into those lands the missionary went unannounced and unwelcome. He was like a beam in the darkness, but the beam widened, scattering the night, and compelling men to wonder at the brightness of the new day. He was ridiculed by sailor, soldier, and civilian alike; he was regarded as a moral pest which troubled business or political interests, and guilty consciences alike. These missionaries were pilgrims and strangers in the earth, not counting their lives dear if only Christ could be made known among the heathen. They were always coming to their own, as it were, and being cast out. There is nothing so sublime in the annals of the world as the story of the abandon with which these men gave themselves to their work. While others talked of sacrifice, they sang the songs of rejoicing; while others mourned their consecration to an untimely death, they believed that they had devoted themselves to a service which must bring life; while others disparaged the folly of the over-zealous, they were willing to be called fools for Christ's sake, that those to whom they ministered might become wise. They had no ends to serve save the will of Christ, no passion but to be like him, no sorrow could befall that his mighty power could not weave into a crown of rejoicing. These men might be swallowed up in desert sands, but their names would be written on the palms of God's hands; they might go down in the sea of heathenism, but God would bring them to their desired haven. Their triumphs would be the impossible which even the doubter must accept as miracles of undisputed genuineness. Every library containing President McLean's volume will offer one of the best apologetics for Christianity that can be written, a testimony of fact and of fruit. Every such volume as this is a leaf from the tree of life.

To speak of the miracle of missions is not to use the language of hyperbole; it is to speak in the sober language of fact. From the beginning of Christianity until now its victories have astounded the believer, and baffled the unbeliever, illustrating to our poor, weak faith the truth of Scripture that God's ways are not our ways. Our way of conquering the world would be to recruit an army, to scour the sea in ships built to destroy all who oppose; to sodden the earth with blood; but that was not Christ's way. Without any of these powers at his command, he announced a program, inspired his faithful followers, and sent them out empty-handed to win the world for Himself. From an empty grave which was not even his, to universal dominion, is a long way, but that is the way Christ chose to go; it seemed like leaping the centuries, but the leap was taken. The unexpected occurred every day; the unlearned met the philosopher and won him; the man of the village met the cosmopolitan and won him; the man of no school caught first the ear and then the soul of the school and won it; the fisherman won the emperor. The worship of the sand-pits grew into the worship of the cathedral; the fear of the authorities who were pagan fell away before the pagan's fear of God. The old order was abandoned, the new ushered in. The history of the race took its beginnings anew, not from the Greek whose subtle brain could make even the marble seem to live, but from the Galilean whose transforming power could make the dead to live; not from the Roman with his all-conquering sword but from the Redeemer with his all-conquering love.

A Constructive Newspaper

THE HISTORY of the Disciples of Christ for the past dozen years makes almost startling disclosures as to the character and extent of the services rendered to the brotherhood by The Christian Century.

This newspaper has not been content merely to reflect and report the already existing sentiment of the brotherhood; it has striven to create sentiment, to organize opinion and to carry its constituency steadily forward to better things. This progressive policy has made it a positive constructive force. No unsympathetic or destructive note has been sounded. Wanton criticism has found no place in its pages. Loyalty to the fundamental principles of the Disciples has been its basic virtue. Its championship of every progressive measure has been and is in the interest of greater efficiency or greater loyalty to our essential ideals. These statements the record of recent years will bear out.

Every forward step of general significance taken by the Disciples in a dozen years has been first pointed out and earnestly championed by this newspaper. The Christian Century has been truly the "leading paper" in that it has really led the brotherhood's thought and blazed a pathway for the brotherhood's progress.

1. The reorganization of our national conventions upon a delegate basis was first suggested by this paper and has been consistently championed against both opposition and indifference until the Louisville convention of 1912 put the suggestion into action.

2. The unification of our missionary societies was first proposed by The Christian Century. The entire sentiment of the brotherhood and of the societies themselves has radically changed since the initial proposal and this important and far-reaching step will without doubt be taken when the new General Convention is firmly established.

3. The Disciples Congress, one of the most useful and fruitful institutions among us, was proposed by The Christian Century and has received the consistent and unremitting support of this paper since its organization.

4. The idea of public ownership of our publication interests was first formulated and urged by The Christian Century. The idea was advocated on principle, with no forethought as to the private interests of the stockholders, and without the slightest probability of commercial gain.

5. The cause of Federation was first brought to the attention of the Disciples by The Christian Century and urged upon the brotherhood as a duty and opportunity of elemental importance. Early in the discussion the cause enlisted the valiant championship of one additional newspaper, and is now approved by all the leaders of the brotherhood.

6. The cause of higher education of the Disciples ministry found its first urgent voice in The Christian Century, and, to this day, its only persistent and positive champion. Whereas a dozen years ago there were hardly more than a score of ministers of university training in our pulpits there are now probably 500. By all of these men The Christian Century is regarded as the Disciples' chief influence for an adequately equipped Christian ministry.

7. The Graded Lesson idea and the Graded Lessons themselves were first introduced to the Disciples by The Christian Century. For years before the International Sunday-school Committee provided a graded series The Christian Century alone conducted a campaign of education in the interest of the graded lesson ideal. This campaign was conducted against the inertia if not the opposition of other Disciple publishing houses. When the graded series was finally announced, in 1909, The New Christian Century company promptly provided the Bethany Graded Lessons for Disciples Sunday-schools. This house was the pioneer and is yet the leader in this great reform of the curriculum of religious education.

8. The Christian Century has been unique among Disciples and almost unique in the entire field of religious journalism by its explicit and unveiled championship of modern scholarship, both as to its methods and its assured results. The devotion of this paper to scholarly ideals in fields of Biblical study, history, social science and the psychology of religion was for many years a costly and embarrassing policy. Today we are witnessing a complete change in the attitude of the Disciples communion toward the university. The people and the ministry are fast losing their fear of scholarship and their alarm at its possible effect upon religion, and are coming to see that science and religion must go together as hand-maidens of the God of truth. This sympathy of The Christian Century with the intellectual struggles of men has been one of the most pronounced of its many services to the cause of Christian progress.

9. The Christian Century has been a lonely pioneer in the reform of our Evangelism. This reform is now being demanded by churches and church leaders of all schools of thought. Four years ago a systematic analysis of revivalistic procedure was undertaken by this paper. It dealt kindly but thoroughly with what we plainly saw to be a gross perversion of the Christian propaganda. For that service at that time The Christian Century received many angry replies, some grateful words of appreciation and not a little worldly-wise advice from those who saw what such a policy was bound to cost the paper. Today, however, the position of this paper is being adopted by thoughtful churchmen everywhere. A symposium and editorial treatment of evangelism recently appearing in the Disciple newspaper farthest removed from us in thought and policy reads as if it were taken bodily from the pages of The Christian Century. It is believed that our third national contemporary will eventually discover the existence of this new sentiment in the brotherhood and espouse the reform in time to have a part in its consummation.

10. The Christian Century has been the trumpeter of the social note among the Disciples. While other newspapers were treating of Christian work in terms of the growth of our churches and the extension of our "denominational" organizations, this paper raised the question concerning the service being rendered by the Disciples to the Kingdom of God that is everywhere coming in the social life of mankind. Not alone by the establishment of a Social Survey department edited by an expert in social science, but by the spirit and temper which has pervaded the entire paper, this social note has been sounded until its echoes are at last being caught up by other newspapers and the social point of view is adopted almost without exception by convention speakers, missionary leaders and pastors in their local pulpits. In the possession of the social gospel the mere details of technical correctness upon which Disciple teachers have in past years dwelt with great vehemence, are falling out of consciousness, while our essential and historic mission in behalf of Christian union is taking on greatly enhanced significance.

11. The Christian Century has done more than any single agency in the past decade to free the Disciples from a harsh and unspiritual system of legalistic thought which threatened to make of them just another sect, narrower than some sects, and totally ineffective in influencing the Christian world for Christian unity. In this we have stood absolutely alone amongst Disciple newspapers. Other newspapers have declaimed against the name legalism while naively advocating the legalistic thing. The backbone of the legalistic system, so far as the Disciples are concerned, is the doctrine that immersion is a command of Christ, a condition of salvation and an ordained means of induction into the Church of Christ. For the first time in the history of Disciple journalism The Christian Century has frankly and plainly opposed this dogma. Our position has been taken carefully and discriminatingly, not wantonly. We have clung both to the Disciples theory that baptism is a command of Christ and a factor in salvation, and to the Disciples' practice of administering baptism invariably by immersion in water; but we have declared plainly that immersion is not baptism, that baptism is not a physical act, but the spiritual act of accepting membership in the Church of Christ, an act which, though it can not be consummated without some physical sign, must not be regarded as identical with it. This sign, we have urged, for good reasons, but not by virtue of a divine command, should be immersion. The growing acceptance of this point of view with respect to baptism is fast emancipating our readers from the whole legalistic system with which certain teachers of the past indoctrinated us, and is making the Disciples what by their origin and ideals they were intended to be—the freest, most progresive, most catholic-minded people in Christendom. As yet The Christian Century is the only newspaper voicing this reform in our message.

12. Closely allied to this reform in the Disciples' message The Christian Century stands alone among our journals in the reform of our practice with respect to other Christian people. This paper contends that the essential mission of the Disciples is to practice Christian unity here and now, and to plead with others to practice it. A congregation of Disciples that refuses to receive into its full fellowship any person whom Christ has already received into his Church, is not practicing Christian unity but practicing sectarianism. This The Christian Century declares plainly and unequivocally. We plead with our brethren who, in the spirit of unity, have abandoned sectarian names, sectarian communion, sectarian creeds, sectarian polities, sectarian forms of baptism, to abandon also sectarian barriers to fellowship and heartily to receive into their churches any member of the Church of Christ whether he was baptized by immersion or by some other form. The propaganda for this reform is only just begun, but it is fast gripping the intelligence and conscience of the leaders of the brotherhood. As yet The Christian Century stands alone among newspapers as its advocate.

These twelve outstanding reforms of which The Christian Century has been the pioneer and prophet afford foundation enough for the appeal the paper now makes for an adequate financial support. What has been done in past years has been done within financial limits so cramped as to leave a humiliating, albeit a heroic, memory. Most of the editorial service has been a sheer work of love, with not all of love's compensations. The business management has been so curtailed by the lack of capital that no aggressive policy of enlargement dared be ventured upon. Only a policy of economy, unimaginable in almost any other newspaper office, has enabled the paper to live and to bear its testimony.

Has not the time come for discerning and generous Disciple laymen and women to consecrate a portion of their means to the firm establishment of this paper whose courage and insight have made it the spokesman of their best ideals?

Alienating Our Natural Defenders

The utter impossibility of persuading reasonable Christian leaders that the Disciples are sincere in their Christian union talk while we continue to debar acknowledged members of the Church of Christ from our fellowship is again illustrated in an editorial in the usually sympathetic and tolerant New York Independent. That paper's impatience with the Disciples' endeavor to occupy unsectarian ground while their basis of membership is confessedly so much narrower than the basis of membership in Christ's Church blinds its editor to the true spirit in which the Disciples hold the name "Christian." The Independent reviews the controversy raised by the "Christian Connection" over the use by the Disciples of the name "Christian" and seems to approve the older and smaller body in its claim to have a sort of patent on Christ's name.

That the Independent could take the side of those who make so absurd a claim would be past all comprehension were it not for the fact that the contradiction between the Disciples' talk and the Disciples' practice is so glaring as to be galling to our usually reasonable contemporary. Referring to the Disciples, it says:

> They are as much a denomination as any in the United States, and draw as close lines of inclusion and exclusion. Every one else knows they are a denomination, even if they do not know it. The best solution would be for the Christian Connection to unite with the Disciples, if they are not yet ready to unite with the Congregationalists, as they were two or three decades ago invited to. The name of Christian is not one to quarrel over. The distinctive tenets of the Disciples of Christ are (1) that they are not a sect, and (2) that unimmersed persons must not be received. The two are self contradicting. They refuse to receive other Christians because not immersed. That is the essence of sectarianism and makes them a denomination, and as such they have no right to take another denomination's name.

The logic of the above quotation is indisputable. But the Independent must know how misleading its words are in which it sets down "the distinctive tenets" of the Disciples. What is there distinctive about refusing membership to unimmersed Christians? That is a Baptist practice and is not distinctive nor original with the Disciples. The fact is that it is a survival of the days when the Disciples tried to be good Baptists and failed! So far from being a Disciple tenet it is a blunt contradiction of Disciple tenets.

If the early Disciples in their fear of creating another sect had not cast in their lot with the Baptists they would from the beginning have felt the incogruity between such a sectarian procedure and their essential ideals. They are feeling it today, and the duty to bring their practice into accord with their ideal of Christian unity is becoming a matter of conscience with a great number. As an instance in point there lies before us a copy of a communication from an Ohio layman, an elder in a Disciples church and a business man of leadership in his community. His communication was sent to another newspaper in reply to an editorial which attempted to justify the present practice of the Disciples. He says:

> The question at issue has become a matter of conscience with the writer. We have regularly worshipping with us two ladies, one a member of the Presbyterian church, the other a Methodist. No doubt the large reason why they worship with us is the fact that their denominations are not represented in our village. The former is and has been for years a most consistent teacher in our Sunday-school. Both of them commune with us regularly and help in the support of our preacher and all other church expenses. The only difference between them and the rest of us is apparently the fact that our names are on our church record and theirs are not.
> The question comes to me with great force, are they Christians without baptism, or is their "sprinkling" to be accounted to them as baptism? In the fellowship we are enjoying with these estimable people is included the partaking together of the Lord's Supper. This, we understand, is only in line with the general attitude and practice of our people almost uniformly. This ordinance, we understand, is for Christians.
> My purpose in this letter is not an argumentative one. I am not expecting any reply thereto. It is simply and solely to give vent to my feelings and experience because it is becoming more and more a matter of conscience with me, having in consideration a proper regard for the spread of the kingdom and the large advent of the mind and purposes of our Saviour.

Here is a loyal and intelligent Disciple who feels deeply the absurd inhibition which prevents the congregation to which he belongs from acknowledging formally what every member in it acknowledges personally, namely, that these ladies are Christians, members of the Church of Christ.

If laymen see this contradiction is it any wonder that it bulks so large in the Independent's eye as to blind that excellent paper to the Disciples real principles, and to actuate it in taking sides with the Christian Connection even in the arrogant claim of that tiny sect to have an exclusive right to the use of the name that belongs to the whole Church of God?

By everything reasonable and tolerant the Independent might have been expected to roundly condemn this effrontery of the Christian Connection.

But it could hardly do so without putting itself on the side of the Disciples whose arrogance seemed greater by so much as their body is larger and more aggressive. It is thus that the Disciples' sectarian practice alienates those who most naturally should champion their essential ideals.

Fads in Education

We have come a far cry from the simplicity of the old-time district school. Grammar is taught without rules; arithmetic is learned, or is supposed to be, out of books constructed like a merry-go-round, and very nearly everything is accomplished that is accomplished by means of something else. All this may be as it should be, and in addition it is probably quite well that sloyd, gymnastics, carpentry, domestic science and a vast amount of knowledge on all subjects in the earth beneath and the waters under the earth should be provided for young children. Now and then the tax-payer rises in indignant protest against the over-burdening of the curriculum with fads. Just at present in Chicago there is a vociferous demand for the restoration of the three R's to their historic pedestal of the graces, and a corresponding denunciation of fads, but who knows what branches of study ought really to be considered fads? Herbert Spencer, for instance, has pointed out that any intelligent person coming to us from another planet would be amused to discover that the schools of the whole earth apparently assume the everlasting celibacy of the population of the globe. The great fact of the family which lies as the background of the experience of normal childhood and lies before young people of both sexes in confident hope, and which colors every story and romance of youth, is systematically ignored in all the education system of the common schools of the world. Would it be a fad to seek to prepare young people, through schools maintained at public expense, for life as they are to know it and live it? What are fads anyway?

Letting Loose the Canaries

The day before Christmas a stranger walked into one of the bird stores of Chicago, having first spent some time looking at the songsters through the window-glass. He enquired the cost of the birds and learning that they were sold at $3 apiece, paid $9, all his money, for three. These three he took to the door of the shop and, opening the cages, set them free "shooing" them out of the wicker baskets in which they had been housed. When asked for an explanation of his conduct he replied, "I have spent the past 15 years in one of those things myself," pointing to the cages, "and I will not see a living creature confined in one if I have power to release it."

Which accords closely with American ideas of "liberty" but runs seriously counter to common sense.

The birds which this "Jean Valjean" released that day before Christmas were doubtless dead within six hours, perhaps within two hours, for they had, while prisoners, been fed and housed and kept in comfort and safety from all enemies. So they might have remained to reach a bird's old age, filling their homes with melody. To them "liberty" meant inevitable death.

We know certain parents and some school teachers who are so enamored of a child's "liberty" that they are insensible to the dangers of unintelligent liberty, and instead of surrounding the boys and girls entrusted to their care with safeguards and the accompanying provisions for a long life and a happy one, they turn them loose amid the world's wintry environment, where a moral death surely, too surely, awaits them. The restrictions of morality may not be to our taste but the freedom of sin leads to the gates of death, which gates close upon the soul with a restraint more severe and never relaxed.

—A sumptuous special edition of the Christian Evangelist reminds its readers impressively that it has lived fifty good and useful years, that it is proud of its past and so far from being burdened with age it faces the future with gladness and resolution. We rejoice with our contemporary for all the good things which its friends spread upon its pages last week. Without question Dr. Garrison and his paper have been the most signal feature of Disciples history in the half century just closing, and not the least grateful fact in the present celebration is the continued and active presence of this editorial Captain whose hand took the ship's wheel in the early years of its first decade and has guided its course until now. The Christian Century from its modest background of thirty years rejoices to give the center of the stage to its very sincerely esteemed co-worker, and to add its bouquet and applause to the many tokens of appreciation the St. Louis paper and its staff of editors are now receiving.

—In a recent address in Chicago, Rabbi Hirsch, one of our good neighbors and an eminent citizen, said, if the papers rightly report him, that "there was nothing in the teaching of Jesus which the rabbis of his own nation had not said before him." Which suggests the enquiry why these teachings acquired through Jesus a potency which they had always before lacked. Some reporters once said to Sam Jones, "Now, Jones, you ought to be good to us fellows. We made you, you know." To which the witty "Sam" replied, "'You made me?" "Of course we did," was the retort of the penpushers. "Then go and make another," said Jones. If the rabbis of Jerusalem "made" Jesus it is time they made another. If all that was vital and essential and redemptive in the Gospel was already in the Old Testament, why does Judaism stand still and Christianity go on winning the world? The rabbi seems to us to raise more problems than he solves.

—Captain W. H. Van Schaick, who commanded the General Slocum when that unfortunate vessel was burned in the East River, New York in 1904 resulting in the loss of 1,030 lives, was made happy on Christmas day by a pardon. Capt. Van Schaick in 1906 was convicted and sentenced to ten years' imprisonment for criminal negligence for failure to have sufficient life saving and fire equipment aboard his vessel. He had served five years when paroled last February. Two hundred and fifty thousand people signed the petition to President Taft asking for his pardon. Two previous attempts to obtain a pardon for him failed.

—Admiral Dewey, hale and hearty, celebrated his seventy-fifth birthday, Dec. 26, and told his friends how to remain young. The most famous of living American naval officers has been treated generously in Washington by the hand of time during the last ten years. His physical condition is said to be almost as good as it was the day he sailed into Manila Bay and destroyed a Spanish fleet. Admiral Dewey was born in Montpelier, Vt., and was graduated from the Neval academy in 1859. In the civil war he was in command of a ship under Admiral Farragut when New Orleans was captured. His record was brilliant before the Spanish-American war.

—It is announced that George W. Perkins will retire from the executive committee of the United States Steel Corporation and it is strongly intimated that another leader, who has been conspicuously active in speculation, also will be retired shortly. J. P. Morgan, it is understood, has been strongly opposed to the Stock Exchange operations of certain members of the executive committee. It has long been a story in "Wall street" that Mr. Perkins was forced to retire from the firm of J. P. Morgan & Co. because of his operations in the stock market.

—Kansas nearly lost a United States senator elect last week. Playing Santa Claus for a houseful of children at home almost resulted fatally for William H. Thompson, United States Senator-elect. He is suffering from burns on his hands and singed hair and eyebrows. While bestowing presents Senator Thompson's clothing caught fire from candles on the tree. The Senator, however, quickly threw himself to the floor, wrapped himself in a rug and smothered the flames.

—There are 78,000 children in New York with bad eyes according to the report of a specialist to the board of education. He estimated that 80 per cent of these cases of defective vision were absolutely inexcusable. In some of the cases which he personally investigated he said he found children wearing glasses which were twenty sizes wrong, as the result of which their vision was only about 20 per cent. He recommended that the responsibility of examining all children for mental, moral and physical defects be vested solely in the department of education instead of being divided, as at present, with the department of health.

—Yale has the banner society of socialism, according to reports made to the annual convention of the Intercollegiate Socialist society. The annual report states that twenty undergraduate and two graduate chapters were added to the society this year. The undergraduate chapters have increased from thirty-eight to fifty-nine in four years.

—In the State of Utah the Presbyterians have 1,800 members and property valued at $475,000: the Methodists, 1,500 members and property valued at $215,000; Episcopalians, 1,300 members and $625,000 in property; the Baptists, 1,085 members and $140,000 in property.

William Durban

Preacher, Writer, Linguist and Man of God

By Leslie W. Morgan

On Saturday morning, December 7, 1912, there passed away a unique and most versatile character in the person of William Durban. It is no easy task at this early day to set down the elements which went to make up his personality. To record the facts of his life as regards dates, seasons, and outward relationships is comparatively easy, but to record simply these would not be regarded as a suitable record by either writer or reader. The facts, however, may be used as the framework of a biography that will be of interest to many readers.

Of Huguenot Ancestry.

William Durban was born on May 6, 1841, at Paddington and passed away at his home, 11 Wellmeadow Road, Catford, S. E., at the age of seventy-one. His ancestors were Huguenots who settled in England. His early boyhood was spent at Seaton-Carew, Yorkshire. Later he removed with his father's family to Blackheath, where his father was a school master and organist at Holy Trinity and later at St. Johns. The son inherited his father's musical talent and was himself for a time organist of the Parish Church at Sidcup, undertaking the long walk between Blackheath and Sidcup each Sunday. During this period he was led to seek orders in the Established Church, but finding it impossible to fall in with the practice of the church in regard to baptism, he sought the advice and instruction of the late Chas. H. Spurgeon. This led to his being invited, as still quite a youth, to undertake the Professorship of Languages at Pastors' College, a position which he held for perhaps two years. At the same time he devoted himself to the study of Free Church history and doctrine. Previous to this time, at the age of about twenty, he had received the degree of Bachelor of Arts from London University, and at about the same time had preached his first sermon at the Ragged School in Bridge Street, Greenwich, the text of the sermon being, "The first shall be last and the last first."

Assistant to Mr. Spurgeon.

During his connection with Pastors' College he rendered great assistance to Mr. Spurgeon in the preparation of the "Treasury of David," which service Mr. Spurgeon gratefully acknowledges in the preface. The influence of Miss Mary Lang, who afterwards became his wife, had not a little to do with Mr. Durban's change of religious convictions and relationships. During the time of his hesitation she had taken him to see a baptismal service by which he was greatly impressed. Mr. Durban often quoted a leading commentator as describing a baptismal service as "that beautiful ordinance of immersion." Soon after his marriage in 1866 he took up the pastorate of the Baptist Church in Newport, Isle of Wight, where he continued with great acceptance for a period of four years, and where several life friendships were formed, including a very close friendship with Albert Midlane, author of the well known hymn, "There's a Friend for Little Children," and it was due largely to Mr. Durban's suggestion that a fund was raised a few years ago to purchase an annuity for the comfort of Mr. Midlane's declining years. Another warm friendship was that with the late E. J. Upwood, Esq., of Sandown, with whom Mr. Durban traveled much on the Continent and elsewhere.

At the urgent invitation of Mr. Spurgeon and Dr. Hugh Stowell Brown, and of the Cheshire Baptist Association, Mr. Durban left the Isle of Wight and undertook the organization of a new Baptist church in the cathedral city of Chester. This was in 1871. He travelled for some time up and down the country raising funds for the erection of a church building, and eventually succeeded in collecting a sufficient amount in that way, and locally, to meet the entire cost of the building before it was opened for worship. This church is one of the chief monuments to his memory, and Chester, where he continued in the Baptist pastorate for twelve years, even afterwards occupied a very warm place in his heart. Strangely enough it was at the Church of Christ, Chester, that he preached immediately preceding his last illness, and it was while visiting at Chester, immediately upon their return from America, and before they had reached their London home, that Mrs. Durban was taken ill and died four and a half years ago.

Influenced by W. T. Moore.

Upon leaving Chester in 1883 Mr. Durban removed with his family to London where he undertook the secretaryship of the "Monthly Tract Society," a society which had for its purpose the distribution of tracts among the better educated classes. Through the influence of Dr. W. T. Moore, who had a short time before, with the late Mr. Henry Varley, and by the encouragement of Mr. Timothy Coop, started the "Christian Commonwealth," Mr. Durban became associated with Dr. Moore in the editorship. He continued in this capacity for more than twenty years, indeed until the paper passed out of the hands of those interested in the work of the Disciples of Christ. It was before Mr. Durban left Chester that he had come into touch, however, with the work of the Disciples, through the preaching of M. D. Todd, the father of E. M. Todd. Mr. Todd had come to Chester to hold evangelistic services at the public hall and soon gathered together a large number of hearers. When he came to declare himself on the subject of baptism great opposition was aroused, including that of some who had previously followed his preaching with great interest and appreciation.

Comradeship With M. D. Todd.

The Baptist cause itself was young in Chester and naturally Mr. Durban had great sympathy with Mr. Todd in the opposition which had been aroused, as he himself had experienced something of the same. He promptly placed himself by Mr. Todd's side and a comradeship sprang up which resulted, by the addition of other influences above mentioned, in Mr. Durban eventually associating himself with the churches of Christ. Mr. Durban first served the church which at the time was meeting at Mornington Crescent, Kentish Town, N. W., and afterwards founded the Church of Christ, Fulham, S. W., which he served for seven or eight years. It was during his pastorate that their present church building was erected in 1887. Upon the death of Dr. J. W. Kirton, author of "Buy Your Own Cherries," who had a year previously started a mission work in Wightman Road, Hornsey, N. Mr. Durban undertook the pastorate at the earnest request of Dr. Kirton upon his death-bed. There was no organization at Hornsey when he began as pastor and it was no easy task to turn the mission into a church and to harmonize a collection of individuals, gathered together from many denominations, and to bring them to see the desirability of forming a church after the New Testament pattern. This pastorate was continued for ten years, being brought to a close in 1902.

Conducts a Correspondence College.

In that year Mr. Durban held services in his own house. This continued for a year or more until it seemed unlikely that a permanent work could be established in the district. For a number of years a Correspondence College, under the name of Garfield College, was conducted, and a number of young men and young women were inspired with a desire, through the correspondence work undertaken, to seek further training for ministerial or mission work. During this period of ten years Mr. Durban had been in the employ of the Christian Association, receiving a nominal grant from year to year for supply preaching in various churches, for editorial work, and for the correspondence work above mentioned. This connection was affirmed for the year 1913 by the Executive meeting at Southport on the day preceding his death. During this period valuable service was rendered by Mr. Durban at Margate, at West London Tabernacle, at Fulham, Hornsey and Southfields, and in frequent visits to various provincial churches.

President of Christian Association.

Mr. Durban was president of the Christian Association no less than ten times, eight times in succession, from 1894 to 1901, the other years being in 1886 and in 1907 He was also secretary of the association for a period of five or six years preceding the year 1891. His presidential addresses always dealt with great subjects and they were treated in a comprehensive and thoroughgoing manner, at great length and with great thoroughness; indeed the length was such that this probably had more to do with the fact that he was not continued in the presidential chair indefinitely than any other one cause. It was difficult for him to conclude when he undertook the discussion of a great theme. The addresses, however, were carefully prepared and written out word for word, and most of them are preserved in print in the records of the association.

It is at this point that it may be well to turn aside from the narrative of facts and events to attempt a word or two of interpretation.

A Unique Personality.

Mr. Durban was not a leader, he was not a born general—to act as a bishop was not his forte. For his own sake, and possibly for the sake of the Kingdom of God at large, his connection with a new and undeveloped movement, with its place in the religious life of a nation to be made was not fortunate. The cause itself would have suffered loss in various respects. Local churches would have received teaching less profound and would have been denied contact with a great soul, but there are conceivable relationships which might have been formed where one with such a mind and such a unique character and peculiarly versatile accomplishments, would have told more effectually in the furtherance of the world's work. He was at his best when under the influence of a guiding hand. He could not originate, but he could execute, with great skill, work outlined for him by another. Such work as he did for Mr. Spurgeon in his early manhood was work for which he was peculiarly fitted. Such work as he undertook at Chester under the patronage of the leading men of the Baptist denomination, and under the direction of a strong association of churches, was carried out by him with great faithfulness and skill. To preside over an Executive meeting and to be called upon to outline a policy neither appealed to his ambition, nor fitted his metal equipment. While presiding over Executive meetings he sometimes thought out, or even wrote, articles for the next number of some magazine, while his colleagues wrestled with some knotty problems.

Better Leader Writer Than Editor.

As a literary man he was a better leader-writer than he was an editor. He could produce copy without limit, but to call forth productions from the pens of others and to harmonize and balance the contents of succeeding issues of a serial publication was an undertaking which was for him a laborious task and a waste of valuable time. He could write on any conceivable subject, usually with great acceptance and was always ready and able to discuss almost any topic introduced in private conversation. If he knew nothing of the subject he perhaps did not say so, but a careful observer would readily note that by a few leading questions he would soon get possession of all that his companion knew and would then be prepared to link this up with facts and truths of a kindred kind, of which he was already possessed, so as to be soon again leading the conversation, or perhaps sitting down at his desk to write an article on the selfsame theme.

Varied Literary Contributions.

His literary contributions were many and varied, contributing at different times to such papers and magazines as—"Great Thoughts, "Pall Mall Gazette," "The Christian Endeavor Times," "Christian Herald," "Contemporary Review," "The Christian Evangelist," "The Outlook," "Children's Encyclopaedia," "The Self Educator," "The World's Great Books," "The Homiletic Review," etc., etc. Of the last named publication he acted as European editor for the last several years of his life, and an article appeared from his pen so recently as September last.

As a linguist he excelled. He could read and speak ten or eleven languages, and could read three or four others. He was very fond of travel and he travelled extensively on the Continent, including Switzerland, France, Italy and in Greece, Turkey and Russia, and had paid several visits to the United States, staying for several months at a time with his daughter, Mrs. Hudson Maxim, in New York. He talked much of Russia, and wrote with acceptance on many phases of the Russian problem. He was a great admirer of America and of the American people.

Skilled as an Interviewer.

As an interviewer he excelled because of his ability to quickly gather not only the facts from the lives of those with whom he conversed, but also to catch their point of view and extract from them what they knew of any given topic. He was not, however, what one would consider a great reader of character, nor would it be wise for one to trust wholly to his judgment as to the qualifications or virtues of men. He was inclined to judge too generously and jump at conclusions on insufficient evidence, at least when it had to do with alleged points of strength or virtue.

Sensitive Feelings.

He was seldom betrayed into speaking a harsh word, but he was capable of being wounded very deeply, and when this occurred there was evidence of intense pain being experienced. At such times one sometimes saw in him that which is often manifested by others with feelings less capable of being hurt and with hearts not so susceptible to receive a wound.

He was a keen observer, although to every outward appearance taken up with mental abstraction. He missed but little within his range of vision or hearing. He could merely glance at the pages of a book and tell you more of its contents than another could from a careful reading. He could write rapidly and carry on a conversation at the same time. He would appear not to know what he was eating or how much at a friend's table, and to see nothing of the things within which the food was contained or served, but afterwards would speak in appreciation of the articles of diet, or the form or nature of the table service.

Home-life of Great Kindliness.

His home life overflowed with kindliness and with acts and expressions of affection. He would kiss his four daughters in turn as he met them in different parts of the house throughout the day, and would assure each that she was his favorite daughter. This was not due to insincerity, but to an overflowing affection. The same was probably true in his relationship with his friends, his too flattering words not being due to insincerity, but to a natural desire to describe in the most glowing terms any virtues he conceived them to possess. This natural desire he made no effort to curb. He never talked of himself, of his affairs or of his doings. Upon his wife he was most dependent and after her death he seemed a broken reed until gradually he became accustomed to lean upon the daughters still left in his home, who often called him "our baby." Seeing him out with one of them must often have called forth the innocently amusing comment, with its well understood implication, "An old man and his darling."

Mrs. Durban's Yes and No.

Mrs. Durban was an ideal companion to him, considering his traits. She was a born general and had much to do with organizing his movements. Her, "No, William," was law to him and her "yes" was a trumpet call. A personal incident illustrating this may be related: Mr. and Mrs. Durban were being entertained at "Bridgefield," Southampton, he arriving a day before his wife. At tea and again at supper he ate heartily of everything that was offered him including several things which he had been denied for years, and he spoke of his delight, saying with his peculiar lisp, that they were "delicious." When Mrs. Durban arrived the next day, his indicated willingness to accept some of the selfsame articles of diet was met with his wife's, "Why William, certainly not!" Mrs. Durban was fond of telling how he returned home after receiving his first month's salary, as a young minister, with his arms laden with books. When she expressed her surprise, he said he had bought them with the proceeds of only one month's salary! "But, what are we to live upon?", she exclaimed, and then he humbly confessed that he had not thought of that. In relating the incident she incidently remarked that thereafter she alway met him on his pay day.

His Absent-mindedness.

It was no uncommon thing when he was detained in the city, at perhaps an Executive meeting of the Christian Association, beyond the time of a meal more than he had been expected, he had to ask a friend for the loan of a shilling, his wife afterwards explaining, more frankly than he was willing to do, that his train fare and sufficient money for a single meal was the highest sum with which he could be trusted, if some wayside bookshop was not to beguile him. Once when the family was moving from one house to another in the same neighborhood he was intrusted with the key of the new house and sent on ahead to unlock the door for the reception of the furniture, but when the furniture arrived the bearer of the key was nowhere to be found. Eventually he was discovered in a second-hand bookshop, having quite forgotten that it was moving day.

Happy as a Preacher.

He was always happy when he was preaching. This was the work he evidently loved best. He was always able to speak without effort, but like most preachers spoke best when he had opportunity for careful preparation. His addresses were written out in full and read. His sermons were delivered from brief notes scribbled on a half sheet of paper or perhaps on an envelope, or frequently in the margin of the pulpit Bible. He had a slight impediment in his speech which made it difficult for strangers to always understand all his words, especially if they sat at some distance from the pulpit.

He was conservative in his theological outlook, and although he accepted many of the conclusions of modern critics he was fond of taking the conservative side wherever possible, and hailed with delight every confirmation of old truths reënforced by modern discoveries. In this respect his service to a people such as ours, inclined as our churches are to be conservative, was not perhaps wholly to the best interests of the truth. On account of his naturally conservative makeup he was not inclined to admit to his brethren that he accepted as many of the modern conclusions as he did in reality. Only a few weeks before his last illness he was asked by a friend whether he did not think it would be better to occasionally emphasize some of the evident truths which have been brought out by modern criticism. With his accustomed graciousness he admitted the desirability of such a course, but opportunity did not offer itself for him to prove the genuineness of his assent.

The Final Rites.

This altogether inadequate sketch must be brought to a conclusion. With a brief service at the Wesleyan Church, conducted by the minister, the Rev. E. Weaver, and participated in by E. Brearley and L. W. Morgan, occupants of two of his former pulpits, he was laid to rest by the side of his wife in Hither Green Cemetery. T. S. Buckingham. pastor of our church at Southampton and an old friend, assisted in the service at the grave, and among other friends present were E. H. Spring of Gloucester, president of the Christian Association, and Mrs. Spring; W. H. Cant and E. L. Green, deacons of the church at Hornsey during his time and up to the present; H. Stafford, Southfields, and others. There were nearly three dozen floral tributes. Letters of appreciation of his life and ministry have reached the family from many quarters.

Asked for information concerning the more inward life of the deceased, a member of the family writes: "It is not easy to write of this, for he was not an ordinary man, but a saint." Withal it may certainly be said, "He was a good man and full of the Holy Spirit."

A Romance of Corn Shucks

And the Lost Cause

By Edgar White

"One reads a whole lot about champion corn shuckers or huskers in Missouri, Illinois and Kansas these days, and to one who has never enjoyed the experience of going down the long golden rows of a frosty morning it might seem a queer sort of sport," remarked M. H. Moore, presiding elder of the M. E. Church South, who lives at Macon. "But in my boyhood days, in North Carolina, cornshucking by the darkies was the big event of the year. It took the place of base and football and other sports so interesting to the youth of today.

"I attended a great many of these shucking bees, but one that occurred just before the war stands out in my memory because of the pretty little romance connected with it.

"At our house was a sweet-faced young woman, a Miss Martha Ray, who had come from the North to act as governess for the children of the family. We all loved her because of her gentle and pleasant ways, and the darkies would do anything for her. She never offered any criticisms on 'human slavery,' but took conditions as she found them and made the best of them.

"Adjoining our plantation was that of Cousin John Alston, who lived in the old mansion with his widowed mother and managed the estate. 'Cousin Jack' was my ideal of a man—a splendid horseman, a fine shot with pistol or rifle and an all 'round good fellow. He was handsome, too—dark-eyed, swarthy and every inch a soldier.

"He came to our house pretty often, but it never occurred to me that he entertained anything more than cousinly interest towards any member of our family until the night of the big doings.

"Of course when the frost began to tinge the leaves all the darkies began to talk cornshucking, and it came to Miss Martha's ears. She had never witnessed such a function, and one evening when Cousin Jack was there she remarked that she would like to see how the darkies acted.

"Next thing I knew Tennessee Jerry—Cousin Jack's overman—had issued a formal challenge to Big Jim, our man, to shuck corn against him. The defy was accepted with high-sounding words, and the two clans began to marshal for the fray. Mary Ann, our cook, prepared a lot of 'possums and sweet potatoes and things for the banquet that was to follow the shucking.

"It was a bright moonlight night, with just enough frost to make everyone feel fresh and vigorous. Cousin John's darkies came down the lane like an army of invasion. Tennessee Jerry led the procession. Big Foot Jim shuffled along with his fiddle and Old Bob came picking away on his banjo. When the two sides met there was a great cackling like so many geese. They shook hands all around, then stripped off their coats and bared their great brawny arms.

"The white folks from the two houses were seated on chairs on a raised place to one side, as royalty are seated at the lists. Oil lamps were flaring from the posts in the barn. In the center was a pile of corn mountain-high. This the two sides were to work on, throwing the shucked ears into bins, one bin going to the credit of Jerry and his men and the other to our side. Around the edges, with glistening white eyes, stood the pickaninnies, intensely interested observers. Tennessee Jerry stalked over to the corn pile and swelled up like a turkey gobbler.

"'Wharsomever we goes,' says he, 'we lets de peoples know dat de Alston fambly's de fust fambly in de country, an' dat de Alston men am de cocks ob de walk. Who am heah wat dars deny it?'

"And he looked around like Napoleon might have done after the battle of Marengo.

"But all that big talk didn't phase our Jim—who steps up and says:

"'We has too much manners to boast ourselves over folkses as comes to our home, but if you, or any other set o' niggers tink yo' fambly is better den our fambly or dat yo' men is better den our men, heah am dis co'n pile, and dis am de place to make yo' boastin' good!'

"This brought forth mighty cheers from everybody, the white folks joining in heartily. The flag was dropped by Cousin John and the negroes got busy. The orchestra was started and under its inspiring influence the brawny black men worked like lightning. I noticed Miss Ray's face. It was lighted up with a keen enthusiasm, and from time to time she clapped her little white hands and addressed some words to her cavalier, always standing near.

"The negroes understood better than I did the nature of Cousin John's attention to the little governess and Tennessee Jerry started off on some little snatches of song which were not bold enough to be offensive, yet together with the sly glances which the darkies would cast from time to time at the young woman were sufficiently insinuating to convince her of their intended import. But she didn't take the hint, not even when they sang—

"'De big owl hoot en cry fer his mate,
Mah honey, mah love!
O doan stay long, O doan stay late,
Mah honey, mah love!
Hit ain't so mighty fur ter de Good-by Gate,
Mah honey, mah love!'

"Our Big Jim and his eager workers had started in with grim determination to win that corn shucking battle or die in the attempt, but as matters proceeded, and as Tennessee Jerry was giving all the songs a twist which carried a sly reference to the young master's wooing, I noticed a change come over them. Jerry and his men were identifying their contest at the corn shucking with Cousin John's suit for the little governess's hand. They grew bolder and bolder with their songs, notwithstanding Cousin John's frowns and the shaking of his head. One of their songs, all of which I cannot now recall, had this refrain:

"'John's a-w-a-i-t-i-n',
John's a-w-a-i-t-i-n'.'

"That was particularly effective. It left no room for doubt. Our darkies caught the spirit of the thing, and to my astonishment they were no longer trying to win. The way they looked at it was that the result would decide the fate of Cousin John's love affair, and if they wanted to see that terminate happily, the only thing to do, according to their way of looking at it, was to lay down and let Tennessee Jerry and his clansmen win out.

"So, entering fully into the campaign so adroitly introduced by Tennessee Jerry, Big Jim took up the significant air of the song and joined heartily in the refrain.

"Cousin John frowned and scowled and shook his head, because he supposed the thing would be embarrassing to his sweetheart. The negroes, however, possibly divined more closely than he did how she felt, and paid no attention to him, but kept on with their love songs.

"Jerry's men beat, beat us bad, but they were generous enough to not do any boasting of that fact. When the thing was over they ran to young John, four or five stalwart boys seized him and carried him around the big barn in triumph. Miss Ray stood laughing and clapping her hands as if it were the prize performance of the evening. There is no question on earth but what she enjoyed it hugely.

"Then came the guns of war. The laughing and the frolicking ceased; men and women went about with sad and thoughtful faces. Cousin John was among the first to offer his sword to the Confederacy. He and Miss Ray were married just before he left to join the army defending Richmond. Then she went to live with his widowed mother and to wait for her soldier. He came back once on a brief furlough, and I saw he had upon his shoulder the insigna of a colonel. That meant that he was in command of a regiment. He and the little governess walked arm-in-arm under the trees and talked and talked and talked of the better days that would come when the war was over. But the call came insistent, and Cousin John hurried back to fight for his cause. Next we heard there was a great battle. Men were slaughtered by the thousands and Cousin John was among them. He died as he had lived, a man through and through. He was leading his regiment against the Union Army, hat off, waving his sword and cheering his men. He fell shot all to pieces, and his body was brought home in his uniform.

"They had services in the little church, and then they took him up on the wooded hillside to the little cemetery. I remember it was a cloudy day and there were fitful gusts of wind. The little governess with her arm about her mother-in-law stood at the edge of the grave as the sexton threw the clods in. Tennessee Jerry, Sunshine Sam, Big Jim and one other colored boy stood bare-headed a little back from the small assembly. The minister raised his hand and I heard this old familiar song, the song of the corn-shucking days, come from the lips of the blackmen, soft and low:

"'De big owl hoot en cry fer his mate,
Mah honey, mah love!
O doan stay long, O doan stay late,
Mah honey, mah love!
Hit ain't so mighty fur ter de Good-by Gate,
Mah honey, mah love!'

"In their deep reverent voices there was no sacrilege in the words. It was the heart sob of the slave for the master he had loved, and to this day it stands out in my memory as one of the saddest, one of the most solemn and yet the sweetest songs I have ever listened to. Of course it was not the words: they were nothing, but at the time the cadence given to them by the faithful slaves sounded to me like the requiem of an angel choir.

"The little governess donned mourning and remained in the South. She became an angel of mercy in the hospitals and wherever her help could avail in the dark days when the Southern Cross was going down before the mighty onward sweep of the Northern bayonets. The cause and the people for whom her soldier had fought were her cause and her people, and she went about with the light of love in her eyes, doing what her hands found to do, intrepidly and devotedly. Bereft as she was she would not have exchanged the love in her heart and the hope of a meeting in the better land, for anything the world could offer. I saw her many times in those sad days, but she was always busy, always cheerful, always doing something worth while. It seemed to me that all the time she held a listening ear, as though someone whom I could not hear was speaking to her, and then she would smile as happily as children do when angels kiss them in their sleep."

MODERN WOMANHOOD

Conducted by Mrs. Ida Withers Harrison.

Mrs. Harrison will be glad to receive communications from any of her readers offering suggestions concerning woman's welfare, criticisms of articles or inquiries concerning any matters relevant to her department. She should be addressed directly at 530 Elm Tree Lane, Lexington, Ky.

AN OLD POEM FOR THE NEW YEAR

The Romans pictured their god Janus, who opened the gates of the New Year, with two faces—one looking forward, the other looking backward. I imagine that is the attitude of most of us at this time—a remembrance of days that are no more, and of thanksgiving for their blessings and deliverances, as well as a girding of loins, and lighting of lamps for the days that are to come. I suppose it was the retrospective mood of gratitude for the past year's mercies that made an old poem persistently haunt my mind this New Year's morning.

Its author, Robert Herrick, belonged to a group of poets who gave us gems of song that were all but the swan song of the lyric muse in England, until Robert Burns was to arouse her from her trance, more than a century later. Ben Jonson, though usually classed with the Elizabethan poets, was still living and writing when Charles I ascended the throne, and was the center and leader of this group—Herrick, Wither, Lovelace, Suckling, Waller, and others. One of the foremost critics of today, Edmund Gosse, compares our poetry to theirs, much to our discredit:

"In these restrained and careful times
Our knowledge petrifies our rhymes * * *
If we could dare to write as ill,
As those whose voices haunt us still
Even we, perchance might call our own
Their deep, enchanting undertone.

"We are too diffident and nice,
Too learned, and too over wise,
Too much afraid of faults, to be
The flutes of bold sincerity."

That was a happy time for lyric poetry; the men of those days had a passionate sense of the good things of earth, and at the same time a mystical sense of their insecurity—for they had the crowning grace of ill fortune and exile, which lent a wistful pathos even to their gayest flights. There is a freshness, a sincerity, a simplicity about their songs, as though they came from a full heart that must sing, even as the bird sings. Several of them were soldiers, without literary training, and yet now and then, as by sheer instinct, they break out into those perfect lines that are the very acme of expression. How characteristic of the times is this little stanza by the Marquis of Montrose!

"He either fears his fate too much,
Or his deserts are small,
Who dares not put it to the touch
To win, or lose it all."

And has anything more perfect ever been written than the verses of Lovelace's, "On Going to the Wars," in which occur these lines:

"I could not love thee, love, so much, Loved I not honor more."

Their wonderful felicity of language, their command of those lyrical measures, which seem so easy, and are so difficult, the plain humanity of their themes, their blending of classical frankness, of mediaeval simplicity and chivalry, and of modern reflection, make them stand almost alone in letters.

But it was not the love songs of soldiers that haunted me, but one of the poems of the very prince of these lyrical poets, Robert Herrick, that has been running in my mind all the morning. Herrick was neither soldier nor courtier, as so many of these gallant singers were—he was a plain preacher, but in song of many themes that were far from clerical. He wrote as one who relished this life heartily, while believing in another just as heartily. Unlike most of his contemporaries, he wrote much of nature—what is more exquisite than this little picture of evening!

"When shadows brood upon the hill,
And daylight draweth to a close,
When frogs pipe by the lowland rill,
Within the valley and dim repose;
When the small bird seeks her nest,
Swinging on the blossoming spray,
Only robin doth not rest,
Singing to the dying day.
Sweet robin, merry robin,
So I'd have my soul to be,
Singing clear, through the year,
Shadow of eternity."

His lines "To Daffodils," I have already quoted on this page, and shall probably quote again, for I love them dearly.

The poem which follows is his "Thanksgiving" to the Good Father for all his benefits—may every one of us have this devout frame of mind, as we enter upon our New Year!

THANKSGIVING.

Lord, Thou hast given me a cell
Wherein to dwell
A little home, whose humble roof
Is weather proof.
Under the spars of which I lie
Both soft and dry
Where Thou, my chamber for to ward
Hast set a guard
Of harmless thoughts, to watch and keep Me while I sleep—
Low is my porch as is my fate
Both void of state;
And yet, the threshold of my door
Is worn by the poor
Who hither come, and freely get Good words and meat.
Like as my parlor, so my hall
And kitchen small.
Some brittle sticks of thorns or briar
Make me a fire
Close by whose living coal I sit,
And glow like it.
Lord, I confess too, when I dine,
The pulse is thine,
And all those other bits that be
There placed by thee;
The worts, the purslam, and the mess
Of water cress,
Which of thy kindness thou hast sent:
And my content,
Makes those, and my beloved beet
To be more sweet—
Tis Thou that crown'st my glittering hearth
With guiltless mirth
And giv'st me wassail bowls to drink
Spiced to the brink:
Lord, tis thy plenty dropping hand
That sows my land;
All this, and better, dost thou send Me for this end:—
That I should render for my part
A thankful heart,
Which, fired with incense, I resign
As wholly thine;
But the acceptance—that must be
O Lord, by Thee.

The Decennial Convention of the Religious Education Association

The Decennial Convention of the Religious Education Association will be held in Cleveland, Ohio, March 10 to 13, 1913, discussing the general theme "Religious Education and Civic Progress." The progressive civic spirit of Cleveland makes this topic peculiarly appropriate. The program which is already almost completed provides for over thirty different meetings with over one hundred speakers.

The character of previous conventions of this association is sufficient assurance that the questions of the relation of religion and of education to social betterment and civic welfare will be discussed in a thoroughgoing and vital manner. Some of the topics coming under the general theme are:

"Social Training in the High Schools."

"Methods of Moral Training in the Elementary Schools."

"Possible Relations of Religious Instruction in the Public Schools."

"Voluntary and Curriculum Courses in the Bible in Colleges."

"Religious Training in Professional Schools."

"Community Programs for Christian Associations, Churches and Sunday-schools."

"Responsibility of the Church for Moral Training."

"Ethical Questions in the Pulpit."

"Sunday school and High School Students."

"Children and Church Worship."

"Education and Social Service."

"Religion in Social Settlements."

"Religious Education and the Y. M. C. A."

"The Sane Teaching of Eugenics and Sex Hygiene."

"Responsibility of the Church for Home Education."

"Making Citizens in the Home."

The unique feature of this convention will be the bringing together in joint sessions of the various departments of the association work in order that the problems of co-ordinating different agencies may be carefully studied.

M. L. Pontius of Central Church, Peoria, Ill., in a recent sermon contrasted the lives of Dwight L. Moody and Robert G. Ingersoll. He pointed out the fact that Moody devoted his whole life to the promotion of practical Christianity, that he had established schools, old people's homes and many other institutions of a worthy and commendable nature. Then he illustrated how Ingersoll had employed his extraordinary powers to the destruction of the Christian faith of many and to the removal of the spiritual support of the weak and aged.

Bayard Craig, pastor at Redlands, Cal., and his little grandson were somewhat seriously hurt in an automobile accident recently. Both are recovering nicely.

A plan for uniting the American Protestant churches Manila, P. I., was rejected by the Disciples congregation at a meeting called to consider the question. Our missionaries do not inform us what the provisions of the union were.

Burris A. Jenkins, pastor Linwood Boulevard Church, Kansas City, was compelled to be absent from his pulpit on a recent Sunday on account of the recurrence of an affection of the knee which was injured when he was a boy.

Leslie W. Morgan, editor of the collection of addresses on Christian union delivered at the Anglo-American Conference in London in 1910, asks us to say that the volume will be sent to any one, post free, for 25 cents; American stamps accepted.

Edward B. Bagby reports six prosperous months at Twenty-fifth Street Church, Baltimore. There have been thirty additions, congregations largely increased and missionary offerings 20 per cent larger than last year. The minister received a gift of $95 at Christmas.

Some weeks ago it was stated in our department of Calls and Resignations that Dr. M. B. Ainsworth had resigned at Franklin, Ind., to accept a call to Woodbine, Ia. Dr. Ainsworth is pastor at Georgetown, Ky., where he went from Franklin last February. It was A. F. Ainsworth, a brother, who located at Woodbine.

A reception in honor of the twentieth anniversary of the pastorate of George H. Combs at Independence Boulevard Church, Kansas City, was held at the church last week. One thousand members of the church and their friends attended. Short talks were made by officers of the Sunday-school, and the heads of other departments of the church.

A logical way to begin a new pastorate is that adopted by Richard W. Gentry who has lately begun his work at Winfield, Kan. Mr. Gentry is emphasizing two things, religious education and the prayer life of his people. This is getting at the foundations of the church. The instruction of young and old, through Sunday-school and other means, in the things of religion and the development of Christian experience through the prayer-meeting shows that this pastor is seeking to truly build up his church rather than to make a showy success.

Austin Church, Chicago, has been fortunate in the promptness with which it has been able to engage a pastor to succeed

Rev. A. R. McQueen.

George H. Brown, who went in November to Taylorville, Ill. It is also fortunate in that its choice fell upon just the particular man who is regarded by the congregation and mutual acquaintances of congregation and minister as singularly well adapted to this suburban city work. A. R. McQueen, teacher of philosophy in Christian University, Canton, Mo., is the pastor-elect. He is thirty-two years of age, well-equipped in his intellectual life, manifests a pastor's characteristics, and is disposed to regard his new task as a long-time if not a life-time service. That is the kind of man Chicago needs.

The Disciple students at Yale University are expectantly awaiting the coming of Dr. Peter Ainslie of Baltimore, who is to deliver three addresses on the polity and ideals of the Disciples at the invitation of the Divinity School. His dates are Jan. 13-15. There were twenty-two Disciple men enrolled in the Divinity School last year. Mr. Carl Burkhardt, president of the Campbell Club, computes that these students were the beneficiaries of $6,000 in tuition, rooms, scholarships and prizes, and suggests that inasmuch as these benefits are all derived from congregational money it is a demonstration of the spirit of Christian unity that is everywhere abroad, and especially in circles of culture.

Central Church, Des Moines, Ia., Finis Idleman, pastor, appointed a commission to investigate the status and welfare of the young people of the church. The commission recently reported that there are 551 young people holding membership in the church and 600 others reached by the church's influence. Not over 150 of this number participate in the social activities of the church; 65 per cent regularly attend cheap theaters; 4 per cent dance; 24 per cent live in boarding houses away from home influences. As a result of the facts developed by this investigation active steps are being taken to provide adequately and wisely for the social life and welfare of the young people of the church.

The annual meeting of Jackson Boulevard Church, Chicago, was held last New Year's eve. Reports were received from all the organizations of the church. The total amount of money raised during the year was $8,316.68, of which $1,140 was for missions. The year closes with a substantial balance in the treasury. There were 164 additions to the membership during the year, ninety-nine by baptism. These all came through the regular services with no special evangelistic meetings. The church continues the support of Miss Ora Haight as its living link missionary in India. A Chinese school maintained by workers from this congregation reported nine baptisms during the year and $50 given to missions. Austin Hunter is the pastor.

A great disappointment has befallen Pastor A. I. Zeller and his flourishing work at Petersburg, Ill., in the enforced withdrawal of the pastor for the next three months. An affection of the vocal chords compels Mr. Zeller to absolutely cease public speaking for that time. He will go to the northwest for a vacation, leaving Mrs. Zeller and the elders in charge of the church. His congregation is loyal to its pastor in this situation, and two former pastors, Wm. Groves and C. E. Smoot, now residing in Petersburg, are especially fraternal in offering their services until Mr. Zeller's return. The Petersburg church is enlarging its missionary vision and the pastor was hoping shortly to put forth a great effort to raise $3,000 for a hospital in Tibet. Perhaps his "invisible leadership" may accomplish this.

James Small has been engaged in evangelistic work in England during the past three months. In that time he has held brief missions at eight different points, and more than 225 decisions for Christ have been obtained. The churches he has visited have spoken well of his discourses, and while applying in the first place for only a brief series of services, in almost every case they regretted that the period was so short. The campaign is to continue for another three months. Mr. Small will begin in London, at Hornsey Church, of which Leslie W. Morgan is pastor, on January 23, to remain a fortnight. Mr. and Mrs. Chas. Constable, two of the few English singers who make a specialty of evangelistic work, have been engaged to have charge of the music. In the other churches no other outside assistance was rendered.

Ohio Secretary's Letter

A new thing in Ohio is the coming Country Life Day in Columbus, January 15. In connection with the meeting of the state board of agriculture a whole day is to be given to the Ohio rural life survey. The work of the survey has been going on since early last summer. Twenty-one countries have thus far been surveyed. The Ohio Christian Missionary Society has had a real part in this valuable work. The discussions of the survey will be most valuable, and every rural church in Ohio should have representatives present in Columbus at the meeting of the State Board of Argiculture, Jan. 15.

Following the Columbus meeting similar meetings will be held throughout the state as follows: Wooster, Jan. 17-18; Peebles, Jan. 20-21; Athens, 22-23; New Concord, Jan. 24-25; Dayton, Jan. 27-28; Findlay, Jan. 29-30; Middlefield, Jan. 31-Feb. 1.

To each of these meetings a team of speakers will go presenting economical, educational and religious conditions as discovered in Ohio. These meetings bring the result of the survey within reach of every section of the state and will be of great value to church workers who many atend them.

Another new thing in Ohio is the County Evangelism undertaken by the Ohio Christian Missionary Society in Brown and Knox counties this winter. State Evangelist C. N. Williams and "volunteer" evangelists are to be utilized in meetings in a number of churches in these counties. The Brown county campaign has been arranged in conjunction with S. W. Crabtree. C. N. Williams will hold meetings at Russellville and Ripley; Wm. Law, of Hamilton, at Sardinia; Geo. W. Hall, of Linden Heights, at Hamersville. The State Secretary and Bible-school Superintend, assisted by Brother Crabtree will hold one day sessions, conducting a school of church and Bible-school administration at Mt. Orab, Macon, Bethlehem and Liberty, closing with a county meeting at Georgetown. In connection with this campaign S. S. Lappin, of Cincinnati, is to hold a "volunteer" meeting with the church at Modest in Clermont County. At this writing C. N. Williams is in a meeting at Rural, also in Clermont County.

In Knox County, L. I. Mercer, of Lancaster is directing the forces with the hearty assistance of all the pastors in the county. Meetings are planned for the Grove, W. D. Ward, Newark; Bell, L. A. Warren, Bucyrus; First Milford, C. J. Pardee, of Lexington; Centerburg, L. I. Mercer; Messiah, D. W. Miller, Belle Center; Brink Haven, S. B. Norviel, Sebring. The State Secretary and Bible-school Superintendent will visit the churches not provided with such meetings.

The campaign is to begin in both counties about the middle of January and will be closed by the middle of February. The leaders in the county are enthusiastic in their anticipation of the good to be done by working thus conjointly for the uplift of the cause in every church in the county. Considerable publicity will be given to the campaigns and naturally the public will be interested in the outcome, all of which will tend to strengthen the hold of the work upon the public mind.

Cleveland. I. J. CAHILL, Cor. Sec'y.

Good and Getting Better

There continues to be gratifying improvement in the receipts for Ministerial Relief. In the past week eleven churches have made remittances of over $20 each. Several of these are only partial payments on the total offering for the year. Paris, Tennessee, gave us $37.87, its fourth successive offering. Brenham, Texas, stays in the Honor Roll of Veteran Legion Supporters with its regular anual offering of $50 Central, Cincinnati, sends another payment on the big offering which will keep it on the "Living Link" list. This check is for $50. Central, Youngstown, Ohio, comes back into the fold after seven years of absence, with an offering of $25. At the Louisville Convention the delegation from Honulula, Hawaii, pledged $100, which has just been paid and is the largest offering ever received from outside the states. Bloomfield, Indiana, continues on the list of the ever faithful, with an offering of $32.65. Harlem Avenue, Baltimore, sends $40 and continues on the "Veteran Legion Supporters" Honor Springs, First, with $26.50, Chillicothe, Mo., with $20, Pendleton, Oregon, with $25. Each have them standing loyally by the veterans. came nineteen individuals remittances and seventy church offerings of less than $20 each. A fine proportion of the last are now in the support of this work. Altogether the receipts of the one week amounted to $1,028.40. Next week we hope to present a complete statement of the receipts for the first three months of the missionary year. Offerings should be completed as promptly as possible and remittance made at once.

BOARD OF MINISTERIAL RELIEF.

Illinois Secretary's Letter

The church at Cuba, W. B. Oliver, minister, has made good progress the past year and Mr. Oliver has been called for another year. The church raised over $3,000, about $1,500 of which was for old debts and improvements.

Be sure to send our office the name and address of your new church clerk. Do it new.

Brethren, pardon our insistence, but we do need the liberal fellowship of every church in the state for Illinois Missions. Our General Fund is now overdrawn more than $1,200, but the monthly appropriations for our missions and missionaries must be paid. They are working hard and making many sacrifices and must be supported. Many churches made very small May offerings or none at all, and have not yet sent their November offering. How can two societies —Home and State—prosper and do a great work for Christ with their hands tied?

Are there not many brethren of wealth in Illinois who will count it a joy to send us their checks for $10 as a personal gift to reduce our General Fund deficit? May the good spirit of our Master move upon many hearts to respond.

J. FRED JONES, Field Secretary.
W. D. DEWEESE, Office Sec'y-Treas.

heartily congratulate you and Dr. Willett in the change announced, and I wish for both of you continued success in this particular field.

By FRANK WALLER ALLEN, Paris, Mo.

The plan for converting the ownership of The Christian Century from private individuals to the brotherhood has my hearty indorsement and support. You are not the only one to be congratulated: the Disciples are to be congratulated because of this opportunity. So far as religious newspapers are concerned, The Christian Century is the hope of the young Disciples.

By RICHARD GENTRY, Winfield, Kans.

I read with great pleasure the plan to transfer the ownership of The Christian Century from private hands to the common possession of the general brotherhood. Perhaps it is an exaggeration to say that I felt as if mine eyes had "seen the glory of the coming of the Lord." The ideals for which The Century stands are in the main the same ideals that have kept me in the ministry of Jesus Christ. I have faith that these ideals are the expression of God's purposes for our brotherhood. I believe they are the ideals on which our future labor will be built. Many of us younger ministers have been tested as by fire. And there have been moments when we might have fainted by the wayside did we not feel that we were in tune with the general trend of modern life. How, then, can I give else but a hearty "Amen" and promise a cordial support. "O be swift my soul to answer, O be jubilant my feet! Our God is marching on!"

of our publications. Few preachers feel free to use their congregations to promote the interests of private concerns. I heartily congratulate The Century in its attempt to "brotherhood" itself.

Hail, all hail, the Disciples' Publication Society!

By LOUIS O. LEHMAN, Gibson City, Ill.

I have felt for some time the incongruity of any publishing house speaking with authority for the Disciples of Christ. Our very ideals preclude it. We seem to be agreeing that private ownership of our publishing houses is not the best thing, so that the only remaining alternative is a number of publishing houses, each representing a school of thought in the brotherhood, each striving to interpret our life and ideals according to the faith of those who support it, and each contributing its profits to some phase of our general work. This seems to be what you have in mind and I believe it is a splendid step. I congratulate you upon it, and trust that it may work out successfully.

By ALVA W. TAYLOR, Columbia, Mo.

We are to be congratulated whenever any one of our religious journals becomes a brotherhood institution. Their main asset is the religious interest that is centered about and intensified by loyalty to the brotherhood. It seems eminently right that the profits accruing from their business should go back to the cultivation of the brotherhood's big unselfish enterprises, such as missions and religious education. We are a free people and any group of men, liberal or conservative, radical or "standpat," have a right to operate either a newspaper or an educational institution according to their ideals of what the brotherhood should stand for. They pay the bills if there is a loss, and they dedicate the profits to the big non-partisan enterprises of the brotherhood if there is profit. I am glad to welcome The Century as a brotherhood enterprise and I hope there will be others.

By JOSEPH C. TODD, Bloomington, Ind.

Your announcement last week was quite an unexpected move to me. My estimate of it at this time depends on my confidence in the judgment of those most interested. For my own part I am not certain as to the wisdom of departing from individual ownership with its aggressiveness and independence. I will rejoice, however, in a plan that will relieve the few from the personal sacrifices made in the past to maintain The Century. I wish for you the largest usefulness to our cause and your success in the plans for a greater future.

By CHAS. E. UNDERWOOD, Eureka College.

I congratulate most heartily The Christian Century on the transfer of its property to the non-profit-sharing corporation to be known as the "Disciples Publication Society." This movement is in harmony with the great purpose of The Christian Century to serve the brotherhood without thought of personal gain. Best wishes for a long and prosperous career under the new method of direction.

By SAM'L HARDEN CHURCH, Pittsburgh.

I hope the new plan will bring a larger circulation and increased influence to The Christian Century. The importance of your work justifies a confident wish to that end.

By W. H. HOOVER, New Berlin, Ohio.

I am most enthusiastically pleased with the announcement and sincerely trust the same may be worked out to the most happy conclusion. Referring to the matter of editorship, while what you say in the last paragraphs is the entirely proper thing for you to say and no doubt to feel, it is also to be remembered that if the editorial policy and teaching were to be changed, my interest in the matter would cease. I have no doubt, however, but that the others who will join in this movement will be likeminded, so I apprehend there will be no danger along that line. While I am not in such financial circumstances as will warrant me in subscribing for any large amount, I shall be most happy to help to some extent.

By JUDGE F. A. HENRY, Cleveland, Ohio.

I think you are taking a decidedly forward step in putting the ownership and management of The Christian Century on a broad and impersonal basis. The idea, although, I believe, originating with the editors of The Century, has been tried out with gratifying success by the Evangelist, and in the end all our papers must fall into line. Personal journalism, even with religious papers, is too apt to indulge in splenetics. You have been very good-natured always, but I have sometimes felt that Christian union has not been promoted by our religious press as a whole. There is no reason, however, why, editorially, The Century, or any other paper conducted upon this new plan, should not maintain the independence and fearlessness which is absolutely essential to right leadership. I heartily congratulate you upon the new departure, and wish for you and your associates, as well as The Century itself, a most happy and prosperous new year.

By ELLIS B. BARNES, Richmond, Ky.

I have read the new plans for The Christian Century, and I sincerely hope they will result in greater good for the paper, and that it may continue as ever to interpret the meaning of our movement in a generous way. I have always favored a brotherhood paper, and the method of having one which will produce the greatest good to the greatest number, is the one we want. I trust that The Christian Century will enter upon an era of great prosperity in the new year.

By EDGAR DeWITT JONES,

It looks good to me and I rejoice with you in this forward step. I like much the spirit and method of the enterprise, for it is at once business like and yet becomingly modest. I feel that The Century has its own peculiar and particular field in Discipledom and I therefore welcome any plans that will widen and deepen its influence for good. I shall be very glad to learn that this new policy meets with succes such as it merits and I wish you and your family and The Century a most profitable New Year, and especially so in the greater things of the spirit.

By WALTER S. ROUNDS, Arcola, Ill.

I have read with a great deal of satisfaction the announcement of the organization of the Disciples Publication Society. Just as there are obvious advantages in having various religious journals to emphasize our somewhat varying ideals as a brotherhood, so there are advantages in possessing more than one board of publication. Monopoly in religious matters inevitably tends to abuse of privilege. Accept my congratulations and best wishes.

By GRAHAM FRANK, Liberty, Mo.

I am very much interested in the announcement of the formation of the Disciples Publication Society. It seems to me to be planned along right lines. I have visions of great usefulness for it. While I do not find myself in agreement with all the positions and policies of The Century, I feel greatly indebted to you for the frank, courteous manner in which you write about the real issues of the day. I trust you will be able properly to finance the undertaking and that the Master will use you and The Century for his glory.

By C. M. CHILTON, St. Joseph, Mo.

I congratulate you upon your announcement. I have been reading The Century for years with great pleasure, and interest. You have been ably interpreting a very important phase of our development. Even when I have not been able to agree with you, I have respected the fine spirit in which you advocate your convictions. I have appreciated the intellectul elevation of your paper, its cultural values. I bid you God-speed in your avowed purpose to "go forward into the discussion of issues of universal interest." I shall be glad to hear that a satisfactory foundation has been secured.

By WILLIAM DUNN RYAN, Youngstown, O.

I congratulate you sincerely upon the splendid consummation of your long cherished plans. Unquestionably our leading journals should be owned by the brotherhood, and be made responsive to its needs and desires. I think the power for usefulness of The Century will be immeasurably increased by the new arrangement.

By ASA McDANIEL, Harvey, Ill.

I desire to congratulate you upon the larger opportunity this plan will give you to lead the brotherhood into Christian union of the real sort. May the realization of your hopes of many years yield rich returns for the Kingdom of God.

By DR. LOA E. SCOTT, Chagrin Falls, O.

I am more than pleased to know about it. The brotherhood needs such a paper far more than most realize and to get it onto such a basis will be a great step forward. I wish to congratulate you upon the success of you work for The Christian Century in the past and I trust the change shall mean for you a larger field and more splendid opportunities for a great work.

By W. H. BOOK, Columbus, Ind.

Dear Bro. Morrison: Your announcement received. I like you fellows personally, but when it comes to Scripture I think you are anything but sound, and I am against you. The Century, in the hands of a few private individuals is a nuisance to our cause, and if the brotherhood should get charge of it, with the present editors, it would be a calamity. Honestly, I hope the thing will die, and it would give me great pleasure to preach its funeral, write its obituary and its epitaph. Your friend and brother.

By E. F. DAUGHERTY, Vincennes, Ind.

The anomaly of any man or company of men, receiving personal financial profit from affairs concerning Christ's kingdom, whose ruling spirit is "other-fellowism," has ever impressed me as "making merchandise of the kingdom" and wrong in principle. Absolute unselfishness is our ultimate aim as Christians. Therefore, I hail with applause the time and circumstances wherein religious journalism becomes a kingdom activity rather than business ambition for individuals. I so appreciate the new move and prospect of The Century and wish it successful consummation with the new year of grace.

By CLAUDE E. HILL, Valparaiso, Ind.

I am very glad to congratulate you on bringing to a successful issue your plans for The Century as apearing in the issue of this week. That you are actuated by the most unselfish motives, I of course believe, and

I have no doubt that the change will work to the advantage of the paper. You know, I presume, that I am not in sympathy with some positions The Century has taken on questions now before the Disciples. I cannot believe that the paper, on these questions, represents the true position of the Disciples, either past or present. But my disagreement with your views does not stand in the way of offering sincerest good wishes both to you personally, and for The Century. The truth will ultimately prevail. But we are brethren and seek to serve our Lord and promote a common cause. That we must never forget.

By F. L. MOFFETT, Springfield, Mo.

I am very much pleased with the announcement that The Christian Century is soon to pass from the hands of private individuals and become the possession of the brotherhood. Believing as I do in the ideals of The Christian Century I rejoice greatly in this promise of wider influence and greater service. I am glad for the service you have rendered in cultivating the religion of the spirit and congratulate you on the consummation of plans which will extend the sphere of its action.

By M. E. CHATLEY, Centerville, Ia.

The three conviction held by the Christian Century, and stated in your recent editorial, "An Important Announcement," meet with my general approval. The fulfilment of the plan suggested would be a forward step in the attainment of the practical ideals of our brotherhood. I wish the new Disciples Publication Society all possible success.

By A. B. JONES, Liberty, Mo.

I now lack only five days of being eighty-one years old—too old to write for the papers. But I want to express to you my appreciation of The Christian Century as a religious journal. Its spirit is admirable, its editorials are of a very high order. You have cleared the field of every opponent with signal victory. The position of The Century on Christian union and all implied issues thereto is, in my judgment, not only unanswered but unanswerable. I have followed you as I did Isaac Errett on instrumental music—opposed at first but convinced at last. My time on earth is growing short, but I wish to die with my face to the future, and not looking back over my shoulders. I am glad you are proposing to change your paper and publishing house from private ownership to a Disciples Publication Society. If I was a young man I should want to be a bond purchaser, but I have rounded up my affairs for my departure. You have my best wishes for abundant success and enlarged usefulness.

By EDWARD SCRIBNER AMES, Chicago.

I am greatly interested in your plans to make The Christian Century a brotherhood paper in name and in fact. All of the progressive minds among us feel the need of a free, high-grade journal, such as The Century is, and they will be glad to assist in making it still more representative by some official organization emanating from the people themselves.

By B. F. DAILEY, Greenfield, Ind.

The Christian Century has marked a new era in the journalism of the Disciples of Christ. I congratulate you upon the prospect of enlarging its usefulness by placing it in closer touch with the brotherhood. May it ever remain an open forum to serve the cause of truth.

By EARL MARION TODD, Ft. Wayne, Ind.

Please eccept my hearty congratulation on the splendid achievement announced in your last issue. This is a most delightful New Year's surprise. May it be the beginning of still larger usefulness for The Christian Century in its interpretation to themselves and to the world of the ideals of the Disciples of Christ. The editorial work has long ceased to call forth remark—it is so uniformly admirable. But this new achievement is a new revelation of the genius of ye editor. May 1913 be the best year in the history of The Christian Century.

By HENRY W. HUNTER, Higginsville, Mo.

I am rejoiced with the ideal that you have set before you and sincerely hope that the plans may work out so that the usefulness of the paper may be increased to the larger good of the whole brotherhood. I congratulate you on this advance step and trust that the brotherhood will receive it in the same spirit that prompted the gift. Your paper has always been an inspiration to me with its clear cut editorials and clean news items.

By L. J. MARSHALL, Kansas City, Mo.

I felicitate you on the realization of your long cherished desire, and I welcome the launching of the "Disciples Publication Society." I believe there is both room and need among us, for the work you propose to do. I am quite sure that there is no one religious journal, now representing all the Disciples. But I also feel we need leadership, perhaps more than representation. Tomorrow will rise on a new year, and we must all begin to live and think in 1913, rather than 1912. I try to lend a hand in every worthy enterprise my brethren undertake. I believe in your Christian integrity and am favorable to your new plan for The Christian Century. With the season's best greetings and Christian love.

Ten Big Reasons Why

BETHANY GRADED LESSONS are being adopted by so many of the best schools among Disciples

1. There is more to them—at least a third more—than is contained in any other series.
2. They are rich, vital and full of suggestion to teacher and pupil.
3. They are free from the sectarian spirit.
4. They are soundly and fervently evangelical.
5. They are truly artistic in all their illustrations.
6. They are printed on better paper with better binding and in better taste than any other series.
7. Every lesson writer is an expert of interdenominational reputation.
8. They are a monumen. to the modern spirit of unity—a dozen leading denominations have co-operated to produce them and are now using them.
9. The Disciples possess full editorial rights, through the editor. Charles Clayton Morrison.
10. Every Disciple school that uses them participates in and promotes a great Christian union enterprise.

DISCIPLES PUBLICATION SOCIETY

THE DISCIPLES PUBLICATION SOCIETY is a non-profit-sharing corporation whose charter has recently been granted by the state of Illinois. It is organized for the purpose of publishing books, Sunday School literature and a weekly religious newspaper. Its profits are not to go to individuals but are to be appropriated to advance the cause of religious education, especially the higher education of the Christian ministry. The term "religious education" is regarded as an ideal common to Sunday Schools, missionary societies, colleges, seminaries and universities, and other organizations that promote Christian progress through Christian education. The New Christian Century company has agreed, by resolution adopted unanimously by the stockholders, to sell the entire assets and good will of the company to the newly organized Disciples Publication Society for the sum of $16,000 and to accept the notes of said Society for that amount. The trustees of the Disciples Publication Society have agreed to purchase the business of the New Christian Century Co. on these terms. To provide capital for enlarging the business the trustees are issuing 5 per cent bonds in the amount of $50,000, retirable after five years, to be sold to persons interested in the ideals of The Christian Century. It is believed at the present time that the entire issue will not need to be sold, but that, in addition to the bonds set aside as security for the notes to be given to the stockholders of the New Christian Century Co., not more than $25,000 of bonds must be sold. Subscriptions for the purchase of these bonds are now being solicited by C. C. Morrison and H. L. Willett, editors of The Christian Century. During Dr. Willett's absence in the Orient correspondence may be addressed exclusively to Mr. Morrison. Full information as to all details will be given upon inquiry. The essential purpose of the agreements and proposals herein described is to provide a way for the general brotherhood of the Disciples of Christ to buy the entire interest of the New Christian Century Company and to pay for it by patronizing it. The bonds and notes are to be retired out of the profits earned by the Society.

The purchasers of bonds, therefore, will stand, with the holders of notes, in the position of sustainers or supporters of the enterprise while the brotherhood's patronage is paying for it and increasing its value. The question of defining the membership of the Disciples Publication Society is still open, and upon it the organizers will be glad to receive suggestions. It is the purpose to make it thoroughly democratic and representative. The five trustees named by the charter will act for the Society until the basis of membership has been determined and the members elected.

HEARTY FELICITATIONS CONTINUE

And still congratulatory messages come in. It is not our purpose although it would be our delight to print all of these messages. Many of them are purely personal, some intimately so, and intended only to encourage the editors in their not wholly congenial task of securing funds to finance the Disciples Publication Society. The signs indicate that there will be many who will have fellowship with us in this task, and this will convert into a joy a service that at the beginning presents but few attractions.

Unfortunately neither of the editors, upon whom the leadership of this campaign for securing bond subscriptions has by fate devolved, possesses either taste or talent or experience in business promotion. All we can do is to state and re-affirm the greatness of our cause on the assumption that those who feel the worthiness of the cause will, by their own initiative, respond with substantial investment in it.

Just because the plan which we are now promoting is not a mere commercial proposition, not a scheme for making money for ourselves or for any private individuals whatever; just because the business technique is part and parcel of the unselfish ideal which dominates the new Society and The Christian Century; perhaps also because we are unsophisticated in the arts and wiles of business promotion, it is our purpose and desire to lay the facts frankly before any person who is in good faith prompted to cooperate with us. The convenient blank on the lower corner of this page may be signed and mailed by any friend who desires additional information.

For the rest of our space this week—and an additional half page on page 16, although we had promised not to go beyond the limits of this page—we will share with our readers some of the sentiments that have been conveyed to us.

By D. F. GIVENS, Des Moines, Ia.

I do not hesitate to say that it is one of the most vital moves that could be made in connection with the ongoing of our Disciples movement. I can but wish you the most hearty congratulations in making this change and am sure that when the details are worked out the benefit to our cause will be inestimable May the New Year be a prosperous one for the new enterprise.

By H. H. HARMON, Lincoln, Neb.

I could express no deeper or more hearty wish in this new year for those actively associated as editors and managers of our Christian Century than that they may realize the ideals which they have set out to attain as outlined in this week's issue of the paper. I congratulate the new enterprise upon its name the "Disciples Publication Society." It is significant and comprehensive; it appeals to my blood and I hope will meet with general favor. Your greatest word in "An Important Announcement" was the third of your reasons for such a paper and publishing house as are proposed. Our plea must be heard in the wider circles of God's great church. May the Lord lead men of means among loyal Disciples to respond readily and heartily to the call of this new opportunity which knocks at our doors.

By L. O. BRICKER, Atlanta, Ga.

I congratulate you most heartily upon the broad and splendid plan, worthy the minds of Christian statesmen, projecting the Kingdom into the future. I trust that the carrying out of the plan may give you much joy, and that the brotherhood will second you heartily.

By ALLAN B. PHILPUTT, Indianapolis.

Come in, the water is fine! The problem of publishing a brotherhood paper has not yet been fully worked out, but it is tolerably clear that individually owned church papers will ultimately pass. They were once necessary, but the time is coming when the churches will not wish to see enterprises pushed along with a duplicate motive of public service and private gain. The time may come when public feeling will be against profits even for missionary purposes. The great mission of a church paper is to spread the light and help the cause. To do this best it should go into the hands of all, and therefore should be as inexpensive as possible. But I congratulate you on the prospect which seems to lie before you.

By C. O. REYNARD, Toronto.

I have always admired The Century and its editors for their outspoken and forcible championship of unpopular ideals. I do not

CHARLES CLAYTON MORRISON,
700 E. 40th Street, Chicago.

I am interested in doing what I can to aid you and Dr. Willett in your plan for firmly establishing The Christian Century in the ownership and control of the Disciples. Kindly send me additional information. How long do the bonds extend? In what financial condition does the new Society begin business? Can you accept payment for bonds on the installment plan or must you have immediate cash for entire amount subscribed?

Reversion to the Brute

CONFIRMATIONS of the doctrine of the ascent of man may not be as self-evident as confirmations of his descent. It is not so easy to picture the race climbing the tortuous paths of moral uncertainty until a Gladstone is reached, as to picture the descent from Gladstone to the latest victim of the gallows. In fact, the pictures of descent smite our eyes every day. Let any man who lays claim to a working morality be forced to spend half an hour on the rear of a city street car where the masculine element is in undisputed control, and if the smoking, spitting, and "cussing" do not convince him that we—in large sections, at least—are in full swing bruteward, then additional argument would only drop from his reason as feathers hurled by the wind against a stone wall. Or if one has the misfortune to be dependent upon the services of the average barber-shop, he will often find himself in a position where he must either endure the lurid language of the loafers, make himself conspicuously unpleasant by protesting, or renew his belief in hell as a spur to the jaded vocabularies of conversationalists who would otherwise drop into the trifling and the inane. The descent seems almost to have reached the goal in such places.

All men of violent and horrible speech may be divided into two classes; those who swear because of actual brutal tendencies; and those who swear from long established habit, but under protest. To the one profanity is nothing more or less than the art of punctuating aenemic utterance with superlative abominations; to the other it is a lapse from moral intentions, always to be deplored. We have all known good men—if we except their fatal gift—who called profanity to their aid even when working in a praiseworthy cause. We knew a man who "cussed" a fellow sinner because he had made some depreciating remark about the Bible; he assailed the man's ancestors for several generations past, and closed his phillipic by consigning the offender to the place where he could have unbridled license to disbelieve the Bible as long as he pleased. Another roundly denounced a minister in language which could not be printed with propriety because he made speeches against local option. All very inconsistent it will be agreed, but there is a difference in the men who use such speech. The descent of one seems to be without brakes; the descent of the other is not without hope that he may yet be saved.

It is said that one of the chief differences between man and the brute is the gift of speech. From some points of view the advantage seems to lie with the brute—that is with the quadruped.

All of us have watched the efforts to enforce anti-spitting ordinances. If ever there was a righteous ordinance on the face of the earth it is that which penalizes those who do their best to convert the globe into a cuspidor. They have been taught that disease and death are involved in every expectoration, and when indulged in promiscuously dire results are likely to follow. If our communities were swept off in crowds under the assault of the deadly microbe as in the case of a yellow fever scourge, the eyes of the people would be opened to the wisdom of anti-spitting ordinances; but as the illness and death are likely to work insidiously and indirectly, they are indifferent to the menace of the offence. If we could point with a warning finger to some noble youth who was brutally assailed by a microbe from some expectorationist, as it lay in wait upon the sidewalk, great advances in the reform could be made. As it is, the people resist what looks like an attack on their liberties.

In the large cities the reform succeeds much better than in the towns. And if one wants to try his skill as a reformer we can point him to many fields which await his advent, but we warn him to increase his life insurance to the limit, and leave his measure with the undertaker before he enters upon the campaign.

Spitting is a habit, and only in certain conditions of one's health does it become a necessity. But it should never be a necessity which should threaten the health and life of one's neighbors. Spitting, naturally, is a method of defense which some have inherited from their sub-human ancestors. Even at this remote period spitting in one's face is an insult for which scarcely any reparation can be made. Not having any particular victim the spitter of our time takes vengeance on the entire community by sowing the sidewalks full of death.

But if we want a crowning demonstration of our descent, think of the manner in which the large cities celebrated the incoming of the new year. If in other days our preachers have held up the immoralities of ancient Rome as recorded by Juvenal as a warning to our greater civilization, let us know that at our present gait, Rome could learn of us. Of course some will tell us that we are not as bad as Rome, that our orgies are not comparable to those of Sodom, that Gomorrah was an inferno of vice, and that our modern culture will compel us to screw down the lid at the proper time. So said they of every vice that ever thrust its face from the dens of darkness. But the end of all is sure, and none can escape swift doom. The optimism of the American people is about all that saves us during such periods. We believe in spite of our doubts, and we affirm our progress when we feel the ground slipping from beneath our feet. And that same optimism tells us that there is always enough salt in every city to save it, and that the faith of the few is mightier than the unbelief of the many. The reversion can only be temporary; the unfit who perish will be a monumental history of warning to those who survive.

Social Survey

A Titanic Disaster Every Day

It is estimated that out of some 1,500,000 deaths annually in the United States at least 630,000 are preventable! Yet we sigh piously and talk about God's overruling providence. According to Irving Fisher, in an article in the Survey, the greater number of these preventable deaths are from seven causes, among them typhoid, tuberculosis, pneumonia, and the three great diseases of infancy. The image of over 1,600 people helpless in mid-ocean in the "Titanic" disaster so wrought upon men's imagination that steps were at once taken on both sides of the Atlantic to safeguard human life at sea. But these figures mean that we have a "Titanic" disaster every day of the year and we are just beginning to recognize our corporate responsibility. The movement for public health is gaining ground with great rapidity. We see that scourges like typhoid and tuberculosis can be swept off the face of the earth. Our own nation is far behind some other nations in this movement, but even so we have some accomplishments of which we may be proud. Through hygiene under Colonel Gorgas, it has been possible to dig the Panama Canal. Yellow fever has been practically eliminated both on our own shores and in Cuba. We have nearly eliminated the hook-worm disease in Porto Rico and are gradually doing the same in the southern states. A remedy has been discovered for one form of spinal meningitis. The summer death rate of infants in New York, Boston and other cities has been greatly reduced by individual milk stations, dispensaries and other institutions. In spite of all which, however, there is much yet to be done.

Preventable Diseases

"It is within the power of man to rid himself of every parasitic disease" is Pasteur's verdict. That his words are prophetic may be proved by the fact that London within the last twenty years has virtually cut her death rate in half. The greatest achievement of any country, so Mr. Fisher states, is that of Sweden, where the duration of life is the longest, the mortality the least, and the improvements the most general. There alone it can be said that the chances of life have been improved for people of all ages. It is rather disconcerting to our national pride to be told by the writer in the Survey that, while infancy, middle age and old age show a lower mortality in Sweden than in the past, in the United States—while we can boast of some reduction in infant mortality—the mortality after middle life is growing worse, and the innate vitality of our American people is, in all probability, deteriorating. In our country the public health movement has been almost wholly confined to protection against germs, but this, while defending us from plague and other epidemics of acute diseases, is well nigh powerless to prevent the chronic diseases of middle and late life, Bright's disease, heart disease, and nervous breakdowns, which are due largely if not entirely to unhygienic personal habits. One of the most important tasks our government, already more or less paternal in its relation to the people it governs, and we think rightly so, can undertake is the establishment of a national department of health which shall include in its operations the conservation of human life.

Haman's Gibbet for Panic Makers

The public press differs widely as to the significance of Mr. J. P. Morgan's testimony before the Pujo Money Trust Investigating Committee of the house. Some papers share the view expressed by Mr. Morgan before the committee that the monopoly of the money market is not a human possibility. The New York World, on the other hand, with many other papers is of the opinion that Mr. Morgan's testimony does not in any degree change the aspect of the facts laid before the committee by Mr. Scudder, a financial expert, concerning "interlocking" directorates, according to which eighteen financial institutions in New York, Chicago, and Boston, have a voice in the management of 134 corporations having an aggregate capital of $25,325,000,000. At the center of the ramifications is a group of 180 men. The World well asks: "If these 180 men do not constitute a money trust, what is a money trust?" It is worth while in this connection to read the widely quoted words of President-elect Wilson at the recent annual banquet of the Southern Society. After referring to what he calls natural panics, Mr. Wilson goes on to say, "But there are unnatural panics. And sometimes panics occur because certain gentlemen want to create the impression that the wrong thing is going to be done. I have heard that certain men can create such panics. In my ignorance of Wall St. I do not know about this. But I do know that the machinery is in existence for the creation of such panics. But I am not afraid of them. I do not believe there is any man living who dares to use that machinery to create such a panic. And if any one attempts it I promise you that I will build the gibbet for him as high as Haman's." Some of the gentlemen referred to will no doubt be somewhat at sea as to who Haman was, but they cannot fail, for all that, to catch the drift of the remarks of the president-elect.

Agitating by Dynamite Under the Ban

The conviction of thirty-eight members of the Iron Workers Union for dynamiting is perhaps the severest blow that union labor has ever received in this or in any other country—more severe. possibly, than the conviction of the McNamaras in California. Had the convicted men come from one section of the United States, it might have been fairly concluded that the conspiracy was local, but the fact that they came from communities as widely separated as New England, Colorado, Pennsylvania, California, Missouri, Wisconsin, and other states means nothing less than a nation-wide system of organized violence. The trial in Indianapolis lasted three months. Most of the defendants had able counsel, one of them as able a trial lawyer as any at the American bar. One of the indicted men said himself that the trial could not have been fairer. The jury, after two days' deliberation, returned a verdict of guilty. THE STANDARD has always believed in the trade union, and it still believes in the trade union. As a friend of labor, it believes that now is the time for the American Federation of Labor not simply to declare itself opposed to the methods of secret violence, but to back up that declaration by removing from its leadership all men who are willing to connive at violence, secret or open. We frankly confess to a feeling of great disappointment at the attitude assumed by Mr. Samuel Gompers during this whole regrettable case. We are sure that the cause of the workingman has been set back a long way by the policy of such leaders. We do not believe for one moment that any large number of men belonging to the organization, whose officials have been convicted, are willing to stand for these things in the slightest degree. The responsibility for violence does not, to be sure, rest entirely upon the convicted men. Like all social crimes, a good many people must share the responsibility. Violence begets violence, and we are perfectly certain that "big business" has often been guilty of using force. We have, if anything, a little less sympathy for the pious buccaneers of the capitalistic class than we have for law-breaking labor agitators. We are equally sure that thousands of quite innocent and respectable people, who visit their safety-deposit boxes twice a year to clip off coupons, have a remote, but nevertheless a very real, responsibility in the matter. Of course they do not consciously advocate or even approve of wearing out children, maiming workmen, defrauding consumers, or debauching public officials, any more than the great majority of the members of the American Federation of Labor approve the crimes of certain leaders. But they are anxious for fat dividends, and if they do not get them, the managers and superintendents are replaced by others who can "speed up" the profits by crowding the toilers. Last Sunday, after a stormy session, the Chicago Federation of Labor asserted its faith in the innocence of the convicted men, and declared that they were "railroaded by a fixed jury." This action, opposed by the cooler heads, discloses only too clearly the ominous war-basis now existing between labor and capital.

Operation of the Panama canal on business principles, without regard to politics, will be insisted upon if Col. George W. Goethals, chief engineer of the canal, undertakes the organization of the permanent government of the zone and the operation of the great waterway. Col. Goethals arrived in Washington last week with President Taft, on his annual trip from the canal zone. One of the first matters brought to his attention was the widely published report that his nomination as governor of the zone would be opposed because of a belief in some quarters that he would show favoritism in appointing subordinates. The colonel made it plain that he would be entirely content to forego such an appointment if he was not to be permitted to select the best men for the work to be done, regardless of political considerations, as has been his rule since he became head of the canal commission.

Money and the Kingdom

The relation of money to the kingdom has been a subject of discussion since the days of the Hebrew prophets. Whatever definition the economist may prefer, the religious teacher, when he speaks of money, has in mind wealth measured in terms of money. The subject of money, then, is one from which there is no escape. To live one must have a share of the world's wealth. How that share is obtained, how large it is, what attitude is taken toward wealth, and how possessions are used, are questions of the deepest significance for morality and religion.

The church cannot be indifferent to the way in which money is obtained. It must speak plainly to the rich man who gathers wealth by injustice and to the poor man who is resentful toward the prosperous merely because they are prosperous, and who would be more than willing to obtain money in unjust ways if he had the chance. A gift blinds the eyes. It is easy to condone the sins of those who give money for the enterprises in which we are interested. Unusual insight and courage are needed by the leaders of the church to enable them to utter the right word when prosperous wickedness offers to give money for cathedrals and missions, and when incompetence and sloth demand the rewards of ability and industry.

Wealth tempts to luxury. Of an author whose early work bore all the signs of true inventive genius Hamerton inquires, "What has this gifted mortal left as the testimony of his power, as the trace of his fourscore years upon the earth?" And he answers the question: "Only the reminiscence of a vague splendor, like the fast-fading recollection of a cloud that burned at sunset, and one small gem of intellectual creation that lives like a tiny star." Great wealth paralyzed the highest energies of the intellect, "leaving the lower energies free to exert less noble kinds of activity." The enemy of the intellect is the enemy of religion. If the use of wealth begins and ends in personal gratification, noble labor and elevating discipline are impossible.

"Wealth carries pleasure in her left hand, but in her right she bears honor and power. The rich man feels that he can do so much by the mere exercise of his command over the labor of others, and so little by any unaided labor of his own, that he is always strongly tempted to become, not only physically but intellectually, a director of work rather than a workman." Spiritual power is also diminished when men delegate their religious activities to others. It is not the rich man's money that the church needs, it is the man of energy devoting himself to the tasks of the church. He robs himself and he robs the church when he tries to be a business man and nothing else and to do his part of religious service by paying an expert.

Money is needed that we may have leisure to think. Great discoveries in science, pure and applied, are not due to accident. They are the rewards of long and patient investigation. Universities provide not only equipment for men engaged in research, but also salaries that free the men from undue anxiety about their living. The church must have its men engaged in research. It needs specialists in missions, in city problems, country life, in the history of religion, in the art of presenting the truth, and in social service. If the church is to have these men, it must provide for their comfort. They are not living on charity when they receive money for their work. They are workers entitled to their living. The church cheapens itself by not rewarding them according to their labor.

Among the subjects for investigation that should command the services of experts who are also devoted to the kingdom, money is one of the most important. We should know what truth there is in the statements of socialists and others who say our industrial and financial systems are wrong and must be reconstructed from the ground up before anything like justice can be secured. The church of Christ cannot afford to stand for things as they are unless they are right. It began as a protest against the existing order. It sends its messengers to non-Christian lands to change the habits and beliefs of the people. It cannot be a church of Christ if it ceases to make objection and to propose improvements. If our industrial and financial systems are sound, needing only minor modifications, the church should know this for itself and not from hearsay. It can then speak with power on the question of money. [Midweek service, Jan. 22. Matt. 13:44-46; I Tim. 6:9-10; Jas. 4:13-15; 5:1-6.] S. J.

"Does God Fix the Death-Rate?"

A broad-minded clergyman in his tuberculosis day sermon propounded this question and reached a conclusion decidedly negative. "God does not fix the death-rate." Who does then? We all do.

Those theologians aid high death-rates who ignore the demonstrated facts of preventable disease and seek to perpetuate the medieval superstition that infections are the Almighty's merited scourge. Laymen who flout the scientific proof that tuberculosis is curable and can be eliminated from human experience, or who disparage a tuberculosis propaganda as of no personal concern to them, help to cause the death of a consumptive every three minutes in the United States. Councils and legislatures which will not appropriate funds sufficient for the fight which health boards would wage against the great white plague are largely responsible for the death of 10,000 a year, twenty-seven deaths every day, in one city alone. Those who disregard antispitting ordinances and the like help to send the death-rate upward. Housewives whose culinary efforts produce dyspeptics directly and drunkards indirectly give far more impetus to the upward trend of the death-rate than most of us imagine. Venders of "patent medicines" and consumption cures who fleece their victims until the latter have passed far beyond the incipient stage in which physicians could have helped them—such nostrum-fakers have a full share of responsibility for the thousands on thousands of deaths from tuberculosis throughout the country. Those who draw profit from feeding the poor on adulterated food, "rots and spots," and fowls dead in storage several years back, have a similar responsibility for a high death-rate.

A "league for medical freedom" organized to prevent the wise centralization and coördination of health activities and to oppose the inspection of schools and schoolchildren likewise helps to keep the death-rate high. Those who overwork women and children in factories have a heavy share of responsibility for holding the death-rate at a high level; so also do those employers who require men to work at dangerous trades under intolerable conditions, such as those which in some trades hold the consumption-rate above 80 per cent. House-owners who provide dark, insanitary, pest-ridden tenements have no little part in increasing the death-rate. The Christian Scientists and other faith "healers" who close their eyes to the possibilities of material aid, that may often so potently be added to the psychotherapy they are employing, swell the death-rate. Well-meaning mothers, who believe that they are able to bring up their children in defiance of the new-fangled notions of hygiene spread by physicians and visiting nurses, help to keep the death-rate high.

Most important of all, says the Journal of the American Medical Association, incompetent and careless doctors swell the death-rate. For these the medical profession is directly responsible, whether they are untrained men turned out by low-grade medical schools, or members of the profession who have failed to keep up with scientific progress and who have become incompetent through inertia and laziness. All these, by their carelessness, indifference and ignorance, increase the death-rate, which competent and conscientious physicians, sanitarians and reformers are fighting to lower.

We have not the right to blame a cruel deity for deaths which are actually due to crass stubborn ignorance, inhumanity and the refusal to exercise the "common sense which is also an inspiration from the Almighty." A weeping mother told a famous physician that it had pleased Providence to take her baby from her. "Providence had nothing to do with the matter," replied the physician; "it was bad milk that killed your baby." We cannot escape some share of the joint responsibility of fixing the death-rate, but we can choose to be on the side of the forces that are bringing it down instead of those that are sending it up.

The Inquiry Renewed

A communication from Dr. J. H. Garrison assures us that the Christian Evangelist did not intend, in a recent editorial which we criticised, to belittle The Christian Century or its constituency as we construed its words to do. Dr. Garrison humbles us somewhat by taking to himself the authorship of the editorial in question which we had fallibly assigned to Mr. Smither, which only goes to show how far from being higher critics we are! Had we been able to detect Dr. Garrison's skilled hand we should certainly have been less bold to pluck the article to pieces as we somewhat ruthlessly did. Our esteemed colleague has a serious bone to pick with us, however. He says, "I am unwilling to believe that you are unable to see the difference between the definition of classical baptism and of Christian baptism, which I contrasted. Your omission of the word 'Christian' before my definition of baptism is a most unaccountable fact in view of the contrast I was presenting, which makes my whole argument vapid and meaningless." We allowed this omission because we assumed that our readers would understand that both the Christian Evangelist and we were referring only to Christian baptism, and that the use of the word would be redundant.

And now to be fair we give Dr. Garrison and every reader permission to insert the word "Christian" before the word "baptism" in every case in which it occurs, both in our quotation from the Evangelist and in our own statements.

The quotation will then read as follows: "Christian baptism has faith in Christ for its antecedent, immersion as its form, and assurance of forgiveness and membership in Christ's body as its sonsequent."

Our point still holds. Dr. Garrison's definition of Christain baptism gives the antecedent of Christian baptism; but obviously the antecedent of a thing is not the thing itself. It gives the consequent of Christian baptism; but obviously the consequent of a thing is not the thing itself. It gives the form of Christian baptism (we call our readers' attention to the fact that it is not a new hand at the baptismal controversy who in this clause abandons Alex. Campbell's fundamental contention, but no less significant a teacher than Doctor Garrison himself!); but obviously the form by which a thing is done is not the thing itself. The thing itself seems to be entirely left out of this definition! And now in consistency with what Dr. Garrison has said Christian baptism is not, may we not kindly ask him to tell us just what Christian baptism is?

The train was creeping slowly up the canyon, and the shadows of the evening were growing dark in the gorge below where the river rushed impetuously over its rough bed of granite. The sides of the mountain were black with firs, but high overhead the rays of the level sun were yet shining upon the crags and peaks in which the range broke against the sky. It was only at rare intervals that there were any signs of human habitation, and these were simply Indian tepees of bent poles, ragged bark and fluttering canvas. But under the deepening shadow of the hills and beneath the sighing pines one saw "the house appointed for all living." Most literally it was a "house," for the soil was not deep enough for the plow, much less for the spade of a grave-digger. But what gave additional pathos to the scene was that the Indian dead occupied a tomb which in its art and adornment exceeded far any neighboring home for the living. The little house erected over the dead had known what the home of the living lacked, the touch of both saw and plane. It alone was sheltered and protected from both wind and rain. It alone was surmounted by a cross. It was fit subject for verse more touching than Gray's famous "Elegy Written in a Country Graveyard."

As the night came swiftly down and we prepared for rest in the Pullman, our thoughts wandered across wide continents and deep seas. We saw the mighty pyramids rise from Lybian sands, defying the tramp of centuries and the tooth of time. We thought of the vanished races and their kings who far back in the early ages of an unknown world had felt the thrust of bodily pain and prepared consciously for the fatal arrow. We thought of Babylonian mounds; of Birs Nimrod and the tumuli at Nineveh; of the Taj Mahal, the supreme creation of the architect and yet a tomb; of the old Appian Way up which Roman emperors rode amid barbaric splendors with kings in chains behind their chariots, but on either side the mausolea of princes and patricians. And so we said to ourselves as we composed our limbs for sleep, the heart of man is one heart, the sorrows of the world one sorrow, and whether the bolt fall upon us or the king in Pharoah's palace or the babe in the Indian's tepee,

> "All we know, or dream, or fear,
> Of agony are thine."

The test of any faith must be its balm for that common pain. The noblest dreams of the old-time paganism were those of the Roman stoic. But the ice of stoicism melted under the rising beams of the Sun of Righteousness. Whatever eclipse of faith the world may temporarily suffer, the heart of man cannot long be turned away from that which alone has balm for its deepest hurt. The mysteries of the Christian faith we may never in this life fully fathom, but the sweetness of its sympathies the humblest may comprehend.

Christianity is a religion which lays upon its disciples the duty and privilege of sharing the Master's emotions. Philosophy may exhort us to ignore our neighbor's burden, but Christianity teaches us to share it. The burden is always there. The Red Cross nurse who sits sleepless by the cot of the wounded in the field hospital knows a joy profounder and serener than that of the victor who is sending off his despatches announcing a triumph. The transfiguration of our Lord in the Holy Mount did not bring him so near to us as his tears by the grave of Lazarus or his bloody sweat in the garden of Gethsemane. Our Redeemer is One who can be touched with a feeling of our infirmities. The crown of Christian living is not knowledge of faith but love, love which softens every blow of Fortune, robs Death of its sting and the Grave of its victory.

"Peace on earth, good will to men" all the Christian world has just been singing; yet the year 1912 has seen more than one war. Fierce fighting and bloodshed may be mediæval, but even in the twentieth century they persist. Sometimes this seems discouraging in view of all the peace congresses and the talk about international arbitration. The cause of disarmament and peace does move apace, however, and its appeal to public opinion grows each year a little stronger.

One of those whose influence for peace has been most potent is the Baroness von Suttner, who has recently landed in America. She comes to us from Vienna, and is well-known all over Europe, for she has traveled widely in the interests of The Hague conferences. Her novel "Lay Down Your Arms," published in 1890, brought her to public notice for it stirred all Europe. In it the baroness turned a slightly new light on the war problem. Instead of picturing once more its horrors she disclosed the flippant attitude of many courts which regard war merely as a game played by governments, in which the pawns are men. Her showing up of the trivial, conscienceless way in which wars are discussed in court circles aroused disgust on the part of her readers, and then a righteous indignation that the interests of peasant and workingman could be so ignored; their lives ruthlessly sacrificed, to satisfy the ambition and greed of those in high places. More than often no principle is at stake; the gamesters wish to play the game for more power, or aggrandizement or wealth.

Baroness von Suttner's book is responsible, we are told, for the conversion of Alfred Nobel and for his decision to offer part of the vast fortune he had made by the invention of dynamite to kill people as a prize for those who do most to prevent war. This, in itself, is an accomplishment of which the baroness may be justly proud.

Since her early years she has been working for international peace and has been a conspicuous figure at the conferences held in the House in the Wood, the palace which Queen Wilhelmina has lent for the peace congresses at The Hague. The baroness is now a woman almost seventy, and one admires the courage and enthusiasm for her cause which she must possess in order to plan a year of public speaking in America. She is not particularly impressive in appearance, in spite of her long ermine scarf lined with seal; but her voice is pleasing, her face kindly and earnest. She speaks English well, a little slowly perhaps, but distinctly; and she has marked literary talent. Those who can should avail themselves of the opportunity to hear this "most distinguished apostle of peace."

She is broadminded enough to see the shortcomings of her own nation, which she knows well because of her long life at the court of Vienna. What is it to Austria, she asks, that Servia should have a seaport? It is a matter of $100,000 or so; but how long would Austria hesitate over the appropriation of such a sum for her standing army or for war preparation?

In Boston the Baroness von Suttner spoke to large audiences. The goal of universal peace, she said, can be reached only by traveling the road to universal justice. The youth of the world must be taught that war is an anachronism.

"The people themselves in every country are not eager to be made targets for bullets," she declared; "the persons most interested in war are those engaged in the manufacture and sale of armature and guns and the building of fighting machines. In my own country, Austria, there are many women working in the cause of universal peace and even in the Balkans there is a strong party for peace."

The baroness expressed the hope that the next Hague conference would abolish the unanimity rule in the proposal to establish an international court of justice. The proposal was favorably voted on by a majority at the second conference, but since it was necessary that the vote should be unanimous, the small minority kept the matter from being considered.

"If justice reigns," the baroness declared, "and questions are submitted to arbitration, the differences between the nations will not be conducive to wholesale murder, as now. History will record this hour. While we are seeking for friendship, we can see that the enmity of nations is at work. The people first need a law, then justice, and friendship will ensue. Universal peace will be the outcome. Strange as it may seem, the friendship between nations is sometimes dangerous. They unite in love for themselves, but hatred toward other nations.

"Look at the triple entente between England, France and Russia. They have fought each other, and now they are bound together. On the other hand, we have an alliance between Germany, Austria and Italy. These two groups stand in opposition to each other. They have different interests at stake, but what greater interest could they have than to end war? These two groups could unite and bring peace and security to Europe."

Christian Thought Since Kant

A New Book by Professor E. C. Moore

Reviewed by Willis A. Parker

A new volume entitled "The History of Christian Thought Since Kant," whose author is the gifted Parkman Professor of Theology in Harvard University, Dr. Edward Caldwell Moore, is a notable book, just issued by Charles Scribners' Sons. Dr. Moore is recognized throughout the religious world as one of the foremost preachers and theologians of his generation. In Germany he is known as the first American pupil and beloved disciple of Harnack. In England he is regarded as the American friend of Principal Fairbairn. In Scotland they refer to him as "the Yankee that's different." In the United States he is conspicuous as a leader of liberal Christianity, effective both as a thinker and writer, and as an aggressive leader in missionary enterprise.

PROFESSOR E. C. MOORE.

No other American, perhaps, is so well informed concerning the status of Christian Missions in the Orient. The document submitted by him to the recent Ecumenical Conference at Edinburgh concerning conditions in the far East was startling both in its form and content.

Dr. Moore is chairman of the Educational Committee of the American Board, having charge of the colleges of Congregationalism in Europe and in Asiatic Turkey. He is at present under appointment as Dale lecturer at Mansfield College in Oxford, where he will soon assume his temporary residence. We Disciples have heard Dr. Moore in the sessions of the Religious Education Association, in our Congress held at Springfield, Ill., a year ago, and more recently during a residence as University Preacher at the University of Chicago, when he addressed various religious groups and assemblies. His charming manner, his humor, his unmistakable reverence, his courtesy to critics, and his clear, strong presentation of his message combine to urge upon him an undue amount of work outside of his duties as teacher and author. In these capacities, it is an open secret that Dr. Moore is the most commanding figure in the religious life of the great university by the Charles. His recently inaugurated courses in the Philosophy of Religion have popularized the viewpoints of Eucken, Siebeck and Troeltsch of Germany, in this country, to whose discussions Dr. Moore has brought his own significant contribution. The first of these, Professor Rudolph Eucken is just concluding a course of lectures in Harvard that have attracted the attention of the whole country. Dr. Moore has the honor of having been sponsor for the utterances of this famous German exponent of Energism.

The new book of Dr. Moore is significant first of all as to its purpose. It aims to present in brief form the essential features of modern thought about Christianity, as reflected in the attitudes and actual utterances of the great men of the period. Its own title page bears the announcement that the book is a mere outline. Upon reading it one scarcely knows whether to wonder more at the audacity of the attempt or at the measure of the success with which the book accomplishes its writer's purpose which is to sketch intelligently that main drift of human thought whose content is the chief glory of modern times.

The point of view of the writer is not less original than his work is successful. He essays to treat Christian thought not as the reflection of Christian men only, but as the thought of the age about Christianity, whether by men within or without the church. Ignoring the false lines of division which separated men within from men equally devoted to truth without the churches, Dr. Moore classes the thought of Carlyle and that of Channing—the polemics of Huxley and the mild reasonings of Newman—the impassioned preaching of Brooks and Robertson and the rhapsodic mysticism of Emerson as all and alike Christian thought, because it has as its object the facts, the sources, and the meanings of Christianity. Quoting the perverse maxim of Gottfreid Arnold that "the true church is always to be found among those who have just been excommunicated from the organized church," Dr. Moore finds some justification for the bitter remark. He insists, however, that not all of the true church is outside, nor most of it. Yet allowance is made for the errors of both the excommunicators and the excommunicated.

Religion is a threefold problem. Taken as a spiritual movement, every religion has its rise and development out of conditions that antedate its origin, and that complicate its environment. This amounts to saying that every religion has an anterior history, a locus in time. Then its development is conditioned by racial, military, commercial and other purely human considerations that operate to prevent, delay, or facilitate its expansion. Whether a given faith shall attain to the free flight of a planetary movement, or be lost as a wandering fragment, depends upon many besides purely religious conditions. Historically considered, religion is a part of the story of human life.

Again, religion has its metaphysical aspects. The fact that Christianity cannot be regarded wholly as a timeless revelation, but is explicable as a growth through history, was first pointed out by Kant. Nevertheless, the metaphysical question has its essential place in determining the nature of revelation,—and a knowledge of the metaphysics of the age in which a given religion has its rise is absolutely necessary to an understanding of its literature. The fallacy of the opposition to the modern movement in religion is thus sharply remarked: "To say that we have nothing to do with philosophy ends in our having to do with a bad philosophy. In that case we have a philosophy with which we operate without having investigated it, instead of having one which we have investigated. The philosophy of which we are aware, we have. The philosophy of which we are not aware has us." One may have his religion, without philosophy. But no one can state it without invoking formulae that lead from the center out to the very circumference of philosophical thought.

Yet more, religion is a psychological problem. It exists as a fact of living consciousness. There is no Christian consciousness. There is only human consciousness operating with, and operated upon by the impulse of Christianity. Religious experience is only that part of the current of our common life that is concerned with religion. But the investigation of that consciousness is essential, for the sake of the data that constitute the base of our system of belief. The facts must speak for themselves,—the facts of the growing religious consciousness of mankind, if we are to have a developing religion. The record of this expanding consciousness is the history of religion. The relation of the facts to the thought of the age about the world in general constitutes the philosophy of religion.

A philosophy of religion therefore is not a mere metaphysic. Neither is it a history of the development of a faith,—even though it take account of the reigning world-view that constitutes the mould of thought for the writers who make its literature. Neither is it a psychology taken alone. It is rather all three of these, reverently interpreted, and systematically related.

The history of modern thought is largely a record of the conflict of these various points of view. The attitudes of various thinkers are represented under the heads of idealistic philosophy, with notable reference to those of Kant and Hegel. The significant contribution of Schleiermacher, the real founder of modern theology, and the extreme position of Ritschl are noted. The outstanding achievements of the higher critical movement are sketched from the Leben Jesu of Strauss to the encyclopaedic work of Harnack in his Dogmengeschicte. The sciences, with the abortive attempt of Comte, Naturalism, Agnosticism, and the tremendous stimulation of thinking occasioned by the Darwinian theory of evolution, the modified view of miracles, and the influence of the study of the social sciences upon Christianity constitute the matter of a most suggestive section. A resumé of the entire movement among English-speaking peoples from the time of the introduction of the Kantian viewpoint into England by Coleridge, and the later dynamic preaching of Carlyle, down to the present Broad-Church movement is followed by a most valuable bibliography.

The work presents in brief compass the fruit of a generation of toil. It represents the substance of modern thought. It catalogues the great names and the great books of the period. As a glance over a century, it suggests the character of modern thought by disclosing its main tendencies. As a source of information it is as accurate as a shorthand transcript could well be. As an outline, and as a guide to further reading it is admirable,—and such is its confessed purpose. Those who may read it with this last idea in mind will rejoice over an intimation contained in a prefatory note that the present volume is to serve as an introduction to a larger work wherein "the judgments here expressed may be supported in detail." The friends of Dr. Moore, and the larger circle who love the cause he serves so effectively will join in wishing to him the strength and the leisure necessary to accomplish this important task.

Editorial Table Talk

Taking Care of the Veterans

At this season we have discussed the need of caring for the retired minister, and we have all been in hopes that some persons of wealth would seize the opportunity to make the pinch of ministerial poverty less painful. Some will say that we are too young a people to do great things; there will be manifold excuses, but it is not age that we need so much as grace. Our people have plenty of money; their homes, their tastes, their luxuries attest that fact. But we have not learned the fine art of giving to the work of Christ as an investment. We are glad to chronicle an achievement among the Presbyterians, as recorded in the Continent, which should stimulate some of our own household to fellow such a worthy example.

Of all the fine things that have happened this Christmas, just about the finest, in measure of the generosity producing it and the joy which it must have produced, was the Christmas gift of $25 which went out to every beneficiary on the ministerial relief roll from the headquarters of "Relief and Sustentation" at Philadelphia. Just before Christmas the board came into possession of the large Kortright legacy, which carried with it about $30,000 of accrued interest, and to the new secretary, Dr. Foulkes, the windfall immediately brought the happy inspiration of this Christmas gift idea. The board approved, and the unexpected interest money supplied the means for a $25 check that went, with a card of Christmas greeting, to every annuitant.

The actual money value of the remembrance made the act a handsome one, but more significant than that is the touch of thoughtful personal kindness which so effectually obliterates all the air of institutional charity from this sacred relation between the Presbyterian Church and the veterans among those who have left all to follow the Lord in its ministry.

The first big gift toward the $10,000,000 endowment of Relief and Sustentation since the new board was organized came into the hands of Dr. Foulkes last week—$75,000 from a giver in New York City, whose name is imparted confidentially to the board alone. Inasmuch as this gift is tendered before Dr. Foulkes has formulated any general plan of canvas for endowment, it is a cheering token of the interest of the church in this undertaking and of confidence in the administration of the new secretary.

Methodist Growth Last Year

We are now able to state the growth of the denomination during the past year. January 1, 1912, the Methodist Episcopal Church had the following members:

Probationers	321,921
Total	3,518,099

The year 1913 sees the following figures:

Probationers	319,930
Members in full	3,287,959
Total	3,607,889

This shows an increase during the past year of sixty-four thousand one hundred and ninety. We have 30,439 churches. This makes a net increase of a trifle over two to each church in the connection. There is an investment in church and parsonage property of two hundred and twenty-five million dollars.

We may say all we please about the number we lose by death. withdrawals, loss by not depositing church certificates, etc., etc.; but after all there is that in these figures which should cause our people great searching of heart. Suppose we each ask ourself this question: "Where is the fault? How much of the fault is in my own heart and in my own record during the past year?" These figures are not calculated to make any man write articles or declaim as to what others may be doing or may not be doing. For the average additions are only two per church. Let him that is without fault then cast the first stone.—Central Christian Advocate.

Other People's Business

We are living in an age of specialization. The field of knowledge has grown quite too fast for any one man to attempt proficiency in many departments at once.

But it also is an age in which every man is meddling with every other man's business. Almost every successful man is cultivating some pet avocation. The successful banker is spending part of his accumulated wealth in an unsuccessful attempt to raise chickens. The novelist whose stories sell by the hundred thousand copies cares little for his works of fiction, but goes from one publishing house to another with a manuscript on astronomy which no one is willing to publish. The successful man of business dabbles in farming, and the farmer is experimenting on rainy days with a flying machine which he is building in the woodshed, and the successful inventor aspires to be an author, and the author is dabbling in real estate, and the real estate man is aspiring to be a lawyer, and the lawyer is writing poetry in his spare hours, and the poet is a political economist, and the political economist is crying back to the land and saving up his money to buy a farm, and almost everybody, no matter what his vocation, is thinking it altogether easy and quite desirable to be a preacher.

This universal meddling of everybody in everybody's else business is in part a reaction from the over-specialization of our time. People are not willing to settle down contentedly in the narrow groove which the industrial conditions of our time have forced upon them. The human mind demands variety of employment.

The Killing Habit Not Dying Out

The killing habit in Chicago is growing instead of dying out. The coroner reveals that in the last twelve months there were 237 homicides in Cook county, of which fourteen occurred outside the city limits. London, with a population three times that of Chicago, reported only thirty-three in 1910. Of the 237 homicides, a coroner's jury decided 168 were murders and recommended that the perpetrators be held to the grand jury. The murder record for November had several distinguishing features, among which are the following: More murders last November than in any November in the fast eight years. More murders in November than in any of the last ninety-six months, with only two exceptions. More murders in the last three months—November, October, and September—than in the same three months in the last eight years. More persons killed by shooting last November than in any November in five years. As many persons choked, beaten, and kicked to death in November as in the preceding four Novembers. There will be perhaps thirty-two persons convicted as a result of the 168 deaths, which a coroner's jury has decided are murder. The police probably will be unable to get evidence to convict a larger number, if the record of the department for years back is any criterion of their present or future efficiency.

The Heaven of the Mediums

Still groans the patient press, and among the books of its making of which there is no end comes now and then one bringing us the last news received by wireless through the spirit mediums. One of these dreamy contributions to current literature lies now upon the desk. The mediums have been at their business now for something more than half a century, ever since the Fox Sisters learned how to tip tables without being caught at it, and it is pathetic to note what pitiful trivialities come to us through them from the other world inhabited by our blessed dead, if these indeed are their communications to their living friends. Out of this paradise of pettiness, this elysium of the everlasting commonplace, comes this last series of revelations, whose principal messages are from the victims of the Titanic. The medium is in communication with Major Butt and with Mr. and Mrs. Strauss, but up to the hour of going to press had not been able to locate Mr. Astor. A book of this kind affords us one more occasion for sorrow that the Titanic should have sunk.

The Church Can Do It

The church can do the work to which she is set in the world. There is no doubt about this in the minds of those who read her commission in the words of the Lord who gave her the final command. The church has not saved the world yet; but that does not mean that she has failed. She probably will not redeem society within the next generation; but this does not mean that she will have failed. The work is great; the task is terrible. The fair way in which to judge the church is to test her as to what she has accomplished and to take courage from this. When the preachers get together they are inclined to bewail their problems and to belittle their successes. The better and braver way is to recount their victories and to take a new hold on the promises of God. The Father is not forsaking his children. The ancient word of assurance is still valid. The church is the only thing in the universe that is big enough and brave enough to face the modern world and demand that it obey God. The church can do it.

Big Brothers

There is a call for a new order and a new crusade. It is not a call for men who will go out and rescue the tomb of the Lord from unbelievers. The crusade is not to be fought with swords and pikes. The call is for men who will be big and brave enough to become real brothers to those who stand in need of a friend. The demand is for men in offices who will be as truly courteous to the janitor and the elevator man as they are to the boss and the superintendent. There are lads in the offices who need a big friend who will stand by them in the times when they are tempted to be mean; who will show them the values of life in their true proportions and be towers of strength in the times when the battle goes hard. It is more important to have men for such service than it is to have volunteers for great enterprises or champions ready for martyrdom. It is the day of the big brother. Will you join?

—A church census taken by one of the daily papers of Liverpool is discussed at length by the English religious weeklies with some concern over its unfavorable showing. Ten years ago a similar census was taken and as compared with that the Anglicans are credited with 58,000 worshipers, a decline of 9,900; Nonconformists, 52,400, a decline of 14,200; Roman Catholics, 38,200, an increase of 2,900; and various missions, 12,000, an increase of 3,200. Congregationalists show a decline of 1,850, the English Presbyterians of 1,500, the Welsh Calvinistic Methodists 400, the Primitives 150, and the United Methodists 700. The Wesleyans are practically the same, the attendance of 2,300 in the Central Hall saving the position of many circuit chapels. The English Presbyterian Church of Wales shows an increase of 700. There is thus a total decline, according to the official estimates, of about 7,000 in the regular Nonconformist churches. The Roman Catholic increase is about parallel with that of the population, their morning attendance is larger than the evening, and not one service shows fewer than 100 worshipers. The Church of England has suffered severely all over the city, not less in some of the old residential districts than in the down-town churches. The few gains are almost entirely in growing suburbs. The heaviest losses are at the morning services, these amounting to about 25 per cent, while the evening loss is about 10 per cent.

—The British Congregationalist expresses serious disappointment over the attitude of Premier Asquith on temperance legislation. The premier's plea is that there are so many other urgent reforms that temperance must be pronounced insufficient. "It is all very well," says the editor, "for the prime minister to say that there are arrears to work off in regard to the education question and other matters. We agree. But what guarantee have we that this suggested pledge is likely to be fulfilled during the life of the present Parliament? It is our considered opinion, as it is that of numberless temperance workers throughout the country, that there is no question quite so vital to the nation at large from a physical, moral, and spiritual standpoint as licensing reform. We go further, and say that until this question is tackled, and that firmly and honestly, by the liberal party, all other measures of social amelioration, such as those of wages, better housing, and education will fail to have their full beneficial effect."

—Moving pictures will shortly be introduced into China. Dr. Yen Mi Yen-loy, a graduate of the University of Tokio, will take with him when he sails from New York, in a few days, several thousand feet of film and several moving picture men, who will instruct the Chinese in the operation of the machines. Some months ago Dr. Yen was commissioned to seek in America that one invention which, not already known to the Chinese, in his judgment would bring the greatest good to that country. Dr. Yen declared that he considered the "movies" to be the most wonderful American invention of recent years.

—Temperance people take notice, Major General Wood, chief of staff of the United States army, has come out in favor of the canteen. "The great majority of the officers of the army," says General Wood, discussing the canteen question, "are of the opinion that the re-establishment of the canteen under proper supervision would tend to improve the health, discipline and efficiency of the service through dismissing intemperance and immorality. I concur in this opinion."

—The mother's pension law in Chicago is not working well. It is abused and the money sometimes goes to the wrong parties. It is even asserted that instances have come to light where the women who are drawing these pensions from the county come for them in taxicabs, and that a number of imposters are on the lists.

—Prof. Irving Fisher of Yale declared last week that all college men drink too much. "Every college man, whether he comes from Harvard, Yale, or any other college, in my opinion drinks too much," he said. "Colleges should set the moral example. As it is today Harvard and Yale follow the crowd."

The Lamp Lighter

My tea is nearly ready and the sun has left the sky;
It's time to take the window to see Leerie going by;
For every night at tea-time and before you take your seat,
With lantern and with ladder he comes posting up the street.

Now Tom would be a driver and Maria go to sea;
And my papa's a banker and as rich as he can be;
But I when I am stronger and can choose what I'm to do,
O Leerie, I'll go round at night and light the lamps with you!

For we are very lucky, with a lamp before the door,
And Leerie stops to light it as he lights so many more;
And O! before you hurry by with ladder and with light;
O Leerie, see a little child and nod to him tonight!

—Robert Louis Stevenson.

Window Dressing

By An Observer

It may be true that "Good wine needs no bush" but it is only true with certain qualifications. In the actual conduct of business it has been found that a big bush will for a time sell poor wine while good wine without any advertising bush may lie long uncalled for in the cellar. It is confessed that advertising is not only a necessity but has become well nigh an art and nowhere has that art reached a higher degree of effectiveness than in American cities.

In the construction of a modern store the first requisite for which provision is made is that of adequate display. The window space is immense, the glass exquisitely clear. A back-ground is provided which either by its arrangement of mirrors or by its combination of colors, heightens the effect of the exhibit. A specialist, or in the great establishments half a dozen of them, must be secured: and night and day these adepts at catching the public eye study how so to arrange the wares for sale that they may produce the best commercial results. New features are invented and constant change is the rule. Thousands of dollars are spent upon electric plants so as to give brilliancy to studied arrangements. Startling combinations are devised and passing events are mirrored in tableaux which transform windows from blossoming orchards to wide sea-beaches and Christmas forests as the seasons change. The whole world is ransacked for novelties, and success or failure is guaged by the footings of the journals which record the day's sales.

Not Up To Sample.

But it cannot be denied that window dressing is an art very liable to abuse. Every citizen of any city comes to recognize the fact that certain establishments have more in their windows than they have upon their shelves, and that the sample does not truthfully represent the stock. The customer who expects to purchase a pair of shoes at the counter exactly like those shown in the window and marked at $3.49, is probably from the rural districts. That pair has been used for window dressing two or three years. They are an unusual size, and even should you insist upon having that particular pair brought to you the chances are 99 to 1 that they wouldn't fit. There may be others in the store just as good, but you will pay more than $3.49 for them if you get them.

Borrowed Display.

And, "tell it not in Gath, publish it not in the streets of Askelon," but a part of the stock in the window is borrowed for the occasion. One week it will delight thousands in New York city; a week later we shall wonder at its splendors in Chicago and a month hence it will be the joy of the shopper in San Francisco. We begin to suspect that there is some sort of a window dressers' union, or perhaps we should say "syndicate," so regular are the trips which these elegantly gowned figures make from city to city. Who owns them it would be difficult to say. But they serve their purpose and "contribute to the joy of nations" as the reporters say. It would do no good to be too curious. But as we turn away from admiring these wonderful creations of the window dresser's genius we return to our office harboring some "long, long thoughts," and they take this form.

Absent Treatment.

A few years ago a dear neighbor of ours, with youth and natural vigor in her favor, died of a not incurable disease, without medicine or skilled nursing or rational care. She was supposed to be receiving "absent treatment" from one professing to possess gifts of healing. But she died in unrelieved suffering from sheer neglect. And when some time later we dropped into the main establishment where the school responsible for her death has its headquarters, we found the walls plastered all over with crutches and splints and trusses and spectacles, visibly attesting the miraculous powers of the cult. The window display would have impressed us more profoundly had we not already sampled the stock!

Appropriated Sermon.

The other day we heard a ministerial brother preach a trial sermon in a city pulpit. It was an excellent sermon, well digested, well presented. The thought was fresh, the language beautiful and clear. The only trouble with it was we had it all in a book before this man preached it, and it was there shown under another man's name. The candidate had considerable art as a window dresser, but it was evident he had borrowed the best part of his exhibit. We once thanked most sincerely and effusively an evangelist for a remarkable sermon—which we later discovered in Moody's volumes.

Poor Policy.

On the whole it is a poor policy to put more in the window than one can duplicate from the stock. Because "there is a new crop of fools born every year" it will not do to presume that the whole public is so composed. Some of last year's fools have come to the age of discernment this year, and it is manifestly unsafe to presume upon their forbearance. In the long run the merchant, the healer and the orator are all called upon to "make good;" and if his stock does not correspond with his window he is doomed. The art of window dressing has made as many bankrupts as millionaires. That which may lead the honest man to success only lures the pretender to his destruction. And both merchant and moralist may find food for profitable reflection in the different results which experience shows flow from veracious or meretricious "window dressing."

The Passing and the Permanent

By G. Campbell Morgan

"The world passeth away, and the lust thereof; but he that doeth the will of God abideth for ever."—1 John ii. 17.

There is a perpetual dissimilarity in the consciousness of man, between his surroundings and himself. Everything around is changing, while man is forever crying out for permanence. Whether we think of the great powers of the world, of the knowledge of human life, of the pleasures of men, of the occupations of the days, of the friends whom we hold dear, or ultimately of ourselves so far as we are of the material universe, we cannot escape this sense of change.

If we think of knowledge, human philosophies are forever changing; so that the wisdom of to-day is busy dealing with the folly of yesterday's wisdom, and preparing to be dealt with in the same way by the wisdom of to-morrow. The moment we have completed our building, the greatest and the finest, old mother nature, with mossy fingers, commences the work of destruction. Yet through these very channels of perpetual change man is expressing his passion for the permanent, his desire for the abiding.

In this word taken from the first letter of the apostle John the fact of passing is faced and quietly declared. But that is not the principal declaration of the text. The writer of the letter declares that there is a mode of life in which man becomes superior to all change; not a place, where he can escape it, but a mode of life, in which he is superior to it. "The world passeth away, and the lust thereof," for the Christian man as well as for the worldly man. The world passeth away from the grasp of the saint, as surely as from the grasp of the sinner. But there is a mode of life which makes the human soul superior to these changes. "He that doeth the will of God abideth for ever." Everything around that man will continue to change, but he will have found the secret that makes him master of the changing things, and enables him to apprehend the true values of them, and then to be independent of them as they pass, while he himself remains.

No Greater Conception.

There is surely no greater conception than this, nothing to be more desired by those who are now looking forth upon life, those who see all the lights and glories of life flaming upon the sky of the morning, but who yet are already conscious, sometimes with a haunting fear and dread, that the things upon which their hearts are being set are already tarnished, are already fading, are already passing away. There can be nothing of more importance than that these should discover the secret of permanence in the midst of things that pass and perish.

I do not propose to argue this. I propose rather to start upon the assumption of the truth of the apostolic declaration; and therefore,

First, let us consider the statement of the apostle as a philosophy of life. Secondly, let us enquire whether that philosophy is practicable.

If the doing of the will of God is the highest philosophy of human life, it must answer a threefold demand of human life. It must answer the demand of the human soul for perfection. It must answer the demand of the human soul for happiness. It must answer the demand of the human soul for permanence. This threefold demand comes up out of the very necessity of human nature. The demand of humanity is for the realization of life, for the perfecting of itself. So that if a man shall say to me that the will of God is the true law of life, I shall enquire. Will doing the will of God realise the possibilities of my own life at their highest and at their best? That is the first demand.

We Demand Happiness.

Secondly, the demand of humanity is a demand for happiness. I am told that the passion for pleasure manifest everywhere to-day is an evil sign. That which is evil is the method by which men are attempting to attain pleasure, not the passion for pleasure. The passion for pleasure in the human heart harmonizes with the intention of God for the human soul. When I find my way to the apocalyptic literature at the end of the Bible, with its symbolism and high mystic note, I read, "God shall wipe away all tears from their eyes," which is a fine, poetic way of declaring that God will fill the mouth with laughter, and the tongue with singing. I read in the very same literature that sorrow and sighing are to flee away and be no more. I remember that our Lord struck the keynote of the whole ethic of the kingdom of God in that one strangely suggestive and beautiful word "Happy," which we translate "Blessed." Wherever men are seeking for happiness, seeking for pleasure, they are making a demand which comes up out of their own nature, a nature fashioned and formed in its essential facts by God himself.

In Revolt Against Death.

Humanity also demands permanence. Man is in revolt against death. Even the glory of the Christian fact that transfigures the sackcloth has never robbed death of its terror, nor has it been intended so to do. It takes out of the heart of the Christian the sense of terror because the Christian has heard Christ say, "Whosoever liveth and believeth on me shall never die"; but death in itself remains that against which the heart of man is in revolt.

Any law of life which is to be perfect must be one that answers this threefold demand. It must answer my demand for the perfection of my life. It must give me pleasure for which I have been created. It must assure me of permanence in spite of the passing of everything around me.

"He that doeth the will of God abideth forever." Involved in that declaration is the answer to every demand.

I demand perfection. "He that doeth the will of God abideth forever." The things that pass and perish are the things that in themselves are imperfect, or having fulfilled their vocation become effete. How wonderfully to-day God through nature is purging his floor. All the glory of these autumn tints, what are they but the flaming signs and symbols of the slowly burning fire in nature which is consuming everything effete, and cleansing the floor in preparation for the new processes of life in the springtime of the coming year? Wherever you look, the thing that passes is the thing that in itself is imperfect. The measure of permanence is always the measure of perfection. This is revealed in that old and now hackneyed phrase, useful for the light it gives us at this point because it reveals the law of the universe, which is the law of God, the survival of the fittest. John, the mystic, the interpreter of life, having learnt its secret as he leant his head upon the bosom of the Lord of life, declares that it is the man who does the will of God who comes to that perfection which ensures permanence in the universe of God.

He Knows Us.

Why is this so? Because if a man does the will of God he is thereby perfected, because the will of God is the will of the One and only One who knows man perfectly, and consequently is able to make the law of his life.

No man can make a law for his brother. That is why all human laws break down and fail. That is why we can never cover, in any Act of Parliament, all the necessities for which we desire to legislate. We cannot know the mystery of humanity. We do not understand the mystery of a single human being, and consequently, our law for a human being can never be perfect. It is equally true that a man's law for himself will break down. In the days of youth, days in the midst of which many of you find yourselves, we made laws for ourselves. In such days I made my programme, and my plan; my rules and regulations; wrote them with great care, and emphasised them with red ink; hung them up in my own private room; and within a month tore them down because I had broken most of them. Why? Because the rules I had fashioned for myself could not include myself; I was more than all of them, and less than any of them. I have no problem, so help me God, at this moment, quite so perplexing as myself.

Let Me Find That Law.

What, then, am I to do? The God in whose hand my breath is, and whose are all my ways, who fashioned me curiously in the hidden mystery of the days ere any of my members had taken form; the God who understands my thought afar off; he has a will for me, a law for me, a plan for me. Then, if I can but find that will, that law, that plan, I shall find the will, the law, the plan which result from a perfectly accurate knowledge and understanding. God understands the mystery of my nature; its strange merging of spirit, soul, and body; understands the inter-relationships, the inter-actions, the deeps and possibilities. the very things that forever baffle me. Then let me find that law, that I may obey it, that will, good and perfect and acceptable, that I may walk in it; for only by discovering these shall I discover the secret of perfection.

Again, the demand of humanity is for happiness, for pleasure. The will of God is the will of perfect love. This is the lesson we have not perfectly learnt. Love is not an attribute of Deity; it is the essence of Deity. All the attributes are homed within it, and are but expressions of it. Love is the fact of God. God is love. Therefore, the inspiration of all the activities of God is love. The creation of man in the economy of God is the activity of Divine love. His purpose in the being of man is the purpose of love.

Love and Wrath.

We can only understand this fact if we put into contrast with the laws of men, or the laws which we draw up for the government of our own lives. These may have in them some admixture of motive. God has no motive other than that of love. The wrath of God is an expression of the love of God. Is that a hard and difficult saying? I pray you come where alone we can see God, to the life-story of the Son of God, and finds its proof in some of the great stories of his anger. He could be angry with an anger that was quiet, but intense, scorching, terriffic. There are things chronicled in these gospels which passed the lips of Jesus, which, though they are translations from another language, and words preserved for two millenniums, I never read, as God is my witness, without trembling. When you have found the words that record the manifestation of his anger, read further, read all round, get at the secret, and you will find that behind all the anger is love. Let me take one very simple and not too familiar illustration. When Jesus said "Suffer the children to come unto me" he was angry. I know we do not recite it in that way, and I do not know whether we dare recite it in that way, but the fact remains that the very first word had in it the thrill of terriffic rebuke, "Suffer the children to come unto me, and forbid them not." Why was he angry? Because his own disciples so misunderstood him as to try to prevent the bairns from getting to him. Or listen to words in which his anger is more patently manifest: Woe unto you . . . whited sepulchres . . . hypocrites." Why? Because they devoured widows' houses, and bound burdens upon men that they could not bear. The "woe" was the wail of a stricken heart! Look wherever you will, you will find that the deepest truth is the truth of the love of God. Therefore, only the highest good and the highest happiness of man can satisfy the heart of God.

In Himself Eternal.

Once again, to touch upon what is the actual declaration of the text; if the will of God is indeed best, it must not merely ensure my perfection and my joy, it must answer this craving of my heart for permanence. Here again the answer is in the fact of what God is in himself; not only my Creator, knowing me perfectly; not only in himself love and therefore seeking my joy; but in himself eternal. Consequently, his thought takes in the sum of all things. No contingency can surprise him. P. P. Bliss, the sweet gospel singer of a generation ago, was killed in a railway catastrophe. When they opened his portfolio, they found that before the accident and the dying, he had been engaged in writing music, and these were the words to which he had been writing the music:

"I know not what awaits me;
God kindly veils mine eyes.
. . . . . .
I'd rather walk in the dark with God,
Than go alone in the light."

If in this hour we could talk to Bliss in the light, he would tell us that what was accident on the human level, was also within the Divine economy for him; the mystery of apparent catastrophe, but leading to something out of our sight so wonderful, that when he came to it he knew that God's over-ruling was of love and was beneficent. This is the light and glory upon many things that baffle the soul. A young medical missionary but a few months ago went back to China full of the conviction that a mighty work awaited him; within the past ten days his widow and wee bairnies have come home, having left his sacred dust in a grave in that land. Accident? I refuse to believe it. When bye and bye I shall talk to Philip Rees on the other side, I shall understand that even that thing, so strange to human appearance, was within the economy of God; for within that economy, every method baffling our present understanding, pain and suffering and darkness, are angel ministers co-operating to the perfecting of the permanence of those who put their trust in him.

It Must Be Practicable.

If indeed the will of God is best, because, he being Creator it ensures my perfection, he being love it ensures my joy, He being eternal it ensures my permanence; is it possible? If this is really the highest philosophy of life it must be practicable. A great deal of nonsense is talked by some people about high ideals. For instance: I am told the Sermon on the Mount is a high ideal, which men cannot obey, but that they are meant to aim at it. An ideal that cannot be realized ceases to be an ideal. If an ideal is not practicable, it is not an ideal. It is a mirage, a mockery, and men will turn their backs upon it sooner or later.

Is it practicable? It is; and that for three reasons to be broadly stated only. First, because of the nature of it; secondly, because he reveals it; finally, because he communicates to every man who is willing to obey, the power to obey.

With every command he gives power. When he bids me walk in a certain pathway, he accompanies his command with power and ability to walk therein. When he commands that I abandon a habit, he gives me power to abandon the habit. When he calls me to some high service that my soul dreads, he enables me for the service. That is the meaning of the Cross, and of Resurrection, and of Pentecost. The great progression of the Divine, activity spells enablement for weak souls, that they may in very deed do the will of God.

In the will of God man realizes life. The measure in which we have found our way into that will, and really live within it, is the measure in which we have found life. It was the sense of the breadth and joy and the permanence of the will of God that inspired that great song,

"I stand upon the mount of God,
With sunlight in my soul;
I hear the storms in vales beneath.
I hear the thunders roll.

But I am calm with thee, my God,
Beneath these glorious skies;
And to the height on which I stand,
Nor storms nor clouds can rise.

O this is life! O this is joy!
My God, to find thee so!
Thy face to see, thy voice to hear,
And all thy love to know."

MODERN WOMANHOOD

HUMAN

By Zona Gale

In the Woman's Journal.

"The other day," said Calliope Marsh, "I got hold of a history book. I don't know much history. I wish't I did. It always seems to me that folks that know how history was must get hold, somehow, of the way things was meant to be, and not be so mixed up about the way to get 'em the way they was meant to be. Well, this book had three pictures that I noticed particular. One was in Burma. Under it it said:

"'Burmese women do most of the work of Burma. There is nothing in which they don't engage.'

"'Dear me,' I thought, 'In Burma. In Burma.'

"Then I come to another picture of two women going along with their heads up, and under this one it said:

"'The women in T-h-i-b-e-t are independent and active, and aid in all the native business enterprises.'

"'Dear me,' I says, 'I don't know where T-h-i-b-e-t is, but it sounds far-off, and like women wouldn't count for much, like they never do them savage places.'

"And then I see the next picture, and it said:

"'Market women of Russia. They carry on the farm work, and walk five miles to the market with the morning's milk.'

"Now, it wan't no women's book. It was a—well, just a kind of a general world-book, with a name on it you all know, and not wrote to prove nothing much. Only to tell about us. Us. Us in the world, living in it together, and all of us so alike that it scares you. And in that book was them things about women.

"What I thought of when I see them things got me so excited that I run right over to Mis' Postmaster Sykes's, not caring whether she was baking or not. She was ironing collars, as it happened, and baking a cake same time, to save fire—a cake that she had split the receipt of, because their family is so small. Women is quite good managers, you know. And I burst right out with my thoughts all over her, and I says:

"'O, Mis' Sykes! Don't you hope you'll live to see the day when you can pitch in and work with all of you, and not just with your housework and club-work brains?'

"Mis' Postmaster Sykes was het up with her ironin', and she turns on me, witherin':

"'I suppose, Calliope,' she says, 'you're a-hankerin' for the tobacco smoke and whiskey of public life?'

"'Well,' I says, 'no. No. My brothers kept the house blue with smoke, and election day I usually see just as many drunken men when I go for my yeast as I do when I walk past the polls. No. That ain't what's troubling me.'

"But Mis' Sykes went right on.

"'I've got enough to do as it is,' she says. 'I don't want no more responsibility.'

"'You've got it a'ready,' I says, blunt. 'I guess you mean you don't want to acknowledge that you have,' I says, some direct.

"'I've got my housework an' my marketing, an' my church, and the girls in school, and my club,' says she. 'If you want me to have any more'n that to see to, I might as well drop in my tracks now, to save time.'

"'Your house. An' your marketing. An' your church. An' the girls in school. An' your club,' I says. And I was all ready and dying to say some more, when in the back door come Silas, her husband, looking some excited.

"'Don't you put none of that pot-roast on the table I sent up last night,' says he, worried. 'We ain't et any of it, have we?'

"'No,' says Mis' Sykes. 'It's for dinner.'

"'Well,' says he, 'throw it out. The Hornings is all down sick with it this morning,' says Silas, 'an' they lay it to the meat. Ptomaine, the doctor names it,' says Silas, pronouncing of the p.

"'I ain't surprised,' I says, 'at anything that happens out of Joe Betts's meat market. Have you been in the back room? Well, his back room is a sight—a living sight. I told him so. And he said I was to mind by business. I told him it was my business, me bein' a housekeeper in this world. And I went and told the Mayor. That was three months ago. You see how much has got itself done.'

"'Well,' says Silas, 'some of us men'll look into this thing.' And he whips out the door. And Mis' Sykes turned off her stove and shook out the rest of her collars, and we started right down to see the Hornings.

"'"Your housework and your marketing to see to," thinks I, in quotation marks—but I didn't say a word.

"Half way down town we met Timothy Toplady.

"'Ain't you heard?' he says, bright.

"'About the Hornings?' says Mis' Sykes. 'Yes, we're going right down there.'

"'No. About the church,' says Timothy. 'The trustees has agreed to sell the property.'

"'They ain't decided, have they?' says I. 'I knew they was talkin' about it.'

"'Decided this mornin' to a special meetin,' says Timothy, important. 'Sold it to the new tannery folks, and netted a cool fourteen hundred on it. It'll be tore down, and we'll have to build again. We're goin' over now to look it over.'

"Mis' Sykes, she leant up against a tree.

"'Oh, my land,' she says, 'my land! Why, us ladies ain't rested yet from holding baking sales to build the old one. Why,' she says, 'I've growed to love that church like I do my own home. I feel like I'd built it, a stick at a time. I guess all us ladies does.'

"'It's too bad,' says Timothy, 'but it's a good bargain. And most of the trustees is most of the Council. And there you are.'

"He went on, and us two ladies looked at each other, heavy.

"'They'd ought not to of done it without puttin' it to a vote of all of us that's interested,' says Mis' Sykes, grievin'. 'And to all the folks with little children that's livin' around where the tannery's going to be.'

"But me—I never said a word. 'You've got your church work to see to,' I was thinking in quotation marks, in the middle of my head.

"We found the Hornings pretty sick, and nobody to do anything, and we done what we could, making gruel and stuff for 'em, and putting patches on what was the matter—when I'd been wanting for weeks—and lots of us ladies had—to prevent what was the matter in that house now. And on the way back we went around by the church, just to look at it. There it was, seeming so nice and so steepled and shingled, with the cakes and pies and bread us ladies had made all wove into the stained glass windows, invisible. And while we was a-looking at it, we heard a shout, and the children come streamin' into the street from school. And at that I looked at Mis' Sykes, kind of aback, and it was so she looked at me.

"'My land,' I says, 'the schoolhouse! It's right opposite. And all that tannery smell all day long. . . .'

"'The men never thought o' that,' says she, slow.

"'And them two lots next to the church that us ladies always thought'd do for a playground,' I says, 'I bet they're gone too—are they, Timothy?' I asked him, that just then come out of the minister's study door.

"He nodded. 'The tannery figures to go all along this block,' says he.

"'It's an upright, downright shame,' says Mis' Sykes then, all het up.

"'Your children's school—you've got your children's school to see to,' I thought then—but I never said a word.

"That afternoon was club meeting, and us ladies was all talking about it. We meet in a little committee room down in the City Hall, that we've fixed up real nice, with curtains and a rug and a table and willow chairs and a fern or two, and we'd had a gas plate put in, and we serve tea and sandwiches to country folks during the week, and leave 'em eat their own lunches and rest there. And us ladies had took lots of comfort with it.

"We was late calling to order, 'count of talking over the Hornings and the church and the school, and we was delayed still more by the secretary having a communication to read. It was from the Common Council, and this was it:

"'Secretary of the Friendship Village Married Ladies' Cemetery Improvement Sodality,

"'Dear Madam:

"'We have to inform you that the Common Council has rescinded its action in allowing you to use its committee room for club and other purposes, same to be permanently vacated thirty days from date.'

"'Its committee room!' burst out Abigail Arnold, the widow of the club. 'Ain't it my committee room some too, I'd like to know? Ain't this a city building? Didn't my taxes help build it?'

"'Didn't all our husbands' taxes help build it?' says Mis' Postmaster Sykes, then, passionate. I never see her so het up, her that is usually so cold and ladylike. 'Ain't it all ours some, that's worked all day long in this town ever since we was born?'

"Then I spoke up—I couldn't help it any longer.

"'No, ladies,' I says. 'Taxes or no taxes, it ain't ours to have, nor to use, nor to work for, excep' in ways that the men sees fit.

Neither is the church ours to help run—except as we earn money to help the men run it, up to the time that they decide to sell it. Neither is the schoolhouse ours to manage—so but what a tannery can be put up under our children's noses, and what we'd hoped to have for their playground built up to factory. Neither is our marketing, nor some more of our housework, ours to do, except as the men fixes up food and marketing and other things around us. Nor our club ain't ours to meet where we please, unless we're out of the men's way with our meetings—in the building that the life-long work of all of us has helped save the tax-money to put up. Oh, ladies,' I says, 'don't you see? We ain't let do our share, nor we ain't let have our share. And can't you see how we need it?'

"It was still in the room as some kind of death. Even Mis' Postmaster Sykes, she set still, and she kept still, too.

"'We've got our housework—and our church work—and our girls' schools—and our clubs to be so busy with,' I says, 'that we don't want no other responsibility. We've always had house work; but how long has it been since we begun to have the rest? Only a few hundred years since women was keeping silent in the churches, and since there wasn't no girls' schools, and since clubs was called "unwomanly." We've fought for 'em, and we've got 'em now—a little. But we ain't able to do 'em yet—not even our old-time housekeeping and marketing, full and free and right and healthy, because our hands is part tied. They're tied about half the things that most concerns us. Oh, it can't be unwomanly to tend to these things right. It can't be that the job is a man's job alone. Nor yet a woman's job alone. It's a human job. It's our job—everybody's. I can't hardly wait to get at it.'

"I was afraid I'd said too much. I'm always afraid I will say too much when I get thinking about what women could be—if they only knew they could. And that night I opened up my history book again, just to make sure of what I'd said—and to make sure of the world.

"Yes! There they was in Burma, in T-h-i-b-e-t, in Russia—and in Europe and America: Women alive and awake and stirring, in business, in education, in all toil, in motherhood. In one country they let 'em do one set of things and they mustn't do another set. And in another country they can do another set of things and mustn't do the first set. But nobody seems able to take a look clean around the world and say:

"'Why, my land, you women, you're human. You've got brains and heart and spirit. Why not throw the whole thing open, and leave you go in and work all the places there is work to do, human? Human.'"

THE VISITING NURSE ASSOCIATION OF CHICAGO

There are charities and charities in the big city of Chicago and no one knows more about them than the newspaper woman. Year after year she is called upon to investigate their work, discover their weaknesses and limitations and arouse with her pen the generously inclined citizens of the city. Every phase of philanthropic work done here soon becomes familiar to her and she can tell you at once the names of all the men and women who really do good and those who think they do. When her paper tells of the suffering and distress of some poor little family she knows a certain wealthy woman over on the Lake Shore Drive who will immediately mail a large check for the needy ones and she knows the club or church who will quickly phone in to know what they can do to help. In the assignments, too, which take her all over the city to tenements, down dark alleys, into lodging houses, the ghetto and the slums, she knows just where the most wretched poverty and misery can be found and what is being done to alleviate it.

Every Side of Philanthropy.

With some knowledge of the subject I can most sincerely say that one of the most needed as well as beautiful forms that charity takes in this city is done through the Visiting Nurse Association. The work it does embraces almost every side of philanthropy and carries with it wheels within wheels of good accomplished. For instance over in the southwest side of the city a visiting nurse on her daily rounds discovers away up in the attic of a squalid tenement an old woman dying of cancer. Old and sick unto death as she is, she has been until this time the bread winner for her little grandchildren whose father has deserted them and whose mother is dead. Lying helpless and racked with pain she has to watch these children crying with cold and hunger until the day the Visiting Nurse finds her. This ministering angel takes her pocket book and flies to the nearest grocery store for food, sending a neighbor boy off to some yard for a couple of buckets of coal. These purchases she enters into her daily expense account. Then she hurries to the nearest sub-station of the Association and from the loan chest procures medicine, clean linen, hot water bag and other remedies needed for the sick woman. That night she communicates the condition of this family to the United Charities or some relief association who will immediately take care of them. Perhaps in a maternity case she finds that the poor little new baby hasn't any clothes so she calls upon some sewing circle in a club or church to provide the much needed outfit. Every form of distress and need she encounters in a home she soon finds a way to remove. The funds necessary for this work are raised by private subscription among the wealthy women of the city. No bridge parties, bazaars or entertainments of any kind are given to secure the money needed. Twenty-five thousand dollars will endow a nurse for life and the families of Marshall Field, Cyrus McCormick and others equally prominent have made such a bequest in memoriam of some loved one who has passed away.

Sixty Trained Nurses.

"We have today," says Mrs. Arthur T. Aldis, president of the Board of Directors, "sixty trained nurses on our staff, going their rounds daily in every part of the city. During the year 1911 these nurses made 159,995 visits in 47,339 homes. The city is divided into seven districts and each one has a sub-station where the nurse gets the calls which have been telephoned there from the main office down town. At these stations are loan closets, containing cot beds, clean linen, wheel chairs, surgical and sick room necessities, baby outfits and other needful articles to the number of almost 20,000. Calls are received by telephone generally from the county agent, county doctors, United Charities, health department, settlements, hospitals, ex-patients and private individuals. Wherever and whenever a destitute sick person is found the visiting nurse is summoned. Our nurses are not allowed to diagnose or prescribe save a few simple, harmless remedies, nor may they attend a case save under the doctor's direction. Without regard for race, color, religion or disease, contagious though it may be, the nurse goes on her errand of mercy.

"An important feature of the work is the employment of our nurses by companies with large numbers of employes, to give care to the operatives and their families in the homes. Here again the reason is both humane and economic. You, of course, know that many unskilled laborers are compelled to work for wages which leave no margin for the unexpected. Among the poor, the expense of sickness is rarely provided for. Thus in our industries there will always be many to whom help must be given for humanity's sake when sickness comes. At present the International Harvester Company has three of our nurses. Montgomery Ward and the Illinois Steel Company each one. We charge these companies the exact cost to us, namely, $1,200 a year. This includes the nurse's salary, uniform, car fare, (no small item, as we spent $7,000 in car fare last year,) and all necessary supplies. The Metropolitan Life Insurance Company supports fourteen nurses who care for their small policy holders. Our nurses cover every ward in the city and yet for twenty-two years two-thirds of our expenses have been borne by about thirty individuals.

Chicago's Needs.

"In our work, we of the Visiting Nurses Association, have become peculiarly conscious of Chicago's needs, which I would like to name to remind the public to use its influence whenever possible to meet them.

"We want stricter enforcement by a larger force of inspectors for housing laws. We want cleaner milk for our babies, from tuberculin tested cows. We want obligatory birth registration. We want open air schools and still more open spaces and play grounds. We want a United Charities building where we could all work together without waste of time and energy. We want perfected social service for out-patient and follow-up work in connection with every free hospital and dispensary. We want the science of eugenics to be studied and mastered and put into effect, so that we shall not have the degenerate and foredoomed sufferers to care for that we have now.

"Some one has defined 'truth' as 'that which has got itself believed by me,' and a truth which 'gets itself believed' by every worker in the social field, but one which we need to keep constantly in mind is, that much of the present effort of time, labor, and money expended by private charities and individuals would be saved were the municipality, the state and the federal government to enact and enforce more laws looking towards the conservation of human energy. Slowly this is being done, but so slowly! Meanwhile, we struggle on, doing what we can of educational and preventive work and a great deal of purely palliative work, while back of this wide impulse to relieve pain, to feed the hungry, to comfort the afflicted, is the increasingly strong conviction that part of our energies, perhaps the larger part, should be bent toward the elimination of causes if the burden of relief is not to become too great to be upborne."

—Evelyn B. Longman, who lately won the $50,000 commission for a monument to the late Senator Allison in an anonymous competition held at Des Moines, Ia., is a native of Michigan and studied in the art department of Olivet college, then going to the Chicago art institute for a year. In 1899 she went to New York with a capital of $40 and worked under Daniel French. Her first large work, "Victory," crowned the dome of Festival hall at the St. Louis exposition. She has been specially successful in competitions, and her first substantial reward was a $20,000 commission for the bronze doors of the chapel of the United States naval academy at Annapolis, which she won in competition with 33 men.

—Miss Violet Asquith, daughter of the prime minister of Great Britain, and Lady Isabel Maria, Countess of Aberdeen, wife of the lord lieutenant of Ireland, have been in Washington, the guests for a few days of the British ambassador and Mrs. Bryce. Many entertainments and social functions have been arranged in their honor.

—Mrs. Jacob H. Schiff has presented to the Young Women's Hebrew Association, New York, an outright gift of $180,000 to complete the fund of $250,000 required for the erection of a new building. The new home of the association will be eight stories high and will be up-to-date in every detail.

—Two women have been proposed for places in the cabinet of President Elect Wilson, one of them for the portfolio of secretary of war. This disclosure was made when Mr. Wilson was asked if the suffragists had suggested any names of women for cabinet positions.

Pine Bluff, Ark., church, C. C. Cline, pastor, will erect a $20,000 house of worship this year.

Prof. A. M. Haggard, of Drake University, officiated at the dedication of a new house of worship for Chesterfield Church, Des Moines, Ia., Jan. 5. E. Weaver is pastor.

E. D. Salkeld, pastor at Chicago Heights, is the new president of the Chicago Disciples' Ministerial Association, succeeding George H. Brown, who recently removed from the city to Taylorville, Ill.

First Church, Keokuk, Ia., raised a grand total of $3,668.95 for Christian purposes during the year 1912. R. W. Lilly, the pastor, reported a net gain in membership of twenty-seven persons, with a total active resident membership of 286. This church will entertain the Iowa State Convention next summer.

The annual meeting of West Fourth Ave. Church, Columbus, O., shows that over $1,000 was given for missions during the past year. The Sunday-school enrolls 756 and averages over 400 in attendance. T. L. Lowe, the pastor, is just closing his fourth year with the church. During this time the church debt of $3,000 has been paid and the building much improved for the accommodation of the growing Sunday-school. A larger building is needed to care for the thriving work. There have been 314 additions in the four years.

Fulton, Mo., church, T. E. Winter, pastor, reports 106 accessions during the year, seventy-two by baptism. Present membership is 767, including non-residents. The Sunday-school has been thoroughly graded. Written examinations are held quarterly and the school is fast becoming a real educational institution. Present enrollment is 437 with an average attendance of 217. A total of $25,000 was raised by all departments during the year of which $19,468 was on the building fund.

The cornerstone of a new house of worship for the congregation at Lynn, Mass., was recently laid by Thomas P. Ullum, the pastor.

Macomb, Ill., Allan T. Shaw, pastor, reports 112 accessions to the membership during the past year, of which number ninety were by baptism. The current expense receipts were the largest in the church's history.

Stuart Street Church, Springfield, Ill., Gifford Ernest, pastor, closed the year with a $110 surplus in the treasury and a total membership of 630. There were twenty-three accessions in the past nine months which marks the period of Mr. Ernest's leadership.

Miss Eve Lemert, of Kansas City, the Sunday School expert, is leading Central Church, Springfield, Mo., in a fruitful campaign. Miss Lemert always leaves a school not only greatly increased in size but firmly established in modern methods of organization and pedagogy. F. L. Moffett is pasor of Central Church.

Charles M. Fillmore, pastor Hillside church, Indianapolis, suggested, at the annual church meeting, that the congregation organize to add a "centurion band" to each department during 1913—100 additions to the membership, 100 to the Sunday-school, 100 new regular attendants at the morning and also at the evening service, etc.

The new $20,000 house at Columbus, Kans., was dedicated January 5. $5,050 was raised, to which Mr. R. A. Long, of Kansas City, added one-fourth. Mrs. Long gave $2,500 additional for a new pipe organ. Columbus was the former home of Mr. and Mrs. Long. I. N. McCash was the dedicator. L. Moore is minister.

One hundred and forty-two accessions to its membership, 100 of these by baptism, was the cause of rejoicing at the annual meeting of Maryville, Mo., church of which Claude J. Miller is pastor. For the first time in sixteen years there was a balance in the church treasury—$100 against an $800 deficit one year ago

"What Are We Here For?" asks Perry J. Rice, and answers in a series of four Sunday morning sermons to his congregation of First Church, El Paso, Tex. "What are we here for as regards Christian Doctrine," is the first topic. The others inquire "as regards Christian Ethics," "as regards Social Conditions," "as regards Our Relation to Other Churches."

First Church, Seattle, Wash., feels that the coming of W. L. Fisher to succeed J. L. Garvin, when the latter resigned to take the presidency of William Woods College last spring, was providential. There was but one open Sunday between the two pastorates The seven months of the new ministry show gratifying results. Every organization of the church closes the fiscal year out of debt. The Sunday congregations have steadily grown and there have been sixty-four accessions to the membership.

A telegram from M. L. Pontius, pastor Central Church, Peoria, Ill., says that their house of worship burned down on Jan. 7. It is understood that the church carried $12,000 insurance. On the Sunday preceding the fire $1,500, the last remnant of an old debt, was pledged by the congregation. The church is active and harmonious and will no doubt rebuild at once. Mr. Pontius is gaining the attention of the city in a remarkable fashion, according to the newspaper reports of the doings of Central Church.

Robert M. Hopkins, National Sunday-school secretary, reports that Miss Hazel A. Lewis has been appointed national superintendent of elementary departments. Miss Lewis has been Elementary Superintendent for Indiana for the past two years.

The Temple Seminary in connection with Christian Temple, Baltimore, now occupies its own house which was opened last week with an address by Rev. R. F. Humphries rector Grace and St. Peter's Episcopal Church, Baltimore. Dr. Peter Ainslie, pastor of Christian Temple, is dean of the seminary.

The Sunday-schools of Noblesville and Tipton, Ind., have been engaged in a contest for several weeks. Tipton kept firmly in the lead until the last Sunday when the Noblesville school assembled 2,225 persons and took a collection of $185, winning the contest. L. C. Howe is pastor at Noblesville and G. I. Hoover at Tipton.

Chicago's Quarterly Assembly of Disciples will be held in First Methodist Church, Sunday, Jan. 19, at 3 p. m. Mrs. Anna R. Atwater, of Indianapolis, president C. W. B. M., will be the chief speaker. Her theme will be "The Redemption of the City." O. F. Jordan will speak on "The Problem of the Suburb" and Mr. E. J. Davis of the Anti-Saloon League will speak on "The Problem of the Saloon." Dr. P. L. Prentis, the new president of the Chicago Missionary Society will preside for the first time. Two new Chicago pastors, C. G. Baker of Douglas Park and A. R. McQueen of Austin will be introduced.

Huntington, Ind., church, Elmer Ward Cole, minister, raised $13,616.19 last year of which $5,593.25 applied on the building debt and $600 went to missions. The debt has been reduced during Mr Cole's pastorate of four and a half years from $23,000 to $6,800. The congregation is determined to pay the remainder this year. The Sunday-school averaged 470 for the year. Mr. Cole preached 110 sermons, delivered seventy-five special addresses and nine lectures, conducted fifty-eight funerals and officiated at fifty-five weddings. He made 809 pastoral calls, wrote fifty-two "Breakfast Sermons" for a local daily paper, led prayer-meeting forty-eight times and taught his young men's Sunday-school class forty-seven Sundays.

Assisting Pioneer Local Federation.

Pastor Henry W. Hunter held a series of "Purpose Meetings" during the week of Jan. 5-12, in his church at Higginsville, Mo. Mr. Hunter has been giving considerable attention to the federated congregation at the little town of Alma, a few miles from Higginsville. Mention was previously made in these columns of the merging of Methodists, Baptists, Presbyterians and Disciples into this union church. Mr. Hunter recently preached two evenings and with the assistance of a "Gospel Team" of six students from the Presbyterian college at Marshall, Mo., there were twelve accessions. The denominational affiliation of the applicant is not surrendered by uniting with the union congregation. Mr Hunter admits that it seemed odd to him to be receiving Methodists, Presbyterians and Baptists just as he would Disciples, "yet I rejoiced for the opportunity," he says, and confesses that he would find joy in living in the little vilage and aiding this pioneer church to work out its big problem.

Hyde Park Church Confirms Pastor's Pledge.

The following resolutions, recommended by the official board, were unanimously adopted by the Hyde Park Church of Disciples at the regular Sunday morning service, January 5, 1913: "Whereas, our minister, Dr. Edward Scribner Ames, has stated to the mass meeting of the Disciples of Christ in International Convention assembled in Louisville, October 19, 1912, that he would urge the Hyde Park Church of Disciples, Chicago, Ill., to relinquish its living link relationship with Mr. and Mrs. G. W. Sarvis, in the Foreign Christian Missionary Society; and whereas, we repose full confidence in the judgment and motive of Doctor Ames in taking this step, therefore be it resolved: That the Hyde Park Church of Disciples being duly assembled does hereby relinquish the aforesaid relationship. The church, however, declares its purpose to continue to make the same annual contribution to the work of the Foreign Christian Missionary Society as it has made during the past two years."

"One of the Most Useful Men."

Few pastors get so far into the affections of all the people of their communities as has Frank Waller Allen in his community of Paris, Mo. The New Year's issue of the Paris Mercury publishes a splendid likeness of the Disciple minister and below it sets this appreciative word apropos of the beginning of the sixth year of his pastorate. "Paris has been fortunate in retaining his services. Aside from being the builder of a $35,000 church, one of the handsomest edifices in this part of the state, he has been a distinct intellectual acquisition to the town and in many ways, as Chautauqua promoter and as head and front of the Greyfriar movement, is one of the most useful men the town ever had in it. He is a great young preacher, is attaining fame as a writer of good fiction, and has his heart in every thing he does. May the New Year multiply his good fortune and add to the friendships which are already his. Paris likes him and is proud of him."

Signal Triumph at Youngstown, Ohio.

Central Church, Youngstown, O., rejoices greatly in the achievements of dedication Sunday, Jan. 5. The church house was thoroughly remodeled by an outlay of over $18.-000, of which amount over $11,000 was still unprovided for. George L. Snively, the money raiser, was invited to assist the pastor, William Dunn Ryan, and when the day was done, over $13,000 had been pledged. One thousand persons attended the Sunday School that day. The school is normally very large and furnished one of the most urgent reasons for the enlargement and reappointment of the building. While the building operations were in progress the trustees refused an offer of $125,000 for the property. It is said to be the most commodious and up-to-date church edifice in Youngstown. Of peculiar interest to the people was the presence of Walter S. Goode, of Lakewood, O., a former pastor, and L. G. Batman, pastor of our First Church in Youngstown. Mr. Ryan is one of the most effective leaders in the Ohio ministry. He combines great vigor and practical efficiency with scholarly discrimination. His church is peculiarly a ministering church to its community. It is purposed gradually to develop certain institutional features.

A Fifteen Year Pastorate Closed.

A large audience assembled at Third Church, Philadelphia, Dec. 30, to bid farewell to George P. Rutledge, retiring pastor, and his family, and to wish them Godspeed in their new parish, that of Broad Street Church, Columbus, O. Disciple pastors and laymen from other parts of the city, men and women of all churches in the surrounding community and representatives of other denominations from various parts of the city were present. The packed auditorium, lecture room and gallery testified to the extent and depth of affection which Mr. Rutledge's fifteen-year ministry had created. Letters were read from prominent business and professional men of the city, and from Rev. William Hutton, D. D., secretary of the Philadelphia Ministerial Union; Rev. Floyd W. Tompkins, D. D., rector Holy Trinity Episcopal Church; and Hon. John Wanamaker. A number of distinguished business men like Mr. Oliver H. Baer and Dr. Thomas E. Eldridge, one of these a Baptist and the other without church connections, came from distant parts of the city to join in the long procession that shook the pastor's hand in farewell. Seventy-two members of Mr. Rutledge's Bible-class sat in a body. The minister received substantial tokens of esteem from the church, the official board and the Bible-class, in sums of money aggregating $500, in addition to an extra month's salary. Mr. Rutledge succeeds H. Newton Miller at Broad Street Church and enters upon his work while the churches of the city are in the midst of a Billy Sunday revival.

Foreign Society News.

Mr. and Mrs. E. R. Moon sail for the Congo, February 20th on the Steamship Baltic. Their vacation had hardly expired, but owing to the great need of Africa for workers they forego a portion of their vacation term. Mr. and Mrs. C. P. Hedges sailed for the Congo, January 8th on the Oceanic. On January 17 the following missionaries sail for China: Mr. and Mrs. C. S. Settlemyer, C. H. Plopper and Miss Lulu Snyder; also Mr. and Mrs. W. H. Erskine and children for Japan.

The following new missionaries were appointed at the January meeting of the Foreign Society: Miss Lillie Proefrock, to Africa; Dr. W. A. Frymire, to Africa, and W. H. Scott, to India.

Justin E. Brown, missionary of the Foreign Society at Luchowfu, China, met with the Executive Committee in Cincinnati, January 3rd. He speaks most encouragingly of the work in that important center.

A telegram from Muncie, Ind., announcing that that church has become a Living-link in the Foreign Society has been received at the office.

The Woodland Church, Lexington, Ky., R. W. Wallace, minister, expects to double its offering for Foreign Missions, March 2d and may reach the Living-link.

When Dr. L. B. Kline, the new medical missionary to Vigan, P. I., reached his station the people began to call upon him for treatments before his goods were unpacked. He will do a splendid work in that ancient city.

The church at Collinwood, Ohio, becomes a Living-link in the Foreign Society and has already sent the first month's salary of a missionary. W. A. Harp is the minister.

A Year for Victory.

The year 1912 was one of victory for the spread of the gospel. Signal triumphs were won everywhere. Probably no one year in the history of Christianity has witnessed more significant changes. All the world is in a state of unparalleled mental and social upheaval and revolution. The nations are groping for light and calling for help. It has been a marvelous year and the hearts of the missionaries are cheered.

Our own work made splendid advances, the most encouraging since 1882 when we entered the heathen field. More baptisms during 1911-12 than in any previous year. All the educational and medical work made substantial growth. Twelve new missionaries were sent to the field and there was a general forward movement.

We now turn to the Foreign offering. It is a time for reflection and a fresh study of the New Testament for larger plans and for prayer. We should consider our relation to the great world-field and to the 175 American missionaries and the 1,085 native workers.

Our March offering supplies will aid the churches. We ask every church that believes in giving the gospel to a lost world to order supplies at once. Address, F. M. Rains, Sec., Box 884, Cincinnati, O.

know how much progress you have made in making those ideals popular; but if the new plan that you propose for the Disciples Publication Society is carried through successfully, it will be evidence indubitable that your championship has been successful indeed. The plan looks feasible to me. It only depends upon the money that you can call forth to purchase the new bonds. I wish the new enterprise success. I do not agree with you in all you say, but what you say needs to be said. It may make some of us mad, others amused, and set others questioning; but it will make us all think, and that is one of our greatest needs.

By H. J. LOKEN, Berkeley, Calif.

It seems to me the plans, if carried out, will go a long way toward realizing the ideals for which The Christian Century has fought so nobly these many years. In bringing your publishing house into organic relation to the brotherhood you will both silence the charge of competitors that the paper is a private enterprise, and also rally to your standards a host of new friends. It is in line with the new spirit of democracy and will doubtless hasten the movement of Christian unity. Accept my hearty congratulations, Brother Morrison, and when the time comes for more substantial evidence of our good will, call on us in Berkeley.

[The time has now come!—C. C. M.]

By O. F. JORDAN, Evanston, Ill.

I note with much interest and joy the important announcement concerning the reorganization of The Christian Century so that it will become the property of the brotherhood. This step will have far reaching significance in the Disciples' history. It is a well conceived plan. I am not under any illusion, however, that it will work itself. It will depend for its success upon the practical devotion of the men and women of the brotherhood who have the interest of the true plea of the Disciples at heart. The editors have simply provided us a way by which the whole brotherhood may share in the privilege of making and owning this paper and its house. It is our chance and each one of us will do his duty.

By V. W. BLAIR, N. Tonawanda, N. Y.

I most heartily congratulate you upon the epochal announcement. It has the true ring in it. "It sounds something like." Were it not for old school debts, I'd have some bonds. I may, anyway. The plan seems not only feasible but full of pleasant possibilities. I would prefer that the membership be constituted of the individual bondholders as numerous as possible. While no two of us agree on everything, I do admire and receive continual encouragement from your sincerity, frankness and freedom of utterance. There may be more cunning and greater wisdom of a certain type in other quarters, but like Josh Billings, "I'd ruther not no so much than to no so much thet ain't so."

By GEORGE W. KNEPPER, Ann Arbor, Mich.

With all my heart I congratulate you on the forward move of The Century. You are planning a wise and far-reaching thing. The day of "free lance" journalism is passing. Our brotherhood must back its papers and our papers must back the brotherhood. Brotherhood ownership and direction is the solution.

By T. E. WINTER, Fulton, Mo.

I most heartily congratulate you upon the course you have chosen. There surely is room for another brotherhood publishing house among us; and especially one having the ideals that have been characteristic of The Century Company. Your editorial, "A Constructive Newspaper," cites a record of work of which a much older religious journal might well be justly proud. While I have not found myself always in entire agreement with The Century, still I have been a faithful reader of its columns, and have greatly admired its spirit of freedom, catholicity and progress, and trust that the new basis will give it opportunity to increase its influence along these lines in the future.

By A. D. HARMON, Omaha, Neb.

I am delighted to read the plan for transferring The Century to the brotherhood. I have long thought all our publications should be owned and controlled by the brotherhood. The spirit and voice of these publications speak for the brotherhood unofficially, and for that reason should be made the official medium of the brotherhood and not the medium of individuals. The profits accrued should be dividends for evangelical purposes and not for private profit. The division of many local churches into belligerent camps to fight the problems of individual enterprises in our privately owned journals is little short of scandal. The men who have conceived and projected these journals deserve all credit, but the time has come when the unity and solidarity of our brotherhood demands the direction of her own journals. The greatest success of our publications depends upon ownership by the brotherhood. I trust you shall be able to carry the proposed plan to a successful consummation.

By WILLIAM E. ADAMS, Danville, Ill.

I am in full sympathy with all practical moves towards placing all of our publishing houses and papers under the control of a "public constituency rather than a private corporation." May divine wisdom guide.

The Divinity of Christ

BY EDWARD SCRIBNER AMES

is a popular statement of both the theological and practical truths centering in our evangelical faith in Christ.

It is scholarly, but not technical.

It lifts the problem of the nature and character of Christ out of the setting of the old-time dogmatism and places it in the light of the more empirical, human and meaningful thought of our own day.

Its Treatment of Unitarianism is original, fresh, illuminating. A single chapter entitled, "Why I am not a Unitarian" will furnish any reader, conservative or liberal, a new point of view.

It is glowing with religious earnestness. It is a living word spoken to the hearts and souls of living people.

Appreciations

Professor George A. Coe says: "These sermons display a remarkable union of intellectual boldness and spiritual warmth. I know of nothing else in print that brings out quite so clearly the positive religious values that can be reached by a rigorous application to Christian dogmas of the functional and valuational point of view. Even readers who cannot accept Professor Ames' position at all points must agree that such a book helps to clear the air, and to focus attention at the right point."

The Indianapolis News says: "One would go far to find a finer interpretation of religious thought and experience in terms of spiritual laws. Mr. Ames is emphatically a man with a message."

The Chicago Inter-Ocean says: "Six sermons full of broad humanity."

The Watchman says: "Professor Ames is avowedly a "liberal" in theology but his liberalism seems to be of a wholesome kind, in the sense that he is less concerned about doctrines and creeds than he is about service and the helping of people to their best life."

The Independent says: "Dr. Ames does not deny being a liberal, but strongly objects to being styled a 'Unitarian', quoting with enthusiasm a saying of one of the early leaders of his denomination: 'I am neither a Unitarian nor a Trinitarian, but strive to be simply a Christian.' The sermons are thoughtful, moderate in tone and straightforward in expression."

Unity says: "Those who were privileged to listen to these sermons must have found their spiritual natures quickened."

The Advance says: "These are strong, virile sermons, appealing to the reason and satisfying the heart."

Professor Edward C. Moore, of Harvard, says: "It is a very clear and convincing statement of the issue as it stands in the minds of modern men. It makes us realize how the old formulation of the question has become obsolete, no one any longer states the question in the old terms. Dr. Ames has availed himself in admirable fashion of the opportunity for a new statement of the case, and the spirit in which he writes must convey confidence and reassurance to all."

DISCIPLES PUBLICATION SOCIETY

THE DISCIPLES PUBLICATION SOCIETY is a non-profit-sharing corporation whose charter has recently been granted by the state of Illinois. It is organized for the purpose of publishing books, Sunday School literature and a weekly religious newspaper. Its profits are not to go to individuals but are to be appropriated to advance the cause of religious education, especially the higher education of the Christian ministry. The term "religious education" is regarded as an ideal common to Sunday Schools, missionary societies, colleges, seminaries and universities, and other organizations that promote Christian progress through Christian education. The New Christian Century company has agreed, by resolution adopted unanimously by the stockholders, to sell the entire assets and good will of the company to the newly organized Disciples Publication Society for the sum of $16,000 and to accept the notes of said Society for that amount. The trustees of the Disciples Publication Society have agreed to purchase the business of the New Christian Century Co. on these terms. To provide capital for enlarging the business the trustees are issuing 5 per cent bonds in the amount of $50,000, retirable after five years, to be sold to persons interested in the ideals of The Christian Century. It is believed at the present time that the entire issue will not need to be sold, but that, in addition to the bonds set aside as security for the notes to be given to the stockholders of the New Christian Century Co., not more than $25,000 of bonds must be sold. Subscriptions for the purchase of these bonds are now being solicited by C. C. Morrison and H. L. Willett, editors of The Christian Century. During Dr. Willett's absence in the Orient correspondence may be addressed exclusively to Mr. Morrison. Full information as to all details will be given upon inquiry. The essential purpose of the agreements and proposals herein described is to provide a way for the general brotherhood of the Disciples of Christ to buy the entire interest of the New Christian Century Company and to pay for it by patronizing it. The bonds and notes are to be retired out of the profits earned by the Society.

The purchasers of bonds, therefore, will stand, with the holders of notes, in the position of sustainers or supporters of the enterprise while the brotherhood's patronage is paying for it and increasing its value. The question of defining the membership of the Disciples Publication Society is still open, and upon it the organizers will be glad to receive suggestions. It is the purpose to make it thoroughly democratic and representative. The five trustees named by the charter will act for the Society until the basis of membership has been determined and the members elected.

A CAUSE RATHER THAN A BUSINESS

If The Christian Century and the Disciples Publication Society were primarily a business undertaking in which its editors or others were hoping to make financial gain, the editors could not be persuaded to personally solicit funds. But because it is not primarily a business, because all element of private gain has been eliminated, we make our appeal not to motives of profit but of loyalty. The Christian Century is the organ of a great Cause; it is the journal of an awakening church; it is the spokesman of a vital and progressive Christian faith; it is the instrument of reform in the practice of the churches; it is the trumpeter of our plea for Christian union. To support it and its house by the purchase of its bonds is, on the business side, we believe, a safe enough investment. But it is more than that: it is a piece of philanthropy as truly Christian as is an offering to the local church or a gift to foreign missions.

The Disciples Publication Society seeks support, not profit. Its ideals are those of the church, rather than of the counting-house. To purchase its bonds is not only to make a good investment but to do your part in forwarding the great Cause to which it is pledged.

Inquiries are beginning to come in on the form printed in the lower corner of this page. There are signs that personal friends and friends of the Cause for which this paper stands intend to respond not only liberally but promptly. Following is an installment of congratulatory letters, as many as our space allows this week.—THE EDITORS.

By A. I. ZELLER, Petersburg, Ill.

Accept my hearty congratulations. The announcement of the organization of the "Disciples Publication Society" is in keeping with the program and spirit of The Christian Century. It is a great "New Year's gift" to the brotherhood and I believe the Disciples will heartily endorse the plan with their support.

By CLOYD GOODNIGHT, Shelbyville, Ind.

I consider such a move a sure sign that the heroic sacrifices of the past are to be rewarded and that soon in seeing The Christiann Century perform her mission without constant financial cramping. May the years bring sane enlargement and solid, helpful efficiency as you shall continue to contribute to the life of the Disciples.

By P. J. RICE, El Paso, Tex.

I am greatly interested in your scheme for financing The Century. I hope it will work out successfully. You know I will do what I can as I always have toward increasing the patronage the Century Co. enjoys.

By J. H. FILLMORE, Cincinnati.

We are glad to see that The Christian Century may possibly become a brotherhood paper. We hope you will succeed in selling sufficient bonds. We enjoy reading The Century more than any of the papers we receive.

By S. BOYD WHITE, Lexington, Mo.

I hasten to felicitate you upon the idea and to venture that it will meet with wide and ready sympathy by a large number of loyal Disciples who have followed with interest the career of The Century under your leadership.

By FINIS IDLEMAN, Des Moines, Ia.

I have not made my reply yet to your announcement concerning the new program for The Christian Century. It appeals to me for two reasons: First, because the principle is inevitable in religious journalism. Second, the purpose toward which the dividends accruing from such brotherhood partnership are to be devoted. We were reminded last night in our city by a leader in the United Presbyterian Church that his own communion had multiplied three-fold since his seminary days; that its candidates for the ministry have been divided exactly. This is not quite true of the Disciples of Christ, but the loss we sustain by lapses from the ministry would possibly make just as sad a story. Personally, of course, I could wish that we had one great brotherhood paper. Since religious journals multiply so rapidly and one finds need of keeping in touch with all communions, I sincerely believe that such consummation will be brought about in the next decade. In the meantime accept congratulations and heartiest desire for your greatest success.

[Mr. Idleman's wish is shared by us all. And we believe that we will have "one great brotherhood paper" when the brotherhood puts into the hands of The Christian Century the resources with which to work out its present plans.—C. C. M.]

CHARLES CLAYTON MORRISON,
700 E. 40th Street, Chicago.

I am interested in doing what I can to aid you and Dr. Willett in your plan for firmly establishing The Christian Century in the ownership and control of the Disciples. Kindly send me additional information. How long do the bonds extend? In what financial condition does the new Society begin business? Can you accept payment for bonds on the installment plan or must you have immediate cash for entire amount subscribed?

Unrecorded Greatness

WHEN A GREAT MAN APPEARS it would seem that all the world is taxed to do him honor. At such times our hero-worship has in it a dash of frenzy, our devotion breaks all bounds. Nor is the reason far to seek. We love in others the qualities which are lacking in ourselves, and no matter how many gifts we may possess not one is comparable to the one just beyond our reach. The lure of the deficiency may be tantalizing, but there is a kind of subtle pleasure in our quest after all. The author has written well, but today he is in despair because his contemporary has written a new book and sounded a new and strange note. The musician has charmed the world with his talent, but a rival has put new meanings into old melodies, perhaps created new melodies which have led captive the ear of a generation. The ease of one group is the impossibility of the other, and these impossibilities are clouds in our sky, alarms to our tranquility, and racks to disturb us even in our dreams. So when a man appears whose career is set within a halo of the hitherto unattainable, we build his pedestal high enough to command the admiration of the coming centuries.

Just now a striking illustration of all this may be found in the devotion of two continents to a preacher whose abilities have made for him a place of special interest. At a time when men's hearts are failing them for fear that the pulpit may perish from the earth, and when the church seemed to be withering like a flower under the untimely frosts of the secular spirit, this man appears to revive all the best traditions of the pulpit, to hold men under the pleadings of the gospel as if by strains of cathedral music, and to lift a great congregation from decay to a place of national power. Men are saying if this is preaching we can't have too much of it, if this is the meaning of the church not to crowd churches is an indifference which should be counted sacrilege, if this is the ambassador of a king we must see the king. The critics and the scribes are setting him beside Beecher, Storrs, Phillips Brooks and Spurgeon and asking wherein this late-comer is inferior to any of them. The pulpit of Fifth Avenue Presbyterian Church has added to the greatness of the American metropolis. Such a man as Dr. Jowett helps us to read with understanding the preaching of the great Preacher to preachers, to understand that pulpit ideals are not dreams to be realized only in other worlds, that what to the average is impossible is a habit of life with this great man who walks heroically among men because he walks humbly before God.

It is not the purpose of this contribution to try to explain the greatness of this wonderful preacher; others have done that. But it is our purpose to remember the great army of preachers who are doing their work in quiet parishes, in lowly walks among the poor, and often among the petulant; who speak to meagre and unappreciative congregations; whose faith is as deeply fixed in the great realities as though they had companied with the Master in many a walk to Emmaus; and whose rewards must come from hands that have known the touch of things terrestrial, save as brotherly hands have ministered to their necessities along the pilgrim's path. They are urged to give attention to reading, but household cares, the calls of the sick and the needy, the vexations, and the weariness of every day eat up their time so that when night comes the body must seek repose. They are urged to seek recreation in travel, to go out under sunny skies, or within sight of the foaming sea and there catch the invigorations which only a change can bring. But they have not the means wherewith to travel. With increasing years and increasing family the pinch of poverty grows tighter, the soul becomes less sensitive to shabby appearances, the ambition less responsive to the spur of earlier dreams. They delight to read of the work of the pulpit genius here and there, to recount the victories that are being won in many sections, even if they seem to be beating a retreat in their own humble stations, to know without murmuring that the promises of God are being fulfilled more speedily in others than in themselves. But on they go doing the best they can to deliver an inspiring or a consoling message week after week, seeing but scant fruit for their sowing, yet believing that God may turn the desert into gladness and the wilderness into a garden.

Think of the heroism needed to stand by a dying cause, to work almost alone, uncheered and uninspired! There is an enthusiasm in crowds, an incentive in applause, a satisfaction in seeing the borders of one's tent enlarge. But where all these are wanting, what compensations remain? Carlyle would say the compensations that come from honest toil; the avaricious would say the compensation of the monthly salary; but the prophet would say the compensation in the faith that believes a kingdom is being built whose foundations can never be moved, for which an army of unknown toilers are shaping the material.

We all join in the chorus that celebrates the genius of the great. Let us save a cheer for the faithful who are unknown. In the halls of fame one niche should be reserved for the man who was willing to work and die in obscurity, but who flinched not in sorest conflict, nor left undone any task. We have medals for the famous; let us strike a few for the faithful who knew all their life long that they could never be known to fame. It may be that the world will write "defeated" above their names, but in any case let us seek out a poet who can sing worthily of these defeated heroes whose glory went out in the darkness.

Social Survey

Modern Robin Hoods

The national forests contain 187,000,000 acres of land, the primary value of which lies in the production of timber and protection of water. During the last three years a movement has been on foot to substitute state for national control. According to a significant article in the Outlook by Henry S. Graves, the forester of the United States, this means ultimately the breaking up and parceling out of the national forests to individuals and corporations and the abandonment of forest conservation as a public policy. He points out that the states cannot resist as effectively as the federal government the influence of the great business interests, nor can twenty different states apply a stable and uniform policy extending over a long period of years, as can the federal government. What do we mean by conservation as applied to our national forests? Its purpose is twofold—to prevent private monopoly of public resources and by scientific development to secure their greatest usefulness. Our first great national interest is our timber supply. At the present time we are consuming or losing by fire over three times the amount produced annually by growth on our entire forested area. Another great national interest is the protection, and, in no small measure, even the creation of the sources of water indispensable to the industrial life of the nation. In the great work of irrigation, the development of hydro-electric power, and the proper water-supply for our cities lies one of the greatest reasons for federal conservation, to say nothing of the navigability of the larger streams and the control of floods. It is a significant fact that outside the national forests the timber and water-power of the Northwest is in a comparatively few hands. Within the national forests, on the other hand, thousands of independent operators have obtained public stumpage, thereby assuring competition in the sale and manufacture of lumber. So also a large part of the undeveloped water-power in the national forests is available under lease to the independent operator. So far as the rivers are concerned, the fact that the larger streams flow through several states make control of the sources by any other agency than that of the federal government unthinkable. Mr. Graves makes it perfectly evident that federal control is the only protection the people will have against big business interests which are doing precisely the same thing that Robin Hood and his outlaws practised—and they are quite as gentlemanly as he—with this difference—Robin Hood robbed the travelers through the forest. These modern highwaymen steal the forest itself. Timber is more remunerative than travelers.

The Law—Its Delays and Decisions

The United States Circuit Court of Appeals last week gave a decision by which the owners of the steamer "Tioga," which exploded in the Chicago River twenty-three years ago, will be forced to pay damages of $100,000 to the heirs of the dead men. But the direct heirs are all dead, and the steamship company has long since wound up its affairs. Some courts, like the mills of the gods, grind exceeding slowly. But their grist is sure, even though, as in this case, exact justice requires the help of eschatology, if its decrees are to be carried out in the letter. Our supreme court seems to be more expeditious, at least from the news in the press of last week. Several important decisions were rendered. The Carmack amendment to the interstate commerce law was upheld, whereby the states no longer had the right to annul contracts between railroads and shippers limiting the liability for the loss of interstate shipments. The court declared that the Hepburn rate law expressly fixed the duty of carriers to furnish cars and that precluded the states from acting further on that subject. Another important decision forbids the "cornering" of interstate commodities, such as lard, coal, corn, cotton, wheat, etc., so as to control the price of the product. The case of James A. Patten, of Chicago, and others, who participated in a famous cotton pool in 1910 and reaped, according to reports, a profit of $10,000,000, was remanded for trial. If all our courts were on the same high level as the supreme court the recent growing suspicion directed against our judicial methods would have little basis for existence. To most people who are laymen in legal matters, however, the red tape not only in the execution of laws already made, but in the making of new laws, seems altogether unnecessary. If our judiciary needs medical attention, our legislative branch of the government needs surgical attention, and it is to be hoped that the deap-seated malady of senatorial priority in the formation of committees may soon yield to the knife. At present the camel and the needle's eye are an easier proposition than to get a Kenyon reform bill through congress.

Collapse of the British Doctors' Strike

The British Medical Association faces defeat in the attempt of its Tory element to hold the members of the association in opposition to the insurance act, passed several months ago, providing for medical attendance at a nominal charge to the insured, the rest of the cost being divided between employers and the state. The members of the association have not been opposed to the principles of the act, but the controversy from the first has been about fees which were thought to be too low. The Tory element among the physicians bitterly attacked the act as well as the Liberal government on general principles. They have, however, been unable to hold the members to the pledge which 27,000 and more signed last February not to serve under the act. Less than a month ago, considerably more than half of these failed to renew their pledge, and there is no doubt that on Jan. 15, when the act goes into effect, Lloyd-George will have all the physicians he needs. Any attempt to ostracize the members of the association for working with the government will be doomed to failure—ostracism never works with crowds. The working out of this act, which is one of the greatest measures of social amelioration ever entered into by a national government, will be watched with intense interest in this country.

New England Feeding on Mellen's Food

Who owns the railroads? Are they a form of private business, like making shoes or publishing a paper? Have they a right to stop building, just as a department store has a right to go out of business? The recent indictment of Mr. Mellen, president of the New York, New Haven, and Hartford Railroad, and Mr. Chamberlin, the new president of the Grand Trunk, for having entered into a conspiracy to restrain trade in violation of the Sherman anti-trust law, is an indication to the contrary. Some time ago the Grand Trunk secured rights of way in Massachusetts and Rhode Island, and began building a branch of its main system which was ultimately to reach tidewater at Providence. The New Haven road placed every possible obstacle in the way of this enterprise, for it has a virtual monopoly of New England transportation, including the steam railways, the electric railways, and the shipping. Many are of the opinion that if the former president, Charles M. Hayes, had not lost his life in the "Titanic" disaster, the situation would now be totally different. However that may be, the new management of the Grand Trunk was led to abandon its railway line to Providence, a considerable portion of which had already been constructed. Naturally, all New England was aroused. Discontent, which for years had been growing against the domination of the New Haven in the transportation situation in New England, came to a climax. The breaking of the agreement on the part of the Grand Trunk and its obvious alliance with the New Haven was so thoroughly harmful to the public welfare that federal action was imperative, The state in a real sense is an important partner in all railway construction in its grants of land and rights of way. The tendency toward governmental control in the case of public service corporations is growing stronger every year. The time may not be far distant when, in order to protect the public, the federal government may have to manage the railroads. If it manages them as well as it has the post-office department, few can object. As for Mr. Mellen, we should withhold judgment until the courts have decided upon his case. One thing is certain, that largely because of the power a great corporation can exercise in its influence upon a state legislature, state regulation of railroads has thus far been a failure.

—While all this agitation is under way concerning the censorship of public amusements, the closing of dives and the cleaning up of our streets and districts of segregated vice, it is just as well to remind ourselves that at least one other precaution should be added to all these. Young people should be taught purity of heart and strength of resistance. It will be some time before we eliminate evil from the world, and it never has been the Lord's plan to take his children out of the world. The judges of the Juvenile Court are competent witnesses that something more is needed in human society than can be effected by legislation, or by the passing of resolutions. Purity of heart and life, strength of character and power to overcome evil will be needed after legislation has done its utmost.

Obedience and Salvation

When we say that obedience is necessary to salvation, a caution is needed lest we yield to narrow ideas of obedience and condemn where we ought to approve. The tendency to selfishness, sectarianism, and provincialism in judgment was pointed out by Alexander Campbell in words which would profit us all to keep in memory: "Every one is wont to condemn others in that in which he is more intelligent than they; while, on the other hand, he is condemned for his Pharisaism or his immodesty and rash judgment of others, by those that excel in the things in which he is deficient." "It is the image of Christ the Christian looks for and loves; and this does not consist in being exact in a few items, but in general devotion to the whole truth as far as known."

To one who was troubled by his statement that he found in all Protestant parties Christians, Mr. Campbell wrote: "I cannot, therefore, make any one duty the standard of Christian state or character, not even immersion into the name of the Father, of the Son, and of the Holy Spirit, and in my heart regard all that have been sprinkled in infancy without their own knowledge or consent, as aliens from Christ and the well-grounded hope of heaven. . . . Should I find a Pedo-baptist more intelligent in the Chistian Scriptures, more spiritually minded and more devoted to the Lord than a Baptist or one immersed on a profession of the ancient faith, I could not hesitate a moment in giving the preference of my heart to him that loveth most. Did I act otherwise, I would be a pure sectarian, a Pharisee among Christians."

For one man obedience consists in doing the things that support the established order. He has a deep appreciation of the truth embodied in ancient custom. To break with these customs is to disobey God. For another the test of loyalty is persistent effort to overthrow the present order. He is alive to the truth that is yet to be put into customs and institutions. He thinks nothing worth while has been accomplished. Neither man is a model of obedience. The true obedience is that of one who appreciates the wisdom and the achievement of the past and who also honors the wisdom of the present and looks to the future for the completion of tasks now only begun and imperfectly understood.

To obey from the heart is the Christian ideal, for the Christian is a free man. What he does must commend itself to his intelligence. His God is a reasonable being. Men are invited to consider the commands of God whether they lead to fulness of life or to ruin. If it is not reasonable to follow Christ, we ought not to be Christians. Obedience that counts is of the whole life. If the reason is set aside, the life is maimed and distorted. The reason to be respected is that of the man who obeys, not that of the guardians of the faith who presume to speak for God. If they can help the rest of us to be reasonable, we ought to thank them for their services. If they demand that we turn over our thinking to them, we beg to be excused. We need specialists, but there are some things we cannot commit to them if we are to have any character of our own.

We must rid ourselves of the ideas of obedience inherited from political and military despotisms. In the name of Christ we may preach most un-Christian doctrine and much of what is said of obedience is un-Christian. Man is an end in himself. The soul is of more value than all the world. Now despotism makes man a part of a machine. He obeys for the benefit of some one who thinks of him as a tool to be used when needed and then cast aside. God is not a selfish monarch who takes thought for himself but not for his subjects. He is the friend of man. His commands are the laws of friendship. We do not get these laws by taking the sayings of Jesus apart from their connections. The sayings of Jesus are applications of the laws of friendship. The supreme fact is that God is our friend. When we get this firmly fixed in our minds, the matter of obedience is placed on the right basis.

But what shall we say of the vengeance of God upon all those who obey not the truth? Well, what happens to men when they disregard the demands of friendship? The thief, the murderer, the adulterer, the liar, the slanderer, the envious, the proud, the covetous—all these deny that friendship is a thing to be prized. Every sin is in defiance of friendship. God is a king but he is not an oriental despot. He does not overlook sin, but he is not the enemy of the sinner. The foolish rage and the monstrous cruelties of tyrants do not give us any adequate conception of the way in which God treats evil men. [Midweek Service, Jan. 29. Matt. 7:21; Acts. 5:32; Rom. 6:17; 2 Thess. 1:8; Heb. 5:9.] S. J.

In connection with our announcement of the transfer of The Christian Century and its house from private ownership to public ownership it has been our intention to make a statement of the editorial ideals which this paper and its associate publications would strive to realize. In doing so, we are not forgetting that on the new basis our calling and election as editors is not within our own power to make sure, but now rests with the supporting constituency of the paper to determine. Should the interested brotherhood wish other editors the way is open for them to be secured.

Nevertheless, in offering to our supporting brethren our life-time of service in this capacity it is fitting and right that some declaration should be made as to the aims and principles by which, so long as we are continued in office, we will be governed. This becomes especially desirable in view of the appeal now being made for progressive minded men and women to invest in the bonds of the new Society. The following letter, prompted by our recent announcement, has been read with great satisfaction. It is written by one of the leading laymen of Iowa, a law partner of the new governor of the state and a pillar for his whole life in the congregation where his membership is held. A portion of the letter follows:

The writer is inclined to the opinion that there is great danger, in case the change suggested is made, that The Christian Century will cease to be an organ of advanced, vital Christian thought, but may become a sort of "dispenser of orthodoxy" as indicated by the ———at this time. The writer has been very hopeful that The Christian Century in many of its contentions was the harbinger of a better day and that it would result in bringing many of our ministers up to the advanced ground that has long been occupied by our most intelligent laymen. If you remain still at the wheel it might be that the publication would be what you evidently hope. I am afraid, however, that it might cease to be what it has been in the past. If it becomes either an echo of the conservatism of the ———, or of the opportunism of the ———, it would not be a felt want with me. With best wishes, I remain, Respectfully,

Adel, Iowa. J. B. WHITE.

The above is one of a number of similar expressions which have come to us in our recent correspondence. It furnishes a text for the statement we had intended to make, text or no text.

To us this letter and similar letters indicate plainly that the constituency of The Christian Century strongly desires us to do precisely what we strongly purpose to do and which if we should be restrained from doing would render our continuance at the editorial task absolutely impossible.

Our correspondent has in mind the apologetic formulated by the succession of editors of another Disciple paper whose ownership and control are vested in a board of thirteen trustees. The principle upon which its editorial policy proceeds is, in the precise words of its own recent advertisement, the doctrine that "thirteen are better than one." It talks much about representing the "consensus of opinion among us," and not long since contained an elaborate editorial tracing the process by which a given editorial, on being submitted to this one and that one for revision, excision and addition, came at last to reflect the combined wisdom of the thirteen representative controllers, who in turn reflected the "consensus of opinion" of the brotherhood. Editorial opinion thus passed through a searching process of filtration and came out with all foreign substances—that is, new truth—effectually eliminated.

That a plant such as this could grow in Disciple soil; that this kind of journalism could be grafted on to the sturdy stalk that grew out of J. H. Garrison's not over independent but certainly never weakly editorial policy, and that it could actually be made to seem a virtue by the doctrine of "thirteen to one" is a striking commentary on what has happened to the Disciples since their brave fathers' day.

With this apologetic for brotherhood ownership The Christian Century has not the slightest affinity, and were it urged among the reasons for the public ownership of this paper also, our only course in good conscience would be to vacate our desk and reenter the pulpit. To us the Christian editor's desk is his pulpit. It is only because the parish is larger than that afforded by the local pastorate, and the message seems more fruitful, that the pastorate was exchanged for the newspaper field. As editor we purpose to continue minister, preacher, teacher, and to govern our course by the same imperatives that control the minister in his pulpit.

Instead of surrendering our editorial freedom under the regime of the Disciples Publication Society we are persuaded to labor for the firm establishment of that Society because we expect thereby to attain our fullest freedom. We are not primarily interested in building up a publishing house, or in making a newspaper: we are concerned in delivering the message, in proclaiming the plea, in carrying the churches forward to the practice of the will of Christ. We would not regard it as a justification of brotherhood ownership if we should be able at the end of a year to distribute a handsome dividend to the missionary societies and Sunday-schools and colleges. Neither would we regard it as a token of failure should a deficit be reported. We refuse absolutely to measure the success of a Christian newspaper in terms of its dividends, and we have always so refused.

During these years The Christian Century has meant to us, on the business side, nothing but sacrifice, self-denial and frequent embarrassment. That it has cost money rather than made money is not due to the fact that it had no field, but simply to the fact that it had no capital with which to enter its field. But all the sacrifices and hardships incident to its maintenance we count as dross beside the twelve significant achievements, recorded in our issue of January 9, which were wrought for the Disciples through the independent championship by this paper of incipient or unpopular ideals.

For a specific example, let our readers recall the episode of the "six affirmations" dating back about a year ago. The Christian Century put forward certain theses as representing the attitude of the Disciples toward other Christian people and, in response to a challenge from a prominent leader, named nearly a hundred representative men who would affirm these theses. Had we taken counsel with a board of thirteen controllers our six affirmations would never have seen the light. Even as it was, our friendly counsellors feared and trembled lest instead of furthering progress we had hindered it. But what is the result?

The result is that for the first time in the Disciples' history their leaders, at least, were made conscious of the miserable obscurantism into which we habitually fell when talking of Christian baptism and our unimmersed Christian neighbors. The necessity of a complete reconstruction of our teaching on baptism is now being clearly perceived and frankly confessed, and a new style of speech, candid and unqualified, is being learned by our lips for describing the Christian character and status of Methodists, Presbyterians and others. No such unequivocal affirmation of the status of other churches as churches of Christ and of their members as members of the Church of Christ can be found in our literature since the Brush Run church became a Baptist church as that made by Dr. Chilton in his presidential address at Louisville last October. And now comes Dr. Garrison declaring, a few weeks ago, not that immersion is baptism but that it is the "form" of baptism—a statement for which there is no percedent in all the one hundred years of Disciple talk and which must have made Alexander Campbell turn over in his grave.

These are the kind of dividends that The Christian Century pays. These are the kind of dividends it must continue to pay, whether it earns a profit or not. And dividends of this sort are not earned by a filtered message, by a "controlled" editorial policy, by the photographic reflection of an already existing "consensus of opinion." Such dividends are earned by a free Christian press, by an editorship which profoundly believes that thirteen are not better than one, but that one man's conviction, seasoned with deliberation, lighted up with actual insight and burning with the fire of his conscience is incomparably better than an octavo volume of denatured opinion representing ever so varied a consensus.

The words of Judge Frederick A. Henry, of Clevelend, in a letter of felicitation on the reorganization of this publishing company, state a judgment in which we have been fully confirmed through all the years of our advocacy of public ownership of the Disciples' newspapers. Judge Henry says:

There is no reason, however, why editorially The Christian Century or any other paper conducted upon this new plan should not maintain the independence and fearlessness which is absolutely essential to right leadership.

The Christian Century will continue to be independent. The guarantees of its freedom are in the editorial purposes which lie behind and actuate the present effort to secure financial backing. But behind these present editors, guaranteeing their freedom and the freedom of their successors, is just this strong and intelligent desire of Mr. White and a host of others like him who make up the constituency of The Christian Century, who demand not that their paper shall always agree with their opinion, but that its editors shall think for themselves and speak out their important thoughts with candor, with kindness, and with decision.

On "Purloining" Christ's Name

The following letter was prompted by an editorial in The Christian Century of Jan. 2, in which reference was made to the protest of the "Christian denomination," a body numbering about two hundred thousand members, against the Disciples' use of the name "Christian" as applied to their churches.

Editors The Christian Century: For the past few months I have been an interested reader of The Christian Century. Its editorial spirit and utterances have been so fair, progressive and catholic that I had come to believe that you had established a right and unique position in religious journalism; at least, I had looked upon The Christian Century as being far in advance of other Disciple papers as a sincere advocate of Christian union. But your issue smacks of the usual Campbellistic bitterness of spirit and belligerence of attack. In your last issuue, referring to the Christian Church, you say:

"The arrogant claim of that tiny sect to have an exclusive right to the use of the name that belongs to the whole Church of God."

Your statement, Brother Morrison, is both disrespectful and misleading. The statement is misleading because the Christian Church does not make any such "arrogant claim." Disrespectful, because you denominate an humble and unsectarian people "a tiny sect."

If it is an "arrogant claim" for a body of people to refuse to allow another body of people to purloin its name and history, then, I presume, the Christian Church must plead guilty to your charge. Do you know the characteristics of that people whom you have called "a tiny sect?" For more than a century they have stood for, and practiced the following great principles:

(1) Jesus Christ is head of the Church.
(2) The Bible is the creed.
(3) Christian is the name.
(4) All Christians (regardless of their mode of baptism) are offered a home.
(5) Each member is allowed to interpret the scriptures.

Now, as we see it, Brother Morrison, a church founded upon such principles, can hardly be, in fact and fairness, called "a sect." What say you? A sect may be distinguished as follows:

(1) A human head, or founder.
(2) A human creed.
(3) A human name.
(4) An exclusive fellowship.

The Christian Church has none of the above features. If it has, will you be kind enough to point them out? Since I am one of your readers and well wishers, may I request that in behalf of fair dealing you tell The Century readers the real facts in the case as to that people, whom you are pleased to call "a tiny insect." Hoping that you may succeed in the right, and be consistent in the promulgation of truth, I am, R. J. Ellis.

Sumner, Ill.

Let it be made very clear and very emphatic, first of all, that nothing invidious or uncomplimentary was intended by us in speaking of the "Christian denomination" as a "tiny sect." The comparison drawn was not between this particular denomination and other larger denominations but between it and the whole Church of God. In comparison with the whole Church of God the big Methodist denomination is also a tiny sect.

The Christian Century also takes occasion to express again its strong preference for the use of the name "Disciples of Christ" by those who are striving to practice Christian union. The use of this title is becoming much more general among those who share the ideals of Thomas Campbell, and the title, "The Christian Church" has recently been condemned by a leading Disciple editor as unscriptural, untrue to fact and unmannerly.

The thing that we resent in our brethren of the "Christian denomination" is not that they object to the Disciples' use of the name "Christian" in a denominational sense but that they assume the exclusive right to the use of this catholic name of the whole Church of God as the name of their tiny part of the whole Church of God. Instead of rejoicing that the Disciples wish to be called Christians, too, they resent it as an encroachment upon their preserves, and talks of "purloining" their name!

Suppose that with respect to the other items named above by our correspondent as characteristic of his denomination his brethren should feel in the same way they affect to feel with respect to this item of their name. Take, for instance, number 1: Jesus Christ is Head of the Church. Do our "Christian" brethren fly into a rage because Baptists and Presbyterians and Episcopalians also make Jesus Christ the Head of the Church? Do they talk about "purloining" their Head? Or take number 2: Do they resent it because Baptists and Episcopalians and many Congregationalists strive to make the Bible their only creed? Why do they not cry Stop thief! when they see these "sectarians" running off with their creed? Or number 4: Do these, our brethren, regard it as an infringement upon their patent process because Methodists and Presbyterians, and all save Baptists and Disciples, receive all Christians into their churches?

This is all very ridiculous, this talk about "purloining" the name Christian. Our esteemed brethren of this "tiny sect" ought to rejoice greatly that they have a big brother or cousin—or some remote relation, since they seem to object to being known as related to the Disciples at all—who desires to wear the true family name and that only.

Our correspondent names four features by which a "sect" may be distinguished. This is not the place to examine his list to determine whether it is either complete or relevant, but that it is fallacious in omitting one item fundamental to all others is obvious. Sectarianism is a matter of the spirit, the temper, of a people more than of its platform. We do not concede that as a platform the four features named above constitute a catholic platform, yet if the platform were never so catholic its advocates might still be a "tiny sect," tiny not in number only but in heart and soul. There is scriptural precedent for this strange exhibition of the sectarian spirit by a people who talk much of Christian unity and who have it in their power to make a positive contribution toward it. When the partisans at Corinth were saying, "I am of Paul," "I am of Apollos," and "I am Cephas" there were those also who said, "I am of Christ," and these fell under the apostle's condemnation like the rest. The idea that Christ's name can be copyrighted by a small portion of his Church and made to apply to a denomination is an exact replica of the idea that actuated the fourth group of partisans in the Corinthian church.

In the name of their own ideals for Christian unity we beseech these our brethren,—and with nothing save the utmost esteem for our present correspondent,—to abandon this impossible claim which they have of late been incontinently pressing.

Dignity Based on Significance Not on Size

There is something interesting and suggestive in the way a small and obscure church rises into conspicuous dignity the moment it undertakes actually to practice Christian unity. There is a touch of optimistic pathos in it. Here is the tiny village of Alma, Mo., where Baptists, Methodists, Disciples and Presbyterians are at work striving to constitute a church in which all Christ's people may conscientiously do Christ's work for that particular community. The newspapers of all the middle west have contained the report of it, and even a Boston daily gives it six inches of space. Here is the little town of Crystal Lake, Ill., where a Disciple and a Congregational church are becoming acquainted with each other with the conscious purpose to be one church if possible. Several religious papers have given descriptions of this attempt; a Boston weekly gave it an extended write-up and the Chicago dailies are watching it closely, with occasional reports of progress.

Here is a little suburb of Chicago where a Congregational and a Methodist church are uniting, aided and abetted by a Methodist bishop and the district superintendent. The fame of this Park Ridge union has spread through the channels of publicity to all the country. The Hyde Park Church of Disciples in Chicago is a modest congregation numerically, but its conscientious step toward the practice of Christian unity has lifted it into a place of importance and dignity which even its learned and devout pastor's regular ministry could not have given it. The same public interest adheres to Monroe Street, Evanston and Austin churches of Disciples in Chicago, all of them relatively humble congregations but all earnestly endeavoring to practice Christian unity with not a part of the body but with the whole body of Christ.

At a joint conference of the Disciples and Congregational commissions on Christian unity, held some time since in New York City, a little Illinois cross-roads church which had been living earnestly for some years in the practice of its Lord's prayer for the unity of his followers was taken as the subject of study and the tentative model of procedure for the merging of Disciples and Congregationalists on other local fields.

Think of Newman Smyth, preacher for forty years to Yale University community, and J. H. Garrison, veteran leader of a religious body of over a million people, with knitted brows, taking instruction in Christian unity from the little flock of God at Cisna Park, Ill.!

The Risk That Men are Honest

There is one form of insurance which more nearly than any other in common use in America approaches the uncertainty of a wager. It is the insurance issued by the bonding companies. It is to all intents and purposes a bet on the rectitude of human nature. It involves some interesting assumptions and some interesting results.

Does the average bonding company bet that the average man is honest or dishonest?

If you should see the lists of questions which they send out to ministers, bankers, and neighbors you might be tempted to think that they assumed that all men are dishonest. They ask a man's age. They demand to know whether he is married or single. They ask whether his wife is economical or extravagant. They are interested in ascertaining whether he drinks or gambles, whether he wears better clothes than he can afford, what kind of company he keeps, and a great deal more. The study of one of these lists of questions is a profoundly interesting commentary on the financial value of goodness. You might almost think the questions had been propounded with a view to possible church membership.

The bonding companies say that they assume that the average man is honest. They also affirm that their experience justifies the assumption. To be sure, they watch the men they bond, and watch their wives, and are rather quick to cancel a bond if the wife of a man whose salary is $100 a month wears sealskin cloaks and too many diamonds, and gives box parties at the theater. There are few things which more tempt a salaried man to become a defaulter than an extravagant wife.

But though the bonding companies keep a shrewd and keen watch, these companies have great faith in human nature.

A recent article in a financial paper quotes the manager of a surety company as saying: "This business makes optimists of all of us who are in it. We find far more good than evil in men. It is just because of this great preponderance of good that we are able to remain in the surety game. It seems to me the most interesting game in the world."

This article says that while almost everybody will bear some watching, and some men require more watching than others, and while there are some employments which call for extra vigilance and an extra premium, the surety company is willing to risk about 500 to 1 that the average man is honest.

Does your experience bear out this proportion? How many men do you know? A thousand or two thousand, or very likely five thousand, if you count among them all your acquaintances and all with whom you are more or less directly related in business and social acquaintance. Out of all the large number whom you know or have known, how many have wilfully wronged you? One, or five, or ten,—probably not more than that.

The average man of your acquaintance wishes you well and not ill. The average man among your neighbors would run till he was out of breath to put out a fire in your house, or to bring the doctor if you were to fall.

The scamp who runs away with other people's money is an exceptional man. For every one who does this, five hundred prove true to their trust.

If you are honest you are with the majority.

So far as the returns are in, there is a tremendous landslide in the vote for integrity.

The scamps and the betrayers of trust are a pitiful minority. We are living in a pretty good world and among very decent people. The average man is none too good, but he is good enough for the bonding companies to risk money upon. He is good enough to deserve the respect of his neighbors. Be glad that your neighbor is as good a man as he is. Help him to be better. Incidentally, try to be better yourself.

Little Pots and Deep Water

Among the fables which we read in our school edition of Aesop was one in which the little pot discreetly declined the invitation of its bigger and stronger brother for a venture out where the high waves were rolling. The fable, even to a childish mind, seemed to lack something essential to verisimilitude; but its conclusion that "little pots must keep near shore," has not been forgotten in many an hour of social temptation. It may be true that there are no social classes in America, but there are financial classes, all the same, and the man who on a thousand a year ventures to accept the invitation of a friend out into the current running at a twenty-five thousand dollar a year gait discovers this to his sorrow. The British Weekly some time ago contained the mournful plaint of a bank bookkeeper—on two hundred pounds a year—who was invited to spend the week-end with Lord So-and-so. He accepted, "to save his face," but accepting required that he should borrow ten guineas with which to fee the servants in the country-house of his father's friend. And now comes the wail that leaders of English society keep in their homes subscription lists in the interests of their favorite charities, and the guest whose name does not appear on the list with a generous sum appended lacks a second invitation. Things have not reached quite that pass with us, but the whole city has been flooded this winter with tickets to expensive entertainments which were backed up by fashionable patronesses, to pay for which tickets was bad policy for a man of modest income and to return which was bad form for one who wished to be in "society." Whatever the opinion of servants as to the "tips" we give, or of hostesses as to the sums we subscribe, every American must learn to respect his own limitations and to keep free from social alliances which will surely lead him beyond his financial depth.

Law and Labor Leaders

The conviction of the men on trial at Indianapolis and the general approval of the result makes it clear that the serious lesson should be thoroughly taken to heart by all agitators. We say agitators, because we recognize the great body of labor people as opposed to violence and essentially law-abiding. The men who have misrepresented them and attempted to put the organization of labor in opposition to order and government are now placed in their proper light, and it is a good time to draw the line between the evil element and the benevolent interest in the working man.

Loyalty to the government under which we live must come first. What laboring men did in the days of civil strife fifty years ago, or would do now if the country was attacked by a foreign enemy, is what they need to do in this matter of conflict between law and violence. It cannot be admitted, as was claimed at Los Angeles, that the rights or rules of war may be claimed in the issue between employer and laborer. The country is not at war. It is at peace, and has the right to make all classes keep the peace. Sherman blew up bridges and burned down houses on his march to the sea. But we cannot have the McNamaras or the Ryans blowing up bridges now. And whatever may be thought of killing people in war, it must be treated as murder in this time of peace. No man is or can be outside of the law because he is inside of a labor organization. This is the lesson emphatically and conspicuously taught by the wholesale conviction at Indianapolis.

Another lesson which also is taught is the need that some labor leaders have of more religion. It is better to go to church than to go to prison. In a world so full of wrong roads as this, it is easy to take the dangerous road, and in a time of so many and subtle temptations it is easy for men to lose their moral poise. And this is just as true of the men who have the labor cause specially at heart as it is of other men. Therefore they need the restraints, the guidance, the moral power and the redeeming grace of the Christian religion as much as the rest of us. They may think that they can get along without it, but they cannot. It is useless to scoff at religion as something preached to keep men out of a future hell. It has immense present influence in keeping them out of prison. If these men had read their Bible they would have known the difference betwen dynamiting and doing wholesome duty.

In a word, we all are such sinners, whether we labor or loaf, that we need all the motives and all the knowledge and all the power brought from heaven to earth to save us from our evil ways and their sore consequences.

A Confession of Faith

By Harvey Hugo Guy

1. I believe in God; that He is my Father and my Friend; that He is immanent in His universe and cares for every spark of life so tenderly that in His sight eternal values inhere in everything about us; that He has given us everything to enjoy and if we are not happy the fault is not His; and that His highest, best name is Love.

2. I believe in Jesus; that He is the Christ of prophecy and the fullfilment of the God-inspired, prophetic hope of all the world. He is the only begotten son of the Father, God manifest in the flesh. I believe He lived, died and rose from the dead for the world's salvation. In him I put my trust for earth, my hope of heaven.

3. I believe in the Holy Spirit, God's spiritual presence with His people. I believe I have heard his still, small voice in my soul and felt his inspiration in my life, the mystery of the spiritual world.

4. I believe in the inspiration of the men who wrote the Bible and that it is a revelation from God and a sufficient rule of faith and practice for the Christian life.

5. I believe in the ordinance of baptism; (a) that its form, taught and exemplified in the New Testament, is immersion; and (b) that it has the spiritual significance of a covenant in which the Christian pledges to follow Christ even unto death, for "we are baptized into his death."

6. I believe in the ordinance of the Lord's Supper; (a) that it is a memorial of the death of Christ for us and (b) that its observance should be a renewal of the Christian's pledge to take up his cross and follow Jesus.

7. I believe in the terrible reality of sin; that in my own life it has kept me from realizing an ideal imperfectly conceived at best and has produced a character which, in the eyes of my heavenly Father, must appear a very tangle of imperfections; and I know I shall never reach heaven without help.

8. I believe in the brotherhood of man and the ultimate victory of love. I believe that the silent forces of the universe are set to realize a more perfect manhood fashioned after the image of the heavenly Father, and that the fellowship of triumphant love is eternal.

9. I believe in the Church; proclaimed by Jesus and established by his immediate followers to be the body in which his spirit should dwell and be manifested to the world.. I believe the Church is an organization of believers in Christ bound together by ties of love and loyalty, to the end that they may demonstrate, by service and teaching, that God the Father sent His Son Jesus Christ for the world's enlightenment and salvation.

10. I believe in the necessity of the union of all followers of Jesus; that it was the desire of Jesus himself that they should be one, and that such union is necessary in order to convince the world of his divine mission. I believe that Christian union is realizable, and that it is more urgently important to strive to unite churches than it is to induce or encourage Christians to move from one denomination to another.

Child Labor in City Streets

A New Book on an Overlooked Form of Social Injustice

In this most interesting volume of "Child Labor in City Streets," Dr. Edward N. Clopper, secretary of the National Child Labor Committee for the Mississippi Valley, discusses a neglected form of child labor. The book is published by the Macmillan Company.

The Preface.

The preface is unusually good and is worth reading. In it Dr. Clopper says: "Just why the newsboy, bootblack and peddler should have been ignored in the general movement for child welfare is hard to understand. Perhaps it is due to "the illusion of the near." Street workers have always been far more conspicuous than any other child laborers, and it seems that this very proximity has been their misfortune. If we could have focused our attention upon them as we did upon children in factories, they would have been banished from the streets long ago. Now that we are getting a broader sense of social responsibility, we are beginning to realize how blind and inconsiderate we have been in our treatment of them.

Causes, Effects, Remedy.

The first five chapters of the book review present conditions and discuss causes, the next two deal with effects, and the final ones are concerned with the remedy. The scope has been made as broad as possible. All forms of street work that engage any considerable number of children have been described at length, and opinions and findings of others have been freely quoted. It has been so convenient to have a newspaper or a shoe brush thrust at one, it has not occurred to us that, for the sake of the children, such work would be better done by other means. Although good examples have been set by European cities, we have not introduced any innovations to clear the streets of working children.

Harmful Results.

The free rein at present given to child labor in our city streets is productive of nothing but harmful results, and it is high time that a determined stand was taken for the rights of children so exposed. A few feeble efforts at regulation have been made in some parts of this country but this is an evil that requires prohibition rather than regulation. There is no valid reason why just as efficient service in streets could not be rendered by adults. Certainly it would be far more suitable and humane to reserve such work for old men and women who need outdoor life and are physically unable to earn their living in other ways. We could buy our newspaper from a crippled adult at a stand just as easily as we get it now from an urchin who shivers on the street corner.

Child Labor.

That the term "child labor," whose meaning has so long been popularly restricted to the employment of children in factories, mills, mines and stores, is properly applicable to the activities of children in all kinds of work for profit, is now virtually recognized by a few states which prohibit employment of children under fourteen years of age "in any gainful occupation." But unfortunately the courts have rigidly construed the word "employ" to mean the purchasing of the services of one person by another, hence newsboys, peddlers, bootblacks and others who work on their own account, do not enjoy the protection of such a statute because they are not "employed." Under this interpretation a fatal loophole is afforded through which thousands of boys and girls escape the spirt of the law which seeks to prevent their labor rather than their mere employment. It is for this reason that, in states having otherwise excellent provisions for the conservation of childhood, we see little children freely exploiting themselves on city streets. This situation has been calmly accepted without protest by the general public, for while the people condemn child labor in factories, they tolerate and even approve of it on the street.

Legislation.

Legislation regulating street trading by children in this country is now in the stage corresponding to that of the English factory acts in the early part of the nineteenth century,—the first meager restrictions are being tried. Several of the street occupations, viz. messenger service, delivery service and errand running, are ordinarily included among those prohibited to children under fourteen years by state child labor laws, because to engage in such work children have to be employed by other persons. These occupations are covered by the provision common to such laws which forbids employment of such children "in the distribution or transmission of merchandise or messages." The street "trades" of newspaper selling, peddling and bootblacking are, as yet, almost untouched by legislation in the United States, for there exist only a very few state laws and city ordinances relative to this matter, and these of the most primitive kind. The public does not yet realize the injustice of permitting young children to engage, uncontrolled, in the various street-trading activities.

Figures Unreliable.

There are no reliable figures either official or unofficial showing the number of children engaged in street activities in any city of the United States or in the country at large. The figures given by the United States Census of 1900 are so inadequate that they can hardly mislead any one endowed with ordinary powers of observation. It solemnly declares that in that year there was a grand total of 6,904 newspaper carriers and newsboys, both adults and children, in the entire United States, of whom 69 were females. In all probability there was a greater number at that time in some of our larger cities alone.

Chicago.

It is only from the reports of occasional and very limited local investigations that material as to the actual state of affairs can be obtained. Social workers of Chicago had a bill introduced into the Illinois legislature at its session of 1911, providing that boys under ten years and girls under sixteen years should be prohibited from selling anything in city streets, and some material was gathered to be used in support of this measure.

In one of the schools of Chicago, pupils were found to be trading in the streets in addition to attending school in the following percentages:

65 per cent of 5th grade children
35 per cent of 4th grade children
15 per cent of 2d grade children
12 per cent of 1st grade children

(Figures for 3d grade were not given.)

All of these children were attending school twenty-five hours a week, and many cases of excessive work out of school hours were found. Some allowance should be made for possible exaggeration on the part of these children, but nevertheless it is certain that many of them were working to an injurious extent. The hours given were as follows:

1 boy over 50 hours
4 boys over 40 hours
5 boys over 35 hours
7 boys over 30 hours
18 boys over 20 hours

Their average earnings per week were found to be as follows:

5th grade children	$1.18
4th grade children	.85
3d grade children	.60
2d grade children	.43
1st grade children	.36

Pitiable Sum.

In referring to the weekly income of the children from this source, the Handbook of the Chicago Child Welfare Exhibit declared that it was "a pitiable sum to compensate for the physical weariness and moral risk attending street trades in a large city. School reports show that street trades, when carried on by young children, lead to truancy, low vitality, dullness and the breaking down of parental control. Since the children are on the streets at all hours, careless habits are developed which often lead to moral ruin to both boys and girls.

An instance was related wherein the teacher of a fifth grade in a Chicago school asked those of her pupils who worked for money to raise their hands. In the class of 38 pupils, 26 acknowledged that they were little bread winners! One boy said he worked ten hours a day besides attending school; others had less striking records, spending from twenty to forty hours a week selling gum and newspapers, blacking boots and pursuing the various other street occupations which the Illinois law leaves open to children of all ages.

Vicious Environment.

Referring to the economic and home conditions surrounding young children in Chicago and the many phases of danger to their moral well-being, the Vice Commission of that city reported that its agents had found small boys selling newspapers in segregated districts and that one night an investigator had counted twenty newsboys from eleven years upwards so engaged at midnight and after. Besides these newsboys, many little boys and girls were found peddling chewing gum near disorderly saloons where prostitutes were soliciting. Numerous examples of employment in vicious environment are cited, principally of the peddling of newspapers and chewing gum by young children at all hours of the night in the "red light" districts, about saloons and museums of anatomy. Even in the rear rooms of saloons, boys were seen offering their wares and heard to join in obscene conversation with the patrons of these resorts.

The Padrone System.

In almost every city of the United States having a population of more than 10,000, there is to be found the padrone system, which is operated principally in the interests of the bootblacking business which the Greeks control. The peddling of flowers, fruit and vegetables in Chicago and New York is partly subject to the same methods. The labor supply furnished by this system for peddling and bootblacking consists generally of children from twelve to seventeen years of age.

The Immigration Commission states in its report that there are several thousand shoeshining establishments in the United States operated by Greeks who employ boys as bootblacks, and that with few exceptions they are under the padrone system. A few boys under sixteen years of age are employed under the Greek padrone system as flower vendors, and these are found chiefly in New York City. They are hired by florists to sell flowers in the streets and public places —largely old stock that cannot be handled in the shops. These boys usually live in good quarters, are well fed and receive their board and from $50 to $100 a year in wages. When not engaged in peddling, they deliver flowers ordered at the shops. The boys employed by the padrones to peddle candy, fruit and vegetables usually live in basements or in filthy rooms; here they are crowded two, three and sometimes four in one bed, with windows shut tight so as to avoid catching cold. The fruit and vegetables still on hand are stored for the night in these bedrooms and in the kitchen. In each peddling company there are usually three or four wagons and from four to eight boys.

Makes Criminals.

The charge that in street work a child has small chance of acquiring a suitable trade is one of the worst counts in the indictment. Street work leads to nothing else; the various occupations are so many industrial pitfalls, and the children who get into them must sooner or later struggle out and begin over again at some other line of work, if they would succeed.

"These children (street traders) furnish a very large proportion of recruits to the criminal population. Those who do not graduate into crime form a liking for the petty excitements of the street and a distaste for regular employment. They lack skill and perseverance, shun the monotony of a permanent job, and as they grow older either follow itinerant and questionable trades or become ill-paid and inefficient casual laborers. Therefore these young people are a source of waste to society rather than of profit."

The large percentage of former newsboys among the inmates of boys' reformatories recently induced an active social worker to send an inquiry to the superintendents of such institutions and to juvenile court judges in different parts of the country relative to the effect of newspaper selling on school-boys.

These officials are practically unanimous in condemning street trading by boys, declaring that newsboys are generally stupid and almost always morally defiled; that the pittance they earn is bought at great sacrifice; that the spending of their earnings without supervision is the worst thing that can befall them; that the life leads to gambling, dishonesty and spendthrift habits; that it is a dead-end occupation leading to nothing; that it abounds in evil temptations; that the boys are comparatively idle and see and hear the worst that is to be seen and heard on the street; that the work subjects boys to bad influences before they are strong enough to resist them; that delinquency results from their enforced association with all classes of boys; and concluding that every possible protection should be thrown about the young boy.

A Chicago Physician.

A Chicago physician took occasion to look into the records of the juvenile court of that city in 1909, and found that the first 100 boys and 25 girls examined that year were representative of the 2,500 delinquents brought into the court during the preceding year. Not less than 57 of these boys had been engaged in street work—43 as newsboys, 12 as errand boys and messengers and 2 as peddlers. Only 13 out of the entire number had never been employed. Sixty of them were physically subnormal; the general physical condition of the girls was found to be much better than that of the boys of the same age, although 40 per cent of the girls were suffering from acquired venereal disease.

In the autumn of 1910 there were 647 boys confined in the Indiana state reformatory, which is known as the Indiana Boys' School, at Plainfield. Of this number 219, or 33.8 per cent, had formerly been engaged in street work.

A British Critique of the Disciples

With a Chance for Americans to Reply

EDITORS' NOTE.—The London Christian World is publishing a series of "Letters to Other Churchmen" written by one who signs himself "Geoffrey Palmer." Number IX in the series is addressed "To A 'Disciple,' a member of the 'Churches of Christ.'" The writer evidently finds his text in the little volume of the Anglo-American Conference on Christian Union held in London in 1910, conceived and promoted by the Disciples of Great Britain. The Disciple speakers appearing on the platform of the conference were Dr. J. H. Garrison, Dr. Archibald McLean, Dr. Errett Gates and Mr. Charles Clayton Morrison, all from the American side of the water. Evidently the addresses of these Disciples do not convince "Geoffrey Palmer" of the good faith of their talk about unity. What have our American readers to say in reply to this very blunt but friendly critique? The Christian Century does not care to lead in pronouncing an opinion. But if there can be found so many as ten defenders who will put into not more than 400 words each an apologetic for the position criticised by our British friend we will be glad to add our opinion thereto. Others who may be moved by the strictures, whether their reflections run pro or con, may be virtually sure of a hearing if they will keep their reflections within the 400 word limit.

DEAR CHRISTIAN,—It ought to be a relief to find you, my modest American cousin, in England—but it isn't.

Yet we are pleading for the same thing; for a church that is simply Christian, a church unsectarian and catholic. We both deplore a divisive denominationalism. The 'Churches of Christ' profess to be opposed to sectarianism. The American section, anyhow, well advertise their aim to act as mediator between the various churches with the idea of making them all one. That, it seems, is why they are here.

It is a great ideal. And there is nothing more urgently important. From the point of view of home and foreign missions, of church effectiveness at home and evangelical aggression abroad, nothing is more imperative than Christian union. Denominationalism has done its work. It has discovered and emphasized certain aspects of truth and contributed enormously to character and knowledge. But now its glory has departed. Denominationalism hinders rather than helps the kingdom. And you, more than anybody I know, are alive to the fact. Nobody denounces denominationalism more than you do. Nobody says more against sectarianism.

Yet, curiously, nobody is more denominational than you are. And nobody more sectarian. You show your dislike of denominations by inflicting another upon our already overcrowded market. You oppose sectarianism by crowding in another sect. And it is the most superfluous sect—this American invasion—the most superfluous sect in Great Britain.

There is absolutely nothing that you offer us that we cannot find either among the narrowest order of Baptists or among some section of Brethren. And even so, we have the British section of your particular persuasion. You haven't much to do with them. And what on earth you're here for, I don't know. I'm not saying a word about your great denomination—it is a denomination, even if you deny it—in America. I've read with keen interest the 'Christian Unity Foundation' study of the 'Disciples of Christ' in the United States. But in Great Britain it seems to me you're simply a superfluity. And here, anyhow, you ought to be the very last to talk about Christian unity, unless you change your spirit. You don't mean 'unity.' You mean 'absorption.' You want the churches to unite on the basis of a handful of exclusive churches that you have the audacity, I had almost written cheek, to call 'The Churches of Christ.'

That's why I say it's no relief to me to find you, though you profess to offer me the very thing I most want. After all you do not really offer any more than Romanus or Anglic. They would both welcome union on the basis of absorption. And you are not nearly as catholic as the brothers Method, of Presbys, or Demos. And whatever may be the conditions in the United States, where you belong, here Bapto is a much bigger chap than you are, and much more hospitable.

I've been reading that little book of addresses on 'Christian Union' which your 'Christian Association' has just issued. The idea of an Anglo-American Conference on Christian Union was a very good one, and ought to have done something to unite the American and the British sections of your denomination. But the thing that strikes me most about that little book is the list of non-Disciple or non-Christian speakers. (I am using the words in your denominational sense, of course. They are all disciples and all Christians; and, by the way, they all belong to the Church of Christ.)

An Anglican, a Baptist, a Congregationalist and a Wesleyan represented the evangelical churches of England; yet, though this Anglo-American conference was arranged under your auspices, and though you profess to exist in order to unite the churches, you would not admit the Anglican clergyman and the Congregational and Wesleyan ministers to your own church fellowship, on the ground that they have not been immersed. And some of your people would have been very dubious about the Baptist. You don't deny that they are Christians. You even invite them to address a conference on Christian Unity. And you call yours a 'Christian Church' or 'Church of Christ.' But if Prebendary Webb-Peploe, or Rev. C. Silvester Horne, or Dr. Watkinson had concluded their addresses with an application for admission into your 'Christian Church,' you would have insisted that they should first of all submit to an ordinance that originally signified the passing from heathenism to Christianity! And you talk about 'Christian Union'! And you speak against sectarianism! It isn't good enough, Christian.

You would, I suppose, have admitted the Rev. T. E. Ruth—the other speaker—if he had applied, on the ground that he had been baptized—but I'm not sure about that. The chairmen of the conference, Mr. J. Allen Baker, a Friend, and Dr. Charles Leach, M.P., a Congregationalist, would have shared the fate of the 'non-Christian' speakers. Mr. Hay Morgan, M.P., would have got in, that is, if Baptist baptism is valid in the 'Church of Christ.'

But frankly, Christian, don't you think it is a bit of a farce running this ultra-sectarian church of yours in opposition to sectarian Christianity? Hadn't you better give up your plea for 'a United Church?' Or, better still, give up your sectarianism and so plead with some consistency for Christian unity? You should do one or the other. You'll do nothing in England but aggravate the sects and strengthen sectarianism on the present lines of your ministry. If you really want Christian union, why don't you get a broader basis?

Some of your Christian union literature is interesting, but it is completely nullified by the preaching of your imported American preachers and evangelists, who, in expounding your particular theory of baptism—that it is part of the scheme of salvation—repentance, faith and baptism being the human essentials—actually give the weaker and gipsy members of some of our churches the impression that unless they are immersed they will certainly go to hell.

Only a week or so ago, I was consulted by an Irish Churchwoman who knew that I had been immersed in my youth. One of your preachers had delivered a picturesquely American sermon on 'He that is not baptized shall be damned.' He put all the passion and emphasis that belong to the first essential on to a secondary practice. And this good Churchwoman shuddered. I, of course, told her that if it were true, if all the non-immersed were to be damned and only the immersed were to be saved, I hoped the accident of my own immersion would be forgotten. I'd much rather be damned than saved—on those terms. Something must be said for society. And she'd be better company than your parson. And she's just as good a saint.

If you're going to work for Christian union, by which you mean the union of the churches, you will have to recognize the validity of other church membership. You're not the only Christian people in the world, really you're not.

In the little volume of addresses to which I have referred, I find one of your American brethren saying wisely, 'The presupposition of a Christian union movement that may hope to gain the ear of Christendom must be that evangelical Christians are indeed Christians, members of the Church of Christ, and to be fellowshipped in the fullest fraternity.'

That seems obvious enough. It is essential not only to charity but to common sense.

Yet what do I find? A footnote saying, ' . . . I am here speaking for myself alone . . . Many brethren disagree with me.'

It is the necessity for such a footnote in defence of so necessary a sentiment that you have to change, if your campaign for unity means anything more than sectarian aggression in a country already overstocked with sects.

My advice to you, Christian, is to be what you call yourself and let your church be 'The Church of Christ,' not simply your church conditioned by your private interpretation of a sacrament.

The policy on which the churches will unite is not that of exclusiveness but that of comprehension. The platform you offer does very well for a sect, but it isn't big enough for a church.

Yours very faithfully,

GEOFFREY PALMER.

Public Reading of the Scriptures

Is It Always a Means of Grace?

By William E. Barton

On the first day of May, in the year of our Lord 1737, Rev. Josiah Willard, one of the pastors of the Old South Church in Boston, preached a sermon to that always progressive congregation, from the text, "I charge you by the Lord, that this epistle be read unto all the holy brethren." (I Thes. 5:27.) He set forth the doctrine that the holy scriptures were intended not only to furnish the man of God with proof texts, and to supply the need for doctrine and reproof and correction, but also for public reading. He further announced that the two pastors had conferred concerning this matter, and had consulted the officers of the church, and secured the consent of the church itself, and, that beginning with this day there would be, as a part of each service, the reading of a portion of the scriptures. And at that very service he himself read the first chapter of Genesis, and his colleague, Rev. Thomas Prince, read the first chapter of Matthew. And it was entered upon the records of the church that on Lord's Day, April 24, 1757,

"The Brethren of the Church stay'd, and

"Voted,—That the Holy Scriptures be read in Public after the First Prayer in the morning and afternoon. And that it be left to the discretion of the Pastors; what part of Scripture to read, and what to expound."

It was an innovation. But it was not quite the beginning. The First Church of Salem had voted on December 27, 1736, "that the Scriptures be read as part of the Publick worship."

A number of years earlier, the custom appears to have been established in the Brattle Street church in Boston. Thither went Judge Samuel Sewall on Sunday, November 30, 1702. He went partly because he wanted to hear a new minister, partly to show his approval of the action of the Brattle Street Church "in renouncing the cross in Baptisme, Humane Holidays, etc.," for some of the Boston churches were beginning to observe Christmas, and Judge Sewall did not approve. And there was still another reason, as he tells us in his journal; his own pastor, Rev. Josiah Willard, author of the great volume of Divinity, the first folio printed in America, had cut his hair and begun to wear a wig like Cotton Mather, and Judge Sewall opined that "He that contemn's the Law of Nature is not fit to be a publisher of the Law of Grace." For these many good reasons, Judge Sewall left the service of the Old South for a Sunday, and went to Brattle Street. He arrived late, and was disappointed. Mr. Coleman was praying. Judge Sewall had heard Mr. Coleman pray and preach on many occasions; it was not Mr. Coleman whom he had come to hear, but his new assistant, Rev. Elipha-let Adams, a Harvard graduate of 1694. But Sewall's hope revived. When he saw how much of the opening service Mr. Coleman was taking, he judged, and rightly, that the new minister was to preach, and he did. But Sewall noticed particularly that the opening service was somewhat more elaborate than he was accustomed to. Mr. Coleman finished praying sooner than he expected. "But his Prayer was short; When ended, he read distinctly the 137, and 138th Psalmes, and the seventh of Joshua, concerning ye Conviction, sentence and Execution of Achon. Then sung the second part of the Sixty-ninth psalm. Mr. Brattle set it to Windsor tune. Then Mr. Adams pray'd very well, and more largely; and gave us a very good sermon from Gal. 4:18. Doct. It is just and commendable etc. Mr. Adams gave the blessing. In the afternoon Mr. Adams made a short prayer, read the 139th psalm, and the sixth and twentieth chapters of the Acts."

Whatever scruples Judge Sewall might have had concerning such an innovation as the public reading of the Scriptures, he was pleased on the whole with the service. Neither Mr. Coleman nor Mr. Adams wore a "wig." And when later the Old South adopted the public reading of the Word of God, Sewall joined with the other officers of the Church in approving it.

And yet it is open to question whether the reading of the Scriptures in public worship is invariably a means of grace. Our Puritan fathers feared lest it degenerate into a mere form; lest the reading without the exposition of the Word should give rise to unprofitable conjecture; and afford opportunity for wandering minds to fill themselves with empty vanities when they might as well be listening to the sermon. And how was the time to be found for the reading of the Bible without cutting the already too short sermon below its proper hour and a half? Are we certain yet that the time taken for the reading of the Scriptures is well spent? In some churches, I fear not. Where the Scripture lesson is hastily selected and carelessly read, it is open to serious question whether the exercise be not a profitless interlude between the music and the sermon. And yet it may be a vital portion of any service.

First, then, the Scripture lesson ought to be chosen with care. It may be the chapter from which the text is taken, in which case the context serves as a setting for the text. But this is far from being best in some cases. I well remember attending a church that was often without a pastor, and one of the deacons read the sermon. For a time he read Beecher's sermons, and afterward Talmage's; and invariably the Scripture lesson was the chapter from which the text was taken. Now, whatever the merits of Talmage's preaching, and it had merits, there was little enough relation between the sermon and the text, and as for the context, the sermon rarely had anything to do with it. This boyhood experience prejudiced me against the easy habit of reading the chapter from which the text is chosen.

There are ministers who accompany their reading with a sort of running commentary. Joseph Parker did this, and admirably; and so at times did Beecher, Spurgeon and Talmage. This can be the most dreary and profitless watering down of the pure milk of the Word; but there are times when a minister who had given the matter careful preparation can focus a flood of light upon a chapter by means of brief and helpful comments.

But the reading of Holy Scripture in public worship will be of little value unless the reading is distinct. When the first six copies of the English Bible were set up in St. Paul's in London by Bishop Bonner, crowds gathered about them and listened to the reading of the beautiful new English in which for the first time the Bible was given to them. We are told that "Many well disposed people used to resort much to the hearing thereof, especially when they could get any of an audible voice to read to them."

MODERN WOMANHOOD

Conducted by Mrs. Ida Withers Harrison.

Mrs. Harrison will be glad to receive communications from any of her readers offering suggestions concerning woman's welfare, criticisms of articles or inquiries concerning any matters relevant to her department. She should be addressed directly at 530 Elm Tree Lane, Lexington, Ky.

THE WOMAN WHO WORKS

The old ideal of the world's burden bearer is pictured to us in the fable of Atlas—the Titan with straining shoulders, bearing on his bent back the weight of the earth. A more modern ideal is found in the seal of the state of Kentucky—two gentlemen, with clasped hands, encircled with the legend, "United we stand, divided we fall."

Whether the Greek Atlas, or the two gentlemen of Kentucky, the thought of the ages has been, that it was man, and man only, that bore the world's burdens, and did the world's work. It ignored entirely that other half of the race—the woman who has ever walked beside the man, and shared in his labors.

Now and then, however, we find a rare tribute to this unhonored and unsung toiler; we see infrequent glimpses of her in the background of Jewish history—from Rachel, whom Jacob met and loved as she watered her father's flocks, to Ruth, mother of kings and heroes, whom Boaz claimed as she gleaned in the harvest fields; from Sarah, kneading and baking cakes for Abram and his angelic visitors, to Miriam, poetess and prophetess, and Deborah, judging Israel under her palm tree. And it is only in Hebrew literature that we find the solitary tribute to the laboring woman, in the Words of King Lemuel, the oracle, which his mother taught him.

Ideal Woman of Ancient Times.

This lady of King Lemuel's oracle is painted as wife, mother, mistress, and benefactress; her husband praised her, her children rose up and called her blessed, her servants looked to her for their daily work, the needy without her gates depended on her for their daily bread. In order to fill all these honored places worthily, she is represented as laboring willingly and unceasingly with her hands—rising while it was yet dark, and burning the lamp of night at her tasks. She sought wool and flax, and fashioned them into garments for her household with distaff and spindle. She wove and embroidered tapestry to adorn her home. She even ventured into trade, buying a field, planting a vineyard, selling her homemade garments and girdles to merchants. A noble figure, fitly clothed in purple and fine linen, and in honor and strength and dignity as well!

Here we find the ideal woman, not only of the days of King Lemuel's mother, but of all the following days, down to the times of our grandmothers. Whether peasant in her cottage, spinning, weaving, sewing, cooking for her household, or lady in her hall, directing servants in their work, both bore the large families of those days, and reared and trained their children, until they too went forth to their appointed places in life. Their hands, their days, were full of satisfying labor, because it was needed and productive labor and they were content!

A Working Woman of the South.

In some parts of our land, notably in the South, where old conditions lingered longest, some of us can still recall women whose lives were as full of household labor as was the lady of King Lemuel's oracle. I was born in the fifties of the past century, on my grandfather's large plantation, and my eyes first looked on life from conditions almost patriarchal in their responsibilities. My first recollection of my grandmother is of her standing at the head of a long table, superintending the cutting and giving out of garments to Negro women, to be made into clothing, not only for themselves but for the men and children of the plantation as well. In addition to this oversight of the clothing of this large industrial colony, she had entire control of her own ample establishment. I can see her now, with key basket on her arm, going first to the smoke house, with its home killed, home cured meats, giving out the daily portion for servants and family, then to the storeroom, where the staples of life were kept, not in paper bags, but in bins and sacks and barrels. She not only had to give out the day's work to the men and maids, but see that it was done, from the dignified and deliberate gardener, at work in the gardens or on the grounds, to the little darky who did the daily churning and was wont to drop off to sleep as she lifted the dasher rhythmically up and down. There were the occasional sick to be visited, and the administration of her favorite specific, a blue mass pill, and the many other things that came in the daily round of a large and well ordered household. I remember hearing my father say, when speaking of the Emancipation Proclamation, that my grandmother came nearer being freed by it than any Negro in the South. Here was a laboring woman, though her husband was rich in houses and lands and servants—and there were thousands like her all over the South!

Old Things Have Passed Away.

But these things have passed away—behold, all things have become new! The change is so recent, that some of us have not yet adjusted ourselves to it—we cannot even read the signs of our own times. Briefly and fundamentally, the causes of these changes is the substitution of machine labor for hand, or human, labor. It has affected profoundly the labor world of man, but it has revolutionized the labor world of woman. Her spinning wheels and hand looms are cast away, and the great steam driven looms now make the clothing she once spun and wove and sewed. How few of us now wear garments made by our own hands, or even by the hands of our neighbors! It seems folly to make them ourselves, when we can buy them so much better and cheaper ready made.

A large part of our food is factory prepared. The smoke house, where home killed meats were home cured is becoming a thing of the past, and now we buy our bacon, and hams, and canned meats (if we dare eat them) from the great plants in Chicago, or Kansas City, or Omaha. Our eggs, and chickens, and turkeys are bought up by the cold storage people, and sold back to us at such prices, and times, and state of preservation as they choose. Our store rooms are filled with canned fruits and vegetables from factories; much of our daily bread, whether cakes, or crackers, or cereals, comes from the same place.

Time was, when the children of the family received most of their training at their mother's knee, or under her superintendence. Now, from the kindergarten at six years of age to the university at twenty (or more) the child has passed out of her hands into those of specialists. Olive Schreiner says, "Fully three-fourths of woman's ancient and honorable field of labor has shrunk away forever, and the remaining one-fourth still tends to shrink."

All of this has brought a strange new leisure to once busy wives and mothers; much of the so-called woman's movement is a result of these changed conditions, and of her search for new fields of labor. I. W. H.

An Enormous Iniquity

By the very simplest and narrowest calculation, there are at least 600,000 white slaves in the United States at the present moment. That means that there are half as many prostitutes in the United States as there are soldiers in the allied armies now at war with Turkey. It means that there must be at least 120,000 new girls supplied for our domestic trade next year; 120,000 will be needed between the first of next January and the 31st of next December. They will be needed, and they will be supplied, and in only a few of our states will any of that 120,000 have a voice or a vote in the shaping of the conditions that permit their slavery to continue. Perhaps you think that these things don't concern you. The Chief of the Bureau of Investigation of the Federal Department of Justice last summer declared that no woman of any station whatever was safe from this traffic. That means your wife, your daughter, your sister, your sweetheart. Yes, and it means you. The diseases bred by this traffic as a dunghill breeds flies are among the most hideous and the most easily transmitted known to man. You may say that you will ignore these things, but when the evil has entered your own home you will find that these things have not ignored you.—Reginald Wright Kauffman.

"When I've Been Bad"

Anna May Cooper, in November St. Nicholas.

When I've been bad, my mother says,
"All right, son. Just you wait!"
And when night comes, we listen
For my father at the gate.
And if it's me that hears him first,
I run to let him in,
And tell him all about it
'Fore mother can begin.

And sometimes when I've finished,
He looks down at me and grins,
And says that it reminds him
Of his own boyhood sins;
Then he leads me in to mother,
And he says, "Poor little lad,
I really don't think, sweetheart,
That he's been so very bad."

But last night, by the window,
While I watched the shadows creep,
My eyes got very heavy,
And I, somehow, fell asleep.
I could have told him easy,
Just why I screamed and kicked;
But mother was ahead of me—
And that time I got licked!

C. C. Wilson lectured on "The Battle for Brotherhood" at Evansville, Ind., Y. M. C. A., recently.

B. L. Smith, pastor at Moberly, Mo., was the speaker at a men's banquet at Huntsville, Mo., recently.

O. R. McQueen began his new pastorate at Austin church, Chicago, last Sunday with large congregations.

First Church, Davenport, Ia., has resolved to spend about $12,000 in building an addition to its house of worship.

Carbondale, Ill., church auditorium has been redecorated since the opening of Pastor John P. Given's ministry there.

The second year of H. H. Jenner's pastorate at Long Point, Ill., was ushered in Jan. 1 with a surprise "pound party' by his congregation.

T. W. Grafton, pastor, is leading the Third Church, Indianapolis, in plans for the completion of their house of worship. Only the first story has been erected.

Miss Irene Flint, Sunday-school director at First Church, Lincoln, Neb., has relinquished her work on account of illness and will spend the winter in Florida.

The Disciples Sunday-schools of the land gave $24,630 to home missions from October to January 1. This is an increase of about $5,000 over the same period last year.

Twin Falls, Idaho, church, under W. E. Harman's ministry, which began Jan. 1, is looking forward to a prosperous period. The population of the city is 7,000, and the city is not yet eight years old.

Dr. E. S. Ames of Hyde Park Church, Chicago, begins his term as university preacher at Harvard University, next Sunday, spending two weeks at this time with an additional two weeks in May.

Central Church, Peoria, Ill., whose building burned recently, will not curtail its missionary offerings during the rebuilding period. The church, led by M. L. Pontius, pastor, is brave and determined.

George H. Combs, backed by the men of the Independence Boulevard Church, Kansas City, held an evangelistic meeting with his efforts directed especially toward the winning of men. The meetings proved fruitful.

Union Ave. Church, St. Louis, B. A. Abbott, minister, raised over $30,000 for all purposes last year, and received 88 accessions to its membership which now numbers 804 active members and 329 non-residents.

Over $11,000 raised, of which amount more than $1.000 was for missions and benevolences, is the financial record of First Church, Little Rock, Ark., for 1912. J. N. Jessup, pastor, received 150 persons into the church.

Central Church, Toledo, Grant Speer, pastor, showed a membership enrollment of 997 169 of whom had been received during 1912 The pastor's salary was increased. Mr Speer is entering his seventh year with this congregation.

A sane treatment of cards, theater and the dance by Graham Frank, of Liberty, Mo., in a Sunday evening sermon called forth words of appreciation and an additional exhortation in an editorial in the local newspaper.

A. R. Liverett, pastor at Missouri's capital, Jefferson City, was elected to the chaplaincy of the House of Representatives and introduced to his new "flock" as "a minister standing six feet and a half in the air and two feet on the ground."

What is called a midwinter Chautauqua is in session this week in Kansas City in the Y. W. C. A. auditorum. Prof. Walter Athern, professor of religious eduction in Drake University, Des Moines, is leading the sessions by lecturing on the porblems of religious education.

Eureka, Ill., Disciples led by D. H. Shields, the local pastor and Charles E. Underwood, president of Eureka College, has pledged $10,000 toward the erection of an institutional church for Fred E. Hagin opposite the University of Tokio in Japan. The students alone pledged $3,000.

J. F. Findlay made 960 pastoral calls during 1912 in his parish at Monte Vista, Colo., and received 103 persons into the church, besides holding evangelistic meetings at La Junta with 36 accessions, and at Highlands Church, Denver, with 26 accessions. Mr. Findlay preached 195 sermons from his own pulpit during the year.

R. A. Long, Kansas City millionaire lumberman and philanthropist, in an address at the dedication of the new Christian church at Columbus, Kans., told the congregation that in his younger days he served as janitor three years in that town when the Disciples congregation worshipped in the old court house in the latter 70s.

First Church, Berkeley, Cal., voted at its annual meeting to raise the salary of Pastor H. J. Loken. The year's report showed a net increase in membership notwithstanding a slight defection at the time the congregation adopted the practice of receiving all Christians into its membership. All obligations were reported provided for.

Central church, Decatur, Ill., E. W. Allen, pastor, reports receipts of $8,715 during the year, of which amount $1,170 was for missions and benevolence. Additional gifts of $6,000 were made by members of this church to foreign missions. There were 78 accessions to the membership during the year. Mr. Allen has been with the church ten months.

Galesburg, Ill., church, H. A. Denton, pastor, reports a total of $10,552 raised in the past year, of which amount $4,574 was for current expenses and $876 for missions, the remainder applying on a building and parsonage fund. There were 14 accessions during the year, with a net loss in membership of 28. Mr. Denton has only recently begun his ministry there.

The Chicago Disciples' Quarterly Assembly was held last Sunday afternoon at First Methodist Church in the heart of the city. A fine audience heard Mrs. A. R. Atwater, national president of the C. W. B. M., speak an eloquent message on the "Redemption of the City." E. J. Davis, of the Anti-saloon League spoke on the "Problems of the Saloon" and Secretary O. F. Jordan on the "Problem of the Suburb."

"I would not worry anyone into professing Christ," said Dr. C. M. Chilton in explaining to a Hannibal, Mo., congregation why in the evangelistic meetings he is holding there he did not urge the gospel invitation by much repetition. "Becoming a Christian is a serious matter," he continued, "and any man who has any good in him and is considering tonight, will have no real happiness until he takes up the Christian life."

One of the societies in L. J. Marshall's Wabash Ave. Church in Kansas City is planning to publish an interdenominational church directory of Kansas City containing about 400 pages, each page being devoted to a particular church and containing besides a picture of the house a short history of the congregation and street car routings, to enable strangers to reach the location. Copies of the directory will be placed in hotels, depots, drug stores and other public places free of charge.

Dr. Loa E. Scott, of Chagrin Falls, O., is engaged to lecture to the Christian women of Cleveland in an institute study of "Mormonism—the Islam of America," at the Old Stone Church under the auspices of the Women's Home Missions committee of the city. The institute will continue for three weeks. Two hundred tickets were sold before the first lecture was given. Dr. Scott's Bible class at Euclid Ave. Church, Cleveland, has brought her great fame in the church life of the city.

In a campaign for state funds, Evangelist D. E. Olson, and State Superintendent of Missions C. B. Osgood, start Feb. 1 for a tour of the state of Minnesota. The itinerary includes a visit to every church in the state. Mr. Olson for some time has been raising funds for the Scandinavian center at Minneapolis under the direction of the A. C. M. S. In accordance with his generous offer made at the state convention last summer, he is donating a month's time to this campaign. The gratitude of the entire state is due him for his valuable aid.

L. J. Marshall is preaching a series of Sunday morning sermons on "The Church and the Social Order," at Wabash Avenue Church, Kansas City. Seven themes treat of the Church in its relation to Government, to Capital, to Labor, to Education, to the Home, to Entertainment, and to Religion. The Kansas City Star recognized the significance of Mr. Marshall's message in an editorial on the series.

Wellington, Kan., church makes a good annual report and re-ëlects its pastor, O. L. Smith, for another year. Of a total of ninety-two additions, forty-eight were by baptism. An evangelistic meeting held in November and early December, by W. F. Shearer, resulted in fifty-seven additions to the membership. Sunday-school attendance has averaged 211. The sum of $3,500 was raised for all purposes of which nearly one-third was given to missions.

During the first year of Claire L. Waite's pastorate at Central Church, Cincinnati, just closed, the church raised $6,600.95 of which $1,329.24 went to missions and benevolence. There was a net gain of 58 in the membership, there having been 84 additions and 30 baptisms at regular services during the year. Conditions have radically changed since forty years ago when this old church erected what was then the finest building among the Disciples. The present membership is facing the downtown problem with courage and attacking it with energy.

Terre Haute, Ind., church led by George Darsie, pastor, is engaged in a systematic campaign to secure a pledge list of $50 per day to take care of local expenses and to cut down the debt of over $30,000 standing against the property. So far the amount pledged is $32.90 per day representing 543 contributors. After a searching canvass of the non-contributing element of the congregation the officers have returned to the contributing members asking for an all around increase. They are receiving a generous response. This church raised a budget of over $15,000 in 1912.

It is the custom of East End Church, Pittsburgh, to hold its annual meeting after a dinner, the entire congregation being invited. On Jan. 15, 265 people sat down together at this affair. Nearly $10,000 was raised last year, over $2,000 for missions. During the pastorate of J. R. Ewers, 209 have been added, 59 last year, 22 by baptism, net gain 47. Present active membership list, 400. The church is in excellent condition. The minister was given a handsome increase in salary. Dr. W. F. Richardson of Kansas City, began a series of decision meetings, Jan. 19.

The annual meeting of First Church, Springfield, Ill., was held Wednesday evening, January 9. The reports showed a total of money raised for the current year of $10,471.23. Of this amount about $2,000 was for missions, $268.41 was for local charity, $522.50 for educational work, $522.79 for the Sunday-school, and $4,682.16 for current expenses, including the minister's salary. The three women's societies reported net receipts of $1,980.83, and the Brotherhood $633.75, all of which was applied on new building pledge. There were 64 additions to the membership during the year. The present membership is 942. The average attendance at the Sunday-school for the year was 266, for the last quarter, 313. The new church was dedicated June 30, previous to which time the congregation assembled in the Masonic Temple for two years. The report of the trustees showed a total cost of the new building $118,500; of the lot $17,000; total $135,500. This is covered by $35,000 from the sale of old property, pledges to date of $80,125, and a secured indebtedness of $20,375. The house is one of the best in the entire brotherhood. The minister, Frederick W. Burnham, has just completed his sixth year in this pastorate and is now entering the seventh year, under his second five-year call. At the last meeting of the Board a church survey was planned which will furnish a detailed exhibit of the church's relation to the various civic institutions and the community life of the city. Among the features already adopted for serving the community is a service of Sunday afternoon organ recitals, one each month, the attendance at which has already taxed the capacity of the house.

Office-bearers Ordained.

The newly-elected elders and deacons of Central Church, Lexington, Ky., were formally ordained to their offices by the church. The pastor, I. J. Spencer, preached on Sunday morning concerning the model church, its officers and organization, setting forth in a practical way the mutual relationship that should exist between the church and its scriptural leaders. In the evening Prof H. L. Calhoun, dean of the Bible College of Transylvania University, assisted in the exercises, pronouncing the ordination formula in connection with the name of each candidate, and also delivered the ordination charge to the congregation. James M. Rash, a minister and elder, and Prof. A. W. Fortune, also participated in the program. After the ordination formula was spoken in connection with the name of each officer-elect a brief prayer was offered that he might be filled with the Holy Spirit and guided by heavenly wisdom. A number of applicable and luminous passages from the New Testament describing the character and work of church officers were read and special ordination hymns were sung by the choir and congregation. The men thus sacredly chosen and set apart as the leaders of the church will never forget the high interests reposed with them by those who elected them nor their great allegiance to Christ. Nor will the congregation soon forget the obligation it owes to the men chosen as its office-

Ten Big Reasons Why

BETHANY GRADED LESSONS are being adopted by so many of the best schools among Disciples

1. There is more to them—at least a third more—than is contained in any other series.
2. They are rich, vital and full of suggestion to teacher and pupil.
3. They are free from the sectarian spirit.
4. They are soundly and fervently evangelical.
5. They are truly artistic in all their illustrations.
6. They are printed on better paper with better binding and in better taste than any other series.
7. Every lesson writer is an expert of interdenominational reputation.
8. They are a monument to the modern spirit of unity—a dozen leading denominations have co-operated to produce them and are now using them.
9. The Disciples possess full editorial rights, through the editor, Charles Clayton Morrison.
10. Every Disciple school that uses them participates in and promotes a great Christian union enterprise.

EVERY QUARTER ADDS TO THE NUMBER OF SCHOOLS INTRODUCING THESE LESSONS.

A Substantial Past and a Hopeful Future.

Modest as are the dimensions and appointments of its new house which was opened Jan. 7 and which cost but $5,000, Peter Ainslie's Temple Seminary in Baltimore has not only a significant future before it but a substantial record of achievements. In the past eight years the Seminary has been giving a free course in Bible study with night classes and covering a course of three years. Rooms in the Christian Temple were used, but for some time there has been a feeling that the Seminary could do better work if it had its own separate quarters. The Seminary has its own charter and its own board of trustees. About half of the student body have come from the Disciples. The other half are from Methodists, Episcopalians, Baptists, Lutherans, Presbyterians, United Presbyterians, United Brethren, English Reformed, German Reformed, Dunkards and Jews. From the student body have gone preachers, missionaries, pastors, nurses and a host of Sunday-school teachers. The course is practically free, students being required to pay only for lights and fuel. The regular Bible instructors are Rev. E. B. Bagby and Dr. Ainslie. Supplemental lectures are given by the leading ministers of the city of the Presbyterian, Baptist, Episcopal, Methodist, Lutheran and Congregational communions. This year a class in English has been started and the instructor is Miss Anna Hahn, a teacher in the city schools. The aim is to equip church workers for larger service and to arouse young men and young women to offer their lives for the ministry and the mission field.

A Pastor's "Platform."

H. A. Denton, recently settled in his pastorate at Galesburg, Ill., publishes in his parish paper what he calls the new pastor's "platform," as follows: "That he will give care and pains to come to the pulpit prepared with a message that is worth while; that he will answer at the earliest convenience all cases of illness, accident, trouble or opportunities that are brought to his attention; that he will put the interests of the church and the cause before any selfish interests in the expectation that the church will do the same; that the humblest member of the church will receive the same consideration as one of the Lord's disciples that would be given the wealthiest; that the friendship of the poorest will be craved and appreciated equally with all; that no man will be forsaken for his weakness, nor despised for his faults; that no man will be feared for his power nor considered for his influence; that impartial and fair treatment will be given every member of the church; that he will be the friend of all and the enemy of none; that he will absolutely refuse to be used for any personal ends; that he will speak candidly and frankly his judgment upon all matters pertaining to the welfare of the church; that, in view of the fact that he will be held responsible for the success of the work during his pastorate, he will expect the liberty of leadership and initiative with the endorsement of the same by the officers and members of the board and church; that he will always ask officers and department heads to do well their work and respect the provinces of others with the motto: "Every man to his own work;" that he will make your desire to have an adequate church plant and the leading congregation of the community his desire; that he will be a true disciple; that he will conduct himself in matters of co-operation with the churches of the city as a Christian should; that he will preach the Word; that he will not scold; that he will not sulk; that he will get up early and remain up late to do the Lord's work, and that in humility and a full appreciation of the weaknesses common to humanity he will always be among those who serve."

Meaning of the March Offering

1. It is an expression of the faith of the church in Jesus Christ as the Divine Saviour ouf the world.

2. It testifies to the faith of the church in the gospel and its power to save all men.

3. The March Offering is also an expression of the confidence of the church in the missionaries on the field and an appreciation of the faithful service they have rendered. They have endured hardness, they have faced death and they have planted the banner of the Cross on the grave of hoary paganism.

4. The offering is an expression of the desire of the church to have fellowship with all the infant churches in the Far East—Japan, China, Philippines, Tibet, India, as well as in Africa and Cuba. The new-born disciples cry for fellowship and fraternity. They long for the touch of a friendly hand. Our help in March is a recognition of their faith and Christian heroism. It is the strong rejoicing in helping the weak.

5. The offering testifies as to a church's confidence in the final triumph of the truth in all the earth. The whole world is to be Immanuel's land. Our Lord is to reign supreme among all men in every clime. The glorious day is rapidly approaching. More was accomplished in 1912 than in any former year since our Lord ascended on high, and 1913 will witness even greater victories.

6. The offering testifies as to the life and usefulness of the local church. It speaks of the church's purity, and unity and intelligent appreciation of all the highest and best things in Christian living. The church that is interested in a man in Asia or Africa will be interested in the man on the other side of the street.

Order March Offering supplies today and make March 2d the greatest rally our people have ever enjoyed.

Benevolent Association News

An enjoyoble and significant conference has just been held in St. Louis by the Association with its Field Men. M. Gunn (Ohio), J. P. Davis (Ind.), Fred Kline (Ill.), J. D. Dillard (Mo.), J. W. Strawn (Kans., Nebr., Okla., and Ark.), and Otis Hawkins (Tex., N. M., and La.), were present. It is expected that far-reaching results will grow out of this conference. A delightful feature of the meeting was a New Year's Eve reception at the Christian Orphans' Home, to which our St. Louis pastors and their wives were invited.

The following from one of our good pastors is a sample of the appeals we are constantly receiving: "I am writing you for help for a dear old sister of this congregation. Mrs. ——— has now reached the age of 74 years. She was baptized by Isaac Errett more than half a century ago. She is a charming, hopeful, smiling old soul. She has absolutely nothing—no friends in this world closer than second cousins, except one brother who is helpless." Such appeals, and they are many, tug hard at our heart strings. We can respond to them in a practical way only to the degree that the friends of the Association make possible their gifts. If this dear soul were your very own mother or sister what would you do? Can you do less for her, now that you have the example and teaching of Jesus, than to help provide a home for her and for such as she?

Remember, that Easter Lord's Day, March 23, is the one day in the year when the

Foreign Mission News

Word has been received that Mrs. David Rioch in India, has a light case of small pox.

Last week a friend in Kentucky sent $1,000 cash as a direct gift for the work of the Foreign Society. We are in a position to accept many such gifts.

A friend in California sends us $500 on the annuity plan. She will receive $15 every six months as long as she lives and at her death the $500 belongs to the foreign society without further obligation. We will be pleased to receive many other such gifts.

A large number of preachers and church leaders are taking up the David Livingstone Centenary Campaign of missionary education. This is the greatest uniform program of missionary education ever presented to the churches. It is for church, home, Sunday-school and Endeavor Societies.

There are forty Chinese students in the University of Michigan. More than half of these are earnest Christian men. Among them are two from our Nankin Mission and school. These forty young men are typical of over 500 Chinese students in American universities. They are the cream of China. They will go back to hold important official positions and help to mould a new China.

Prof. G. W. Brown, Jubbulpore, India, writes, "I have nearly all the foundation in for the new press building. The old line of buildings where we are to put up the new dormitories, is now being torn down and I shall soon begin on the foundations for them. Expect to have both of them (press building and dormitories) up before the hot season comes." Brother Brown and the mission have purchased a new bungalow at Jubbulpore. This was much needed.

"Among Central African Tribes," Secretary Stephen J. Corey's journal of his Congo visit, is selling very rapidly. The second edition is already being printed. The first five thousand are nearly gone. Many preachers and friends are selling quantities of the book in their congregations. The people at Cynthiana, Ky., Joseph Armistead, pastor, have bought eighty copies. David H. Shields of Eureka, Ill., writes "I finished the little book 'Among Central African Tribes' last night and it stirred me so that I did not sleep much. It is a most vivid account of the most wonderful work of God that I have seen."

BY
AMES

Is a popular statement of both the theological and practical truths centering in our evangelical faith in Christ.

It is scholarly, but not technical.

It lifts the problem of the nature and character of Christ out of the setting of the old-time dogmatism and places it in the light of the more empirical, human and meaningful thought of our own day.

Its Treatment of Unitarianism is original, fresh, illuminating. A single chapter entitled, "Why I am not a Unitarian" will furnish any reader, conservative or liberal, a new point of view.

It is glowing with religious earnestness. It is a living word spoken to the hearts and souls of living people.

Appreciations

Professor George A. Coe says: "These sermons display a remarkable union of intellectual boldness and spiritual warmth. I know of nothing else in print that brings out quite so clearly the positive religious values that can be reached by a rigorous application to Christian dogmas of the functional and valuational point of view. Even readers who cannot accept Professor Ames' position at all points must agree that such a book helps to clear the air, and to focus attention at the right point."

The Indianapolis News says: "One would go far to find a finer interpretation of religious thought and experience in terms of spiritual laws. Mr. Ames is emphatically a man with a message."

The Chicago Inter-Ocean says: "Six sermons full of broad humanity."

The Watchman says: "Professor Ames is avowedly a "liberal" in theology but his liberalism seems to be of a wholesome kind, in the sense that he is less concerned about doctrines and creeds than he is about service and the helping of people to their best life."

The Independent says: "Dr. Ames does not deny being a liberal, but strongly objects to being styled a 'Unitarian', quoting with enthusiasm a saying of one of the early leaders of his denomination: 'I am neither a Unitarian nor a Trinitarian, but strive to be simply a Christian.' The sermons are thoughtful, moderate in tone and straightforward in expression."

Unity says: "Those who were privileged to listen to these sermons must have found their spiritual natures quickened."

The Advance says: "These are strong, virile sermons, appealing to the reason and satisfying the heart."

Professor Edward C. Moore, of Harvard, says: "It is a very clear and convincing statement of the issue as it stands in the minds of modern men. It makes us realize how the old formulation of the question has become obsolete, no one any longer states the question in the old terms. Dr. Ames has availed himself in admirable fashion of the opportunity for a new statement of the case, and the spirit in which he writes must convey confidence and reassurance to all."

THE CHRISTIAN CENTURY

Vol. XXX January 31, 1913 Number 5

WHAT HAS BECOME OF THE INFIDEL?

BY JOHN RICHARD BROWN

THE LAND OF THE RISING SUN

BY HERBERT L. WILLETT

CHICAGO

Disciples Publication Society

THE DISCIPLES PUBLICATION SOCIETY is a corporation chartered under the laws of Illinois. It is organized for the purpose of publishing books, Sunday School literature and a weekly religious newspaper. It has no capital stock. Its profits are not to go to individuals but to be appropriated to advance the cause of religious education, especially the higher education of the Christian ministry. The term "religious education" is regarded as an ideal common to Sunday Schools, missionary societies, colleges, seminaries and universities, and other organizations that promote Christian progress through Christian education. The Society through its trustees has purchased the entire assets and good will of the New Christian Century Company (including the subscription list and good will of The Christian Century; a contract of participation in the interdenominational syndicate for publishing the Bethany Graded Lessons; a contract of membership in the United Religious Press; all books, Sunday School supplies and other stock on hand; all accounts and bills receivable; besides assuming liability for all accounts and bills payable), for $16,000 and has executed its notes to that amount which have been accepted by the stock-holders of the New Christian Century Company in payment for their property. To provide capital for enlarging the business the trustees are issuing 5 per cent bonds in the amount of $50,000, retirable after five years, to be sold to persons interested in the ideals of The Christian Century. It is believed at the present time that not more than $25,000 of these bonds need be sold in order to put the Society on a sound profit earning basis. Subscriptions for the purchase of these bonds are now being solicited by C. C. Morrison and H. L. Willett, editors of The Christian Century. During Dr. Willett's absence in the Orient correspondence may be addressed exclusively to Mr. Morrison. Full information as to all details will be given upon inquiry. The essential purpose of the transaction and proposals herein described is to provide a way for the general brotherhood of the Disciples of Christ to buy The Christian Century and its publishing house and to pay for them by patronizing them. The bonds and notes are to be retired out of the profits earned by the Society. The purchasers of bonds, therefore, will stand, with the holders of notes, in the position of sustainers or supporters of the enterprise while the brotherhood's patronage is paying for it and increasing its value. The question of defining the membership of the Disciples Publication Society is still open, and upon it the organizers will be glad to receive suggestions. It is the purpose to make it thoroughly democratic and representative. The five trustees named by the charter will act for the Society until the basis of membership has been determined and the members elected.

BUT ONE THING NEEDFUL

The New Christian Century Company which succeeded the Christian Century Company was nearly five years old when last week it transferred its property to the Disciples Publication Society as described above. During these years the company has operated practically without ready capital.

It was plain at the beginning that we could not expect others to join us in supporting The Christian Century by investment until it had been demonstrated how nearly the paper could live without money! Only thus would our friends be persuaded to provide us with the wherewithal to enlarge its circulation and enrich its pages. This has been a task involving self-denials and economies which even an inexperienced imagination can vividly enough conceive.

We have worked—and waited. During these years no friend has been advised that we could even be persuaded to accept capital if it were offered us! We have undertaken our work by faith. Probably $250 would cover the amount of money we have spent to enlarge our circulation in the entire five years! The snug Sunday-school business done by this company has been gotten without the aid of a single solicitor, and with practically no circularizing. The merits of the Bethany Graded Lessons have carried them, not the aggressive business methods by which they have been promoted. And this literature has been brought to the attention of our public solely through advertisements in The Christian Century.

But our point was all the while being demonstrated. The patient, economical and business-like management has been rewarded in its having demonstrated beyond reasonable doubt that all The Christian Century lacks in order to attain a commanding business success is a reasonable capital. The deficits for these years have been amazingly low compared with the losses of the previous administration under whose long-surviving shadow our work has been done.

There is not the slightest question in the minds of those who are in the office that there is an entirely unoccupied field into which The Christian Century could enter immediately if it had the small sum of money it is now asking its friends to invest. To enter this field is the bounden duty of a newspaper uttering our message, and it is also our opportunity to place the Disciples Publication Society on a solid profit-earning basis.

To write frankly of shop-talk like this is in line with the purpose of the new Society to take the public into its confidence. In our present solicitation of support we wish our friends to know something of the difficulties we have contended against and something of the attitude and temper with which we have endeavored to meet them.

The following letters have been received:

By W. B. CLEMMER, Rockford, Ill.

I am sure the contemplated change is in keeping with the new spirit in our brotherhood and shows an estimable spirit of Christian enterprise. I trust it may be happily consummated and that your present ideals in Christian journalism be maintained and made more effective still.

By CHARLES M. FILLMORE, Indianapolis.

Congratulations on the Disciples Publication Society. I wish I had $5,000 to invest. As I have it not, I must content myself with offering 5,000 best wishes for success.

By G. I. HOOVER, Tipton, Ind.

I have read with interest the important announcement appearing in this week's issue of The Christian Century concerning the proposed change in the ownership and management of The Christian Century and its associate publications. The discussion in recent years of the relation which a religious publication should sustain to the communion in the name of which it is issued has made some principles increasingly clear:

1. A religious journal should depend primarily for its support upon its merit as a publication. The real worth of the output of a given company should be the chief consideration in appealing to the patronage of the churches and their constituency.

2. Assuming to speak in the name of a great religious body as every noteworthy denominational journal does, there should be some basis of accountability to the brotherhood for whom, or for a considerable group of whom, it presumes to speak.

3. The elimination of the element of profit for private gain does appeal to the supporting constituency of the churches.

I wish to congratulate you that the way has become clear for the transfer of the ownership and control of The Christian Century to the brotherhood of the Disciples of Christ in harmony with thest principles. I believe that the success of the enterprise will mean a new era of prosperity for The Christian Century, that the paper itself will become even more instinctive with the essential spirit of our communion and will attain for itself a growing place in the field of religious journalism. Certainly those who cherish the ideals of which The Christian Century is the exponent should receive the announcement with satisfaction and rally to the support of the enterprise.

CHARLES CLAYTON MORRISON,
700 E. 40th Street, Chicago.

I am interested in doing what I can to aid you and Dr. Willett in your plan for firmly establishing The Christian Century in the ownership and control of the Disciples. Kindly send me additional information. How long do the bonds extend? In what financial condition does the new Society begin business? Can you accept payment for bonds on the installment plan or must you have immediate cash for entire amount subscribed?

"Essays and Reviews"

MY OLDER READERS will rub their eyes as the memories suggested by the title of this famous but now almost forgotten volume are recalled. They will accuse me of wierdly entering the sacred portals of the dead, and warming into life this gladiator who, in the late fifties, challenged the intellectual lethargy of England and created such a furore that, at this remote date, the bare mention of the non-committal title makes to pass before us infantry and artillery of divers schools of theology, the echoes of whose conflicts have scarcely died away. "Essays and Reviews" marked an epoch in the Church of England.

I find it difficult to believe my eyes, warrior bold, as I look upon your faded and bruised exterior, spotted with many a stain—scars of abuse, not wounds of battle; as I glance at your blemishes on almost every page—the work of ghouls who thought you as low-bred as they—I find it difficult to believe my eyes that you in the days of your youth entered the lists against the powerful intellectual aristocracy of England that was sleeping in the sublime confidence that the rock-ribbed traditions of its church could no more be shaken than could Gibraltar by the falling of a sunbeam.

When you blew your blast the nation leaped to its feet, the mightiest rushed into the fray, the resounding blows of conflicting interests told the story of the intensity of the struggle; and, through it all, you acquitted yourself with such honor that even those who would not acknowledge defeat at your hands, were moved by their admiration to admit that you were the doughtiest warrior that had ever set foot on ecclesiastical soil in Britain.

I discovered you, warrior bold, in an upper shelf of a second-hand book store, reposing under a mantle of dust—the same as that which covers the mortal remains of those who brought you into being. In life they would have despised your form as compared with theirs, but you have been preserved much better than they. I rejoice that while their bodies are being resolved into the elements their immortal spirits live in you. They can never die as long as you live. But for you their great names would have perished with their requiems. They are lying tonight under the elms in quiet English churchyards or in the great abbeys, while you are alive to me under the cheerful firelight. Their state is fixed for all eternity; you can be transported to any quarter of the globe. Their work is done, except as they shall work in all the years through you. I mourn the death of those who gave you to the world, and the consolations would be few were it not that you are for them an imperishable memorial.

I really pitied you, good friend, when I saw the neglect into which you had fallen. How out of place and forsaken you looked on that upper shelf! Time was when no shelf in England was wise enough in its own conceit to bid for your lodging. Riot and rebellion in book-land would have followed. Eager hands hustled you to shop windows, to places of prominence where the public must see; and other hands bore you away where sage or student companied with you far into the night, and deemed such companionship an honor.

I think of the days, too, when the reviewers dissected you to the vitals, and damned or canonized you each according to his breeding; when even fashionable dames discussed you in their club meetings; when grave prelates and reverend priests battled their wits with yours. But you held steadily on your way. You turned every man into a Jeremiah to trumpet the doom that you seemed to announce, or into a John the Baptist to herald the breaking of a day when the minds of men should be as free to act in the province of theology as in the domain of medicine, and when faith should not be determined by an act of Parliament, or at the bidding of a noble lord who paid for his theology liberally, and penalized any deviations therefrom by starvation in this world and prospects of penal fires in the next.

You were a herald of unrest, my warrior-friend. You made men enemies who had been life-long friends; you made many of the accepted tenets of established theology sit as uneasily on men's reason as tyrants sit on thrones; you made wonder to speculate how long it would be before the heavens fell; and you would have been pilloried as a disturber of the peace, according to the best usage of the Establishment, were it not for the greatness of your learning and the fidelity of your faith. You gained the hatred of one of the most complacent ages on which the sun ever shone. You did not convert England to your views, but you weakened the influence of every theologian who kept his eyes buried in the pillows of past conclusions lest the light of present discoveries should break upon them.

And I found you, dear immortal, on a shelf with disreputable company, the gamblers and thieves of the literary world, doomed to be burned soon as waste, if no buyer appeared, or to be sold by the pound to another dealer in the shades of the famous! I feel guilty because of the trifling price I paid for you, but as you have had your day, no avaricious dealer could tax me more. I am tempted to bewail the fate into which immortals like you may fall. Time, the ravisher, makes food of us all for worms, whether we be gods among books or gods among men.

Home Rule for Erin

At the end of a debate lasting fifty-two days, the Irish home rule bill passed the third reading, its final stage in the house of commons, by a vote of 367 to 257. It was sent immediately to the house of lords where it will be sure to be rejected. It may, however, be passed again by the lower house and within two years become law in spite of the veto of the upper chamber. It has been the hope of the Tory party that another general election could be brought about in the near future, and thus give the country at large an opportunity to express its opinion on home rule. With the last few weeks, however, a serious division has occurred in the Tory-Unionist ranks because of the proposition to give the colonies a preferential tax on food, which has met with great opposition. Should parliament dissolve now, a Liberal victory would be almost certain. Ulster still threatens rebellion, but two years will give ample opportunity for that problem to be solved. Surely the last two decades, since Gladstone's home rule bill passed the commons to be instantly defeated by the lords, have seen a marked change of opinion in all quarters regarding the Irish question which now seems to be in a fair way to be solved once and for all.

The Nation's Honor at Stake

No doughtier knight ever broke lance in mediæval tourney than that modern champion of the peace movement, David Starr Jordan, president of Leland Stanford University. Damascus blades are dull compared with the weapon he wields. His fountain-pen has flowed freely on many a battlefield. In the current number of the Atlantic Monthly, he enters the lists again with the professional war-makers. It is a bloodless, though not an inkless, joust, and when the fray is over the field is strewn with the dead bodies of the militarists. While this method of fighting militarism may be perilously like the serpent's swallowing its own tail, we cannot but admire the skill of the thrusts given by this militant anti-militarist. "In Europe and America," President Jordan says, "taxes have doubled in the last fifteen years, and half of this extra tax has gone to build up 'our ships,' 'our bankers,' 'our commerce,' 'our manufactures,' 'our promoters,' 'our defense,' in nation after nation, while 'the man lowest down,' who bears the brunt of this taxation, is never called on to share its benefits. The ships that bear our flag in order to go through our canal at our expense are not 'our ships.' By the very fact of free tolls, we know them for the ships of our enemy; for the arch-enemy of democracy is privilege." The recent action of congress calling for free-tolls for American vessels engaged in coastwise trade going through the Panama Canal is regarded by President Jordan as a stain upon our national honor. According to the contention of peace-loving men as a nation we cannot afford to violate the Hay-Pauncefote treaty of 1901, whereby, for due considerations, it was agreed that there should be no discrimination against any nation in respect to tolls. By those who negotiated the treaty it was clearly understood that the United States could not favor its own vessels, and the senate so understood, when it assented to the ratification of the treaty and defeated an amendment the purpose of which was to favor American coastwise trade. After nearly a century of peace with the mother-country—even though every well-informed citizen of both nations believes that war between Great Britain and the United States is no longer a possibility—it would be most unfortunate for anything to occur that would bring on even a delicate diplomatic situation. The only honorable course for the United States to follow, if there really arises a real difference of opinion over the phraseology of the treaty which permitted the United States to dig the Panama Canal, is to submit the matter to The Hague tribunal. Doubtless the decision would be unfavorable to the contention of the United States. But no matter. There can be no disgrace in submitting such international differences to arbitration or to abide by an unfavorable decision. It would be dishonorable, however, to refuse to arbitrate such a question, and especially when the matter involves Great Britain and the United States. It was to cover just such little irritating disputes that the proposed arbitration treaty with Great Britain was designed. It is a thousand pities that the senate defeated that peace-making agreement. After this paragraph was set up, dispatches from Washington have announced the introduction of a bill into the senate by Senator Root, the purpose of which is to abolish tolls for American coastwise traffic.

Another "Century of Dishonor"?

A sad story of neglect and exploitation is revealed in the recent report of the committee on expenditures in the interior department. Chairman Graham, of Illinois, asserts that the Chippewa Indians of the White Earth Reservation in Minnesota have been robbed of millions of dollars' worth of pine timber by lumber companies operating under favorable legislation and administration of Indian affairs. Through a senate "rider" on an Indian appropriation bill in 1904, Indians of mixed blood were allowed to sell the timber on past and prospective allotments of land. At the same time an act originating in the house provided for the allotment of valuable pine lands, with the result that the best and most valuable pine allotments fell into the hands of those who were intended in advance to receive them. After it was all over, it was found that practically all the pine on the reservation had been sold to three lumber companies, almost as if by pre-arranged divisions. Not more than 5 per cent of the sales proved beneficial to the allottees. These are not gray wolves, but white wolves that howl around the miserable huts of these unsophisticated and helpless wards of the nation. In one desolate shack, the committee found three women, who, though blind, were about to be ejected by mortgage foreclosure, and this case is typical of others. In one part of the reservation where some 500 Indians live, nearly every man, woman and child is afflicted with trachoma, many are blind, and 25 per cent have tuberculosis. Squalor and misery abound. If the statements of the report are well founded, a more serious indictment against our Indian service could hardly be imagined.

Municipal Crime Factories

How many communities are directly engaged in the manufacture of criminals? How many of our church members, to say nothing of our pastors, have ever investigated the "lock-ups" in our police stations. The Juvenile Protective Association of Chicago has found conditions in these cells unspeakably vile. Often they are so crowded the inmates cannot sit down. Many who are confined have venereal diseases, and these cells are breeding-places of moral and physical foulness. According to an article in the Survey, by Louise DeKoven Bowen, the failure properly to classify prisoners results often in putting innocent girls and prostitutes into the same cell. Another evil is the "mugging" system, whereby the photograph and measurements of every one arrested are recorded. In 1911, 5,338 cases were thus "mugged," considerably less than half of whom were found guilty, the rest being presumably innocent. One must visit these "lock-ups" on one of the busy nights—Saturday or Sunday—to see for oneself the danger to the community arising from the indiscriminate herding together of the innocent with the guilty under, for the most part, intolerable sanitary conditions. In 1911, there were confined in the Cook County jail 1,328 boys over seventeen and under twenty-one years of age and sixty-one girls over eighteen and under twenty-one years of age—juvenile adults, who are not affected by the present juvenile court law of the state of Illinois. No doubt some of these were already well started toward an habitual criminal life, but it is safe to say that a considerable proportion of them, were they not thrown into intimate contact with seasoned criminals, might be redeemed to useful citizenship. We could at least raise the age limit of the present juvenile law to twenty-one years and wipe out the present method of treatment of juvenile adults. When shall we become thoroughly aroused to a state of affairs which undoubtedly exists in many other cities beside Chicago? How much longer will we permit the wholesale manufacture of criminals?

The Making of Books

It is not so difficult to make a book as many people suppose. The difficulty is in finding somebody who will buy and read it. Publishers assume that an edition of 1,000 copies is necessary to cover expenses, and if the book be illustrated it may require from 2,000 to 10,000 copies to justify its publication financially. Probably not one book out of ten sells out its first edition of 1,000. The publishers reimburse themselves on the larger sales of the exceptional book. He who has great thoughts which he wishes to give to the world should ask himself this question: Is it probable that there are 1,000 people anywhere on earth who want to know these important truths of mine enough to pay $1.50 apiece for them? It is a sobering and often a humbling thought.

The Necessity of Prayer

What is prayer? Why should we pray? To these questions Dr. Robert F. Horton answers: "Prayer is simply and solely the realization of God. We spend time in prayer in order to become aware of the Power that made us, and the purpose for which we were made. We are apt to live in a thoughtless disregard of this, which must evidently be the most important thing in the world for us. We go on in the pressing necessities of living or in the restless thirst for pleasure, giving no thought to the vital questions, Whence came I? Whither am I going? What is the object of it all? These questions can only be answered by reference to the Power which made us."

The God whom we seek to realize is revealed in Christ. His ways are orderly and just. He knows our needs before we ask him. He is ever ready to bestow the highest blessings upon his people. He is easy of access. He is improperly represented by an oriental monarch whose throne is guarded by soldiers and officers of high and of low rank. His favor, is not gained by bribes. Our offerings and our worship are acceptable to him only as they elevate our thoughts and strengthen our hands for deeds of righteousness. The gift we bring to his altar is rejected if we are at variance with our brother and are endeavoring to substitute the forms and emotions of religion for fair dealing and kindness of heart. God demands holiness of us. Yet he knows our frame, he remembers that we are dust. As a father pities his weak and foolish children, so God pities us. And his pity makes us strong.

In seeking to realize God we are also realizing ourselves. Apart from God we are less than ourselves. Life is measured by ideals. Prayer in the name of Jesus brings the sense of sin and humiliation. Thoughts, words, and actions which we have tolerated and perhaps accepted as good, appear as evil when we pray, for we see them then in the light of the glory of God in the face of Jesus Christ. Prayer makes impossible the easy ways of moral indifference. The bargaining sort of morality has no standing before the God whom the Christian seeks. Deceit and trickery are necessarily excluded when we seek him who is everywhere and whose ways are unchangeable. Were our God a local deity, we might feel at liberty to deceive and defraud the foreigner, but, as he is the God of all men, and cares for all, we cannot ask his aid in any enterprise that tends to degrade the weakest human being on the face of the earth. Thus, by praying in the name of Jesus, we reach the full measure of spiritual power and dignity.

We must pray without ceasing because temptation is ever present. The fight is always on. It is easy to forget why we are here and to follow pleasures that weaken the will and blunt the sensibilities. We may grow weary in well doing. We must drudge every day, we face ingratitude, our efforts are misunderstood, and the wise men debate the question of what is the highest good. It is no wonder that we are tempted to relax our efforts. We cannot do our best unless we realize that the strength of the eternal God is ours. They that are against us seem to be more than they that are for us until our eyes are opened and we see the chariots of God around us. We may have to use the prayer which Dr. Horton says was breathed by Sir Jacob Astley, at Edgehill, as he entered the battle to fight for the king: "O Lord, thou knowest how busy I must be this day. If I forget thee, do not thou forget me." The feeling that God will not forget us will help us not to forget him and the aid he gives to the tempted.

Prayer is appreciation. We therefore need to pray in public. The literary critic points out the excellencies of a poem, a story, an essay, and thus increases our enjoyment of literature. But it is the poet, the writer of stories and of essays whose appreciation of life is to be set before that of the critic. The student of the history of religion has something of value to say, the biblical critic is useful, and the theologian corrects and enlarges our idea of God and of salvation. But before religious feeling can be purified it must exist. Those who are themselves religious can arouse our feelings of dependence and gratitude. Prayer is one of the ways in which expression is given to the sentiments of religion. By means of it we share our faith and hope with each other. Our lives would be much poorer if they were to be deprived of what they owe to the prayers of the saints. By their prayers men show what they appreciate and what they aspire to be. A Personal Letter and an Open Response

My Dear Brother Morrison: In reply to yours concerning bonds in the new Century, I regret to be compelled to say it is impossible for me to take any myself. It will be a pleasure to do anything I can, however, to interest some one with money and the Century spirit. I believe in the spirit even if I cannot agree with the method, and I do certainly want to see your pungent and able pen kept on the job. But before I talk to anyone about bonds I would like for you to fortify me on one point. The Century has not been paying. It has been losing if I am rightly informd. What are we to do with the claim that the stock is not worth $16,000? I seems to me you ought to justify the proposition from a strictly financial view. The man who simply sees the surface fact that a losing business is to be turned over to the brotherhood at a considerable cash value raises embarrassing questions. You must not misunderstand me when I say I regret that the men who hold the stock could not see their way to make a clean gift of it. I want you to convince me of the business soundness of the arrangement, for I want to see your proposition go through, and I am anxious to be able to help. This letter is private and confidential to you personally. Others might not understand my motives. As a friend you will.

My Dear Friend: Yours of the 24th inst. is at hand. You will not object, I am sure, to my making the contents of your letter public together with my reply, if I withold your name. I wish to say to others, to the Disciple public indeed, what your letter asks me to say to you.

Your letter is the first occasion I have had to make any reference to what seems to me the utterly wanton caricature with which a certain religious newspaptr has described our project. Those who have not seen that description may wonder at my speaking so gravely as I am going to do in answer to your straightforward and friendly request. I imagine that your request for information has been occasioned by this caricature and while I think I could satisfy your personal inquiry in a very few words I mean to write at some length for the sake of others of less business insight who may have been misled by these misrepresentations.

I am not a business man. My task has always been that of a minister and student. To keep my mind whole and free for my essential work I have studiedly evaded business responsibility wherever I could.

As editor, howtver, I have been compelled, against my taste, to familiarize myself with the larger business problems of the newspaper, as well as with its editorial problems. Our financial limitations necessitated this practical attitude. I do not think I am able to look all around a business proposition as an experienced business man can do, but I feel as confident as I dare feel about any question of business that our plan for transforming the New Christian Century Company into the Disciples Publication Society is both sound and equitable.

I shall write frankly, even naively, remembering my lack of business experience and desirous of satisfying the unexpressed inquiries of many others less judicious than yourself.

You have been quite correctly informed. The New Christian Century Company has not been paying a profit. This fact has always been frankly published. We believe the reason for our not making a profit is simply that we had no capital with which to promote the circulation of The Christian Century and the Bethany Graded Lessons. And we are confirmed in our hopes for future success by the fact that our deficits during the part five years have been kept so low.

But you have overlooked the vital fact in the present transaction, so far as the stockholders of the Century company are concerned. They have not set a "cash value" upon their holdings. By the terms of the transfer they are not to receive cash at all. They are accepting $16,000 in notes of the new Society. These notes are non-interest bearing and it is understood that they are to be paid out of the profits earned by the Society.

When the Society earns profits it will be prima facie proof that our valuation was reasonable and equitable, because a very modest profit is all that will be necessary to carry the obligations and gradually to retire them.

But if the Society should earn no profits the notes held by the stockholders of the Century company would be absolutely without value, or at most they would simply entitle their owners to share with other creditors in the material assets of an insolvent concern.

Our acceptance of notes rather than cash in payment for our holdings is our pledge of good faith in asking others to purchase bonds. We believe in the future of the enterprise, if it is given a reasonable capital, and we stake our private interests on the working out of our plans.

If the transaction involved the paying of any cash to the Century stockholders out of the funds received from the sale of bonds, there might be ground for the "embarrassing questions" to which you refer. But no stockholder has even remotely conceived such a plan and certainly I, as one of them, could not persuade myself to ask you and my other brethren to invest in bonds in order to pay cash to me! On the contrary I am myself intending to invest in the bonds to the extent of my ability.

As it is, the holders of notes stand in precisely the same relation to the Society as do the investors in its bonds. They put in money; we put in property reasonably appraised, and it is arranged for the development of the business to determine whether our appraisal is just or otherwise.

But it is not necessary even to await the development of the business in order to determine the value of the property which the stockholders have sold. The new Society will be able to take up these notes at any time for their actual market value. If the property proves within say six months to have been worth say but $12,000 the operation of ordinary business conditions will enable the Society to buy these notes for 75 cents on the dollar. If it proves to be worth but $1,600 the same laws of business will enable the Society to retire the notes for 10 cents on the dollar.

The point I wish you to see clearly is this: that the price the stockholders are to receive for their property is still to be determined. The face of the notes only determines the maximum that we may receive—and no business man will question the equity of such a maximum if the business makes good. If the business does not make good we will receive for our property whatever it is actually worth, all the way down to zero.

I note what you say about wishing that the men who owned the stock "could have seen their way to make a clean gift of it." That was my wish too. I would have found great satisfaction as would a number of my associates in making such a gift had we been able to do so. In the lack of a philanthropist like Mr. Long to do for us what he did for the St. Louis house it was my idea to enlist many outright gifts which together would constitute a promotion fund. Had we adopted this plan of asking others to "make a clean gift" of their portion we, too, would have made a "clean gift" of ours. But it was finally decided not to ask for gifts but to sell bonds, and we felt that it was both business-like and equitable that we who contribute the property to the Society should stand in the same relation to it as those who might buy its bonds. By the present transaction no one is asked to make a donation. The only difference between the holders of notes and the holders of bonds is that the notes do not draw interest while the bonds do. (An exception was made of one note for $2,000 whose owner made it a condition of his surrendering his stock that his note should draw 5 per cent interest).

I ask you to examine the transaction in the light of the three possible assumptions as to the value of the assets of the New Christian Century Company.

Assume first that there are no actual assets at all—no stock on hand, no subscription list, no valuable contracts, no "good will." In this case those of us who are taking notes for $16,000 are thereby virtually being paid for our wit and our labor in devising and building up from the ground a business proposition, in partnership with other persons who furnish the capital. Is not this a sound business arrangement? Others invest their capital because they believe the "proposition" will make good. If it does not make good we, its promoters (I blush to so classify myself, but I mean to talk straight through in business terms), receive nothing. If it does make good according to our forecast, and by our labors, and a business is created that pays 6 per cent dividends on say $50,000 valuation, who will say that for such a business gradually to pay its bond holders $25,000 and its promoters $16,000 is inequitable?

Assume secondly, that there are assets, fully equal to the valuation put upon them. The stockholders of the Century company consider that the assets they are transferring to the new society are worth the full amount at which they have been appraised, and they expect the future business of the Society to confirm their present estimate. If the assets have such value of course there is no question as to the equity of the present transaction.

But assume in the third place, that there is a difference of opinion as to the value of these assets. Assume that they derive a portion of their value from the particular personnel of their ownership, that they would not sell for so much in the open market as they are worth to the New Christian Century Company, or to the Disciples Publication Society. What better way can you suggest for arriving at a true valuation than the way we have chosen, viz., to let the progress of the business itself determine how much the new Society shall pay for them?

I can think of one other way, and that is for the new Society when its membership is duly constituted and the stock holders of the Century company are all "reduced to the ranks" where my voice or Dr. Willett's voice (if we still shall have a voice) counts for no more than the voice of some member who has made no investment at all—for the Society itself, though its trustees, to review our appraisal and if, in its judgment, our appraisal is too high, to reduce it to an equitable basis.

Speaking for myself I would be perfectly willing to accept the judgment arrived at by such a review, and I believe I speak for the others. But my guess would be that the Society would plainly enough see that the valuation arrived at by the progress of the business would be more nearly equitable than any appraisal made by the trustees.

I have written very fully, much more fully, no doubt, than you intended to ask me to do. I am very sensitive that the business side of our transaction shall be as transparent as its editorial purposes. I could wish earnestly that it were not necessary for me to have any responsibility for the business transaction, that I could remain in the quiet of my study and do my own particular work, leaving to others these tasks to which their faculties are better fitted than are mine. I have seen the way of the minister who turns business man, and I wish to avoid that way.

But fate, or providence, has thrust this task upon me. I have to build my own pulpit before I can speak from it. I have accepted the task with inexpressible reluctance, spurred by the sense that it could be nothing but indolence or false pride or cowardice that, in the face of the present editorial opportunity, should restrain me from organizing the proper means to achieve so important an end.

And I wish you and my brethren to examine carefully our previous announcements and read carefuly this response to your letter and tell me frankly whether our transaction is not both sound and equitable.

For we are determined that the business transaction shall be just as thoroughly Christian as are the moral principles taught in the pages of The Christian Century.

Very sincerely yours,
CHARLES CLAYTON MORRISON.

—The American Bible Society has just issued a "Romanized" edition of the entire Bible in the Hinghwa dialect, used in the Fuhkien Province, China, not Romanized doctrinally or ecclesiastically, but by the use of our Roman—that is, English alphabet, instead of the difficult Chinese character. The book has an explanatory "Foreword" in English. The translation was made by four Chinese scholars under the direction of the Rev. William N. Brewster, and is put on sale by the society at about one-fifth of the cost of publishing. A striking proof that the Bible finds an open door in the new China comes from Hunan Province, where one of the society's superintendents is making a careful canvass of the business houses in Changsha, the capital city of the province. He finds that not more than one in thirty of the business houses declines to purchase copies of the Scriptures.

Beginning a Non-denominational Ministry

Dr. Peter Ainslie, of Baltimore, has a genius for optimism in regard to the growing cause of Christian unity. He has formed a habit of mind which looks at little happenings as symptoms of a deeper movement. Every where he finds tokens and harbingers of the coming day when denominationalism shall be overthrown and Christ's people shall be truly one. And he strives to co-operate with this deep flowing current of the spirit by bringing about these "happenings," so that the hidden work of God may be made manifest to those who see it not. He holds an evangelistic meeting in a Baptist church and interprets it as a contribution to Christian unity. When his Seminary house is opened he invites an Episcopal rector to deliver the address and interprets it as a contribution to Christian unity.

He responds to an invitation to deliver a series of addresses before the Divinity School of Yale University, and while there finds a Disciple student who desires him to officiate at his ordination to the Christian ministry. Whereupon Dr. Ainslie requests Dean Charles R. Brown of the Divinity School, a Congregationalist, to share the service with him. Dr. Ainslie reads the Scriptures and after delivering a brief charge to the candidate, asks three questions: "Do you affirm your fidelity to Jesus Chirst as Lord and Saviour?" "Do you affirm your belief in the Scriptures as containing the word of God?" "Do you promise to proclaim the message of Christ as revealed to us in the Scriptures throughout your life as you have opportunity?" When the candidate has responded "I do" to all these questions he kneels, and Dean Brown and Dr. Ainslie lay their hands upon his head while Dean Brown offers prayer. Afterwards, a benediction is pronounced by Rev. Louis Stine, of Boston, a Disciple minister.

"I felt that this was such a definite contribution to Christian union," writes Dr. Ainslie, "that it should be made public that the time had come when men are not to be ordained to the ministry of one distinct communion but to the broader ministry of Jesus Christ."

A Divinely Opened Door

It is little wonder that the hearts of New York City Disciples were constrained to issue an appeal to their brethren of the whole land to come to the help of the struggling church in Russia. These New York people had the last sight of the face of Prof. Martin Schmidt and the last conversation with him before sailing for his St. Petersburg home. Chicago Disciples met and heard him shortly after the Louisville convention. It was manifest that he and his companion, Rev. Alexander Persianoff, had come to this country with sanguine expectations of substantial aid for their cause. It was plain, also, that they were continuing their journey with disappointment. By the time they reached New York on their return journey, their hearts were heavy with the sense that they were to meet their countrymen empty-handed. To the Disciples of New York City Prof. Schmidt addressed a statement, confessing in entire frankness his depression of spirit. Reading this statement the churchmen of New York determined to gather a fund to be sent hard after the returning ambassadors. On another page will be found Prof. Schmidt's plea, together with a letter sent from the Central Board of the Russian Evangelical Christian Church to all the churches throughout Russia. This communication discloses a condition that makes a tremendous appeal to American Disciples. The Foreign Missionary Society and the Christian Woman's Board of Missions find their incomes already over-appropriated and are unable to lend aid at this time. The appeal is made, therefore, directly to the people.

There is no doubt that these Evangelical Christians of Russia are our own spiritual kith and kin. They do not face the problem of Christian unity as we face it in this country of many evangelical sects. They lack, therefore, this point of identification with American Disciples. But in their positive catholic feelings, in the simple and unecclesiastical bond that holds them together, in their fervent evangelistic temper, as well as in their accustomed practice of the Christian rites, they are the Disciples of Christ of Russia.

They deserve to be helped in this present crisis. More than that, the cause that is common between us and them deserves that we cultivate the most intimate and responsive relationship with them, perhaps through the Foreign Missionary Society, whose natural function is by no means limited to so-called heathen countries, but should extend to any foreign land where doors of entrance are open for the effectual preaching of the gospel. And certainly there are few beckonings of providence more evident at the present hour than is this in Russia.

Do Baptists Need a Congress?

To ask such a question is either to convict one's self of invincible ignorance or of incorrigible prejudice. And we raise the question because a Baptist journal, representing a type of bigotry and the aristocrats of ignorance in its denomination, rejoices over what it considers the second-class funeral of the recent Baptist Congress, and adds that "it is difficult to get speakers who will risk their reputation for orthodoxy by appearing on the same platform with a number of denominational dervishes." And be it said to our humiliation that a Disciple newspaper quotes this sentiment with evident appreciation.

In one particular our Baptist contemporary is correct. If men have a reputation for orthodoxy to maintain they would do well to keep away from a congress where live questions are discussed by men of ability—and the records of these congresses will show that this has been done year after year—and where bearings are taken of the progress of the kingdom in human affairs. If orthodoxy means a condition of mind which is proof against light and learning, against truth or change, against fresh revelation or mental innovation, then by all means repudiate the congress, shun it as a chamber of theological horrors, whether it be conducted by Episcopalians, Disciples or Baptists. If these orthodox Baptists have nothing to learn, if the boundaries of truth have been prescribed beyond which one may not pass, if they are not interested in the discussion of questions with which the greatest minds in every communion are concerned, if they really believe that their fathers bequeathed to them the final word on all matters which engage the attention of our age, then they are in duty bound to shun the appearance of a Congress, and every paper, magazine, book, college, and sermon, save those which continue to repeat what has already become a matter of undisputed knowledge.

It would even further this theory of intellectual snobbery if all who dread a Congress would hie themselves to some rural retreat, far from the rumblings of present-day activity, where no strange voice could ever be heard, where no ray of light could pierce the awful gloom in which they have immersed themselves, and where the perfections of orthodox faith and knowledge could never be disturbed by the learning of the scholar, or the discussions of a congress. This Baptist aristocracy of ignorance should write high on its banners, "O for a lodge in some vast wilderness."

The fact that a Congress is never largely attended is no argument against its value. Our prayer-meetings are not largely attended, neither are the Sunday evening services in many places. Of the hundreds who matriculate in our colleges, a comparatively small proportion remain long enough to receive a diploma. If there is ground for rejoicing over the coming demise of an institution because those who give it their presence are few, there is little inspiration for us in the organization of the church at Pentecost with its one hundred and twenty. The sectarian scribes of that time must have grown merry as they predicted the speedy ending of that enterprise.

If numbers be a criterion of success then many of our conventions must be confessed failures, since at no time have we had a million present, though we claim to number a million and a quarter. How many must be in evidence in order to insure success in any enterprise? If the promise of Jesus to the two and three who gather in his name be worth anything, it is worth just as much to any number of brethren who band themeslves together to study the progress of his Kingdom in the world, to identify themselves with every human interest, to help solve the perplexities of their age, and to keep their minds open to receive whatever truth God has to break to them from his word.

But whether a Congress be attended by one hundred or one million, its spirit and purpose are in accord with the Apostolic dictum, "Prove all things; hold fast which is good." Crowds have little to do with men whose faith is securely fixed on realities. It is only the faith that fears the facts which attempts to suppress investigation, and to fly the flag of distress. E. B. B.

—Judging by the reports all our evangelists are "sane and scriptural."

DR. WILLETT'S MISSION TOUR

Professor Herbert L. Willett is now making an investigative tour of the mission fields of the Orient accompanied by a university class whose members are devoting themselves, under his leadership, to an earnest and systematic study of social and religious conditions in the Far East and to the activities and results of Christian missionary effort. In this series of articles in The Christian Century Dr. Willett will write more or less informally about his personal experiences and observations, and, in addition, will report the results of his study and of those with him, giving our readers thus a delightful travel story and an instructive and authoritative report of actual missionary conditions and needs. No man in the American Church is better qualified than Dr. Willett to find the facts and to judge them discriminatingly

The Land of the Rising Sun

The world is accustomed to think and speak of "Little Japan," and to picture the land as insignificant in size. This is hardly true. At least if the total length of its territory is considered, the two thousand miles of island empire would parallel the entire Atlantic coast from the British Provinces to Cuba. In fact Japan is so long that it includes climates of every sort, from the almost arctic cold of Saghalien to the tropical warmth of Formosa.

Yet it is true that Japan is small. The total area is only 162,000 square miles. And while this is greater than the land extent of the British Islands, with the addition of Belgium and Holland, it is not as large as the state of California, while by the side of huge empires like Russia and India, or mighty republics like China and the United States, it is an infant.

Picturesque Scenery.

But what Japan lacks in extent of territory it more than compensates in its attractiveness and variety of scenery. The volcanic origin of the islands produces a ruggedness and picturesque unevenness which saves the country from a moment's monotony and seems at first sight to render impossible the common tasks of agriculture, on which such a people must so largely depend.

Yet in reality there are considerable stretches of level land, and the ability of the Japanese, together with all the peoples of the Orient, to make use of the smallest spaces of level ground, affords sufficient room for the highly skillful uses of the soil, which are seen to such admirable advantage in the little rice, wheat, barley and millet fields, many of which an American farmer would count too small for even a garden.

Of course the charm of Japan is in its mountains, none of which are very high, as the mountain climber would measure altitude, but all of which, from the most modest hill to the snow-topped Fuji, are a joy to the student of landscape, and a source of satisfaction to the most prosaic traveler. From those mountains come the torrents that run to the sea on every side, many of them finding their sources in cascades and cataracts that repay a long journey's effort.

Luxury of Japanese Bathing.

But most interesting of all to the Japanese, these mountains are the places in which they are sure to find the hot springs which they love. The volcanic origin of the land makes itself evident in these bubbling or spouting wells of water, so hot that only a Japanese could endure the temperature. But to him it is the acme of luxury. He will travel almost any distance for the joy of such a bath. Sometimes the pools are quite natural, in the side of some rock, and sometimes a hot spring has been roofed over by an enterprising inn-keeper, who secures a patronage which never fails.

It is not to be doubted that the custom of the Japanese in regard to bathing had its beginnings in the multitude of these hot springs. But the practice has now become universal. Every person, man, woman and child, takes a hot bath every night. The temperature of the water is far higher than a westerner can endure without long practice. Yet strange to say there seems to be no reaction in the form of colds, even though the bather may put on light garments, and spend some hours of home work in the chill of the usual unheated house, before retiring.

And in the matter of proprieties in bathing, there seems to be little concern. The ordinary Japanese takes his bath where he finds the hot water. He is not troubled by the presence of other people, men or women. In the hot pools among the mountains the bathers wear no garments, and are undisturbed by spectators. In the towns the bath is taken within doors in deference to a growing feeling, perhaps the result of sensitiveness to western ideas, that it is not quite the proper thing to take it on the street in front of the home. But so far as personal desire for privacy is concerned, that is an acquirement, and apparently is regarded by many of the people as a more or less troublesome convention. As a result the exposure of considerable portions of the human body to view is common and immaterial. It excites no notice, and probably results in little of the harm that would develop in a more reserved society like our own. There is a saying in Japan that the people see nakedness, but they do not look at it.

Advantages of Japan's Coast Line.

Another of the natural features of Japan is its almost limitless extent of coast. It is an island empire, and though the largest of these islands, Hondo, is the part of Japan of which the world usually thinks, yet the actual number of the islands making up the Japanese possessions has probably never been counted. In reality the number changes with the tides and volcanic disturbances. But this fact of island character to the land insures it an enormous extent of coast line. Once the sea was a barrier; now it is a highway. And the commerce of Japan, insular and external, has grown with amazing rapidity in the past generation. Today the Japanese are pushing out on every side to control as much of the world's traffic as they can, and not without success.

The coast line brings them another industry, that of fishing. A very large percentage of the population finds its livelihood in the fishing business, and correspondingly, fish forms a larger element in the diet of the Japanese than of any other people. This does not mean that they are all fish eaters. Many of them are far too poor to afford even the least expensive fish. But meat they can get only in the most limited quantities, by importation from Manchuria or Korea, and outside of the strictly cereal and vegetable diet, which is the rule, fish is eaten whenever possible. And nowhere can it be found in greater variety or of more delightful flavor. One of the joys of a visit in Japan, of which there are many, is the item of fish on the menu.

Of roads, in the proper sense, Japan seems to have few. In fact they are not needed, for most of the people walk, and the few beasts of burden follow the paths along which the people make their way. In the vicinity of towns of importance there are good roads for the jinrikishas, the outgrowth of the advent of that interesting two-wheeled vehicle, the invention of a missionary a few years ago. In the country one sees bullocks used both as carriers and for ploughing, though both tasks are more frequently performed by men and women.

Decent Development of Travel Methods.

Until a short time back the ordinary vehicle was the 'rikisha, though as everywhere else, most of the people walked, and still walk. But the pulling of the light and convenient horseless carriage gave work to a vast army of men, and the fare is within the reach of all but the poorest. But when the wars came on, with China and especially with Russia, a large part of this host of 'rikisha men went to the front. About the same time, and partly to meet the need, the street-car made its advent, and now all the larger towns have electric trams.

And the Japanese make full use of every means of travel. They walk when they must, but they ride when they can. The tram cars are usually crowded. And in recent years the development of the railroads, under state control, has been rapid and effective. The main lines of Japanese railroad will match in construction and efficiency any to be found in Europe or America. The train de luxe which runs from Tokio to Shimonoseki has an almost perfect equipment of sleeping, parlor, dining and observation coaches. And the trains on the other lines throughout the empire are well equipped and comfortable.

And what is more to the point, they run on rapid schedules and are rarely ever late. The inconvenience and vexation, not to say unnecessary loss of time and money, which are a constant vexation to the traveler in America are almost unknown in Japan, as in several other countries. Whether state control is the secret of this more satisfactory condition, perhaps the experts can say. In Japan, at least, the people have an excellent, punctual and inexpensive railway system, and they make full use of it. The third-class compartments are nearly always full, while the second and first do good business.

A Land of Trees and Flowers.

Japan is a land of trees and flowers. The bamboo is the unfailing source from which a hundred crafts are created. A bamboo grove is a delight to look at. It is graceful, rapid of growth, and useful for a wonderful variety of purposes. Houses are constructed of it. The light articles, such as umbrellas, chairs or tables, in so far as they are used, pipes for water, rods for fences, and fiber for the weaving of any quantity of interesting and beautiful things are all of bamboo.

Of other trees, from the giant cryptomerias planted along the roads to shrines, to the cherry, both the blooming and therefore fruitless variety, and the less attractive but more useful cherry bearer, there are numberless sorts. And the flowers are a constant delight all through the year, from the burst of cherry bloom in such public parks as Uyeno in Tokyo, to the chrysanthemum exhibitions, with their marvelous constructions all from a single root, and the wonder of autumn maple leaves.

In recent years the government has undertaken an admirable scheme of forestation. Many of the hillsides and mountain slopes are unsuitable for agriculture, though astonishing efforts are made by the clever farmers to win bits of hill and mountain soil for their crops of rice and cabbage. On these bare slopes the government experts are setting great areas of bamboo and other trees, which in a few years will be a valuable asset to the nation. And in many places what appears to be a perfectly wild growth of forest is discovered on closer inspection to be the result of careful setting, the trees standing in long and regular rows. Only by such means could a country so limited in soil support so many and varied industries dependent upon wood material.

What Has Become of the Infidel?

The Quiet Passing of an Erstwhile Conspicuous Figure

By John Richard Brown

It is becoming notorious that to find and identify an infidel today is no easy matter. He was once easily recognized, and his social and religious outlines were unmistakable. Because there was no difficulty in pointing him out, he was called names without offense, and there was no lurking fear that the wearer of the names would invoke the laws against libel. He could be prayed for with precision, and his special shortcomings of faith and life were public property; they were sometimes a real institution of the country side. But an old race seems to have died out—and to lie in the grave with the ichthyosaurus and other horrible creations of the fossil past. The modern infidel does not make the flesh-and-blood appeal of his deceased race; he is fugitive, evasive, and even unfaithful to the implications of what he believes. He prefers a lair—and the fine leaves of a new and subtle vocabulary cover it.

Churches Miss Him Sorely.

The old infidel—like the Old Pretender of history—is coming into a new appreciation, because he is dead. But the churches are sorely missing him. He was a great inspirer of ministerial copy; he was responsible for many forms of ecclesiastical belligerence. The infidel Goliath was a man of some intellectual dexterity, who could interest light-minded persons and lewd fellows of the baser sort, by a recital of the "Mistakes of Moses," the "Banalities of the Bible" and the "Imperfect Morality of the Saints." It was a profitable excursion into the realm of holy things—ears were tickled at 50 cents a head; it was a mildly-exciting adventure into the peace of believers—the lectures were generally the theme of numerous pulpit answers for three months afterwards; it was a totally irrelevant way of dealing with the problems of the times—for the arch infidel was never taken seriously by lovers of men. The new fighting goes on behind ramparts with the use of disappearing guns. The old infidel boldly—and profitably—dragged his gun across the field in front of the believers to draw their fire—he always succeeded in doing it. But this antagonist has no true successors. He has become a memory. Lectures on selected topics of infidelity do not draw respectable audiences even when the hand-bills are featured with the promise in large type "No Collections." Infidelity as a paying investment is not listed on the stock exchange of men's best hopes.

The Aggressive and Blatant Type.

Another infidel of the past is being sorely missed. He is the aggressive and often blatant neighbor who used to boast of his lack of faith—which he always identified with believing what is not so—and which he emphasized by a series of inane profanities. To the pious he was always a baffling problem. He was an object of solicitude whenever a special meeting broke out in the neighborhood; often he would be prayed for publicly, with the inevitable growth of his already swollen self-conceit when he heard of it. His forum was the country store, or if he did not invite enough replies in that place of high deliberation, he was always sure of an audience at the hotel. But he has ceased to be, or else has been reduced to "innocuous desuetude" because he became a nuisance. He interfered with business. He had a case, but no cause; and the business of life became too strenuous for the average man to turn aside and listen when the first sentences that fell on his ears were empty of all significance. This infidel showed that his end was near when the only audience he could command were the small boys or the youths of the neighborhood who were in their first active and amusing protest against the universe. But the boys and men grew up; they are now mostly useful citizens of church and state.

The Infidel of the Pastor's Imagination.

The infidel of the past with whom most of us were best acquainted was one who was dragged into the pulpit at periodic times by that worthy defender of the faith called "Our Minister." This infidel was another Frankenstein; he was made up of all the mental absurdities of which our minister had ever heard. He was a totally unreasonable person; according to our minister he never had any logic, and even the things he did believe he did not know how to state. As our minister always wanted to be entirely fair he stated them for him; the infidel—through the mouth of our minister—was always humbly grateful for this assistance. Then our minister was ready for the next scene in the drama of faith. He would take the utterly foolish remarks of the infidel, and valiantly, triumphantly and at great length refute them. A smile of satisfaction would come over the faces of the elders in the congregation at this particular point; and the young people would thrill at the sight of this miniature Armageddon. The faith once for all given to the saints had been contended for. But after a long time some one who wanted to know the truth began to suspect that practically all of this was a sham battle, and that there were times when our minister really made a fool of himself. The infidel he had demolised was the product of his own dreams.

The infidel of ecclesiastical bad manners lingers among us, but he is not very vigorous at present, and there are many who think that his course is about run. The making of such an infidel is such an easy matter that when we have forgotten to speak the truth in love we are in danger of creating or discovering a number of them. But this is largely a pastime, engaged in by men who like epithets instead of arguments. Epithets are more picturesque; besides, more people will quote them—and at the same time we may have the lurking suspicion that our case is not a very good one. As we grow older and learn the tendencies of history more accurately we find that epithets never settled anything, and that many things which we believed were unfriendly to the faith, if not positively hostile, are really fair and friendly to that which is best in us and in our faith, if we will only live with them for a while in the Interpreter's House.

Huxley and Spurgeon Both Infidels.

These infidels of our boyhood have largely disappeared. The reasons furnish us once more some primal facts of human nature. For one thing the word was so abused that it came to mean nothing. In the vocabulary of a certain English preacher both Mr. Huxley and Mr. Spurgeon were infidels. The conjunction of names creates a smile. According to this ecclesiastic, Mr. Huxley was an infidel because he did not believe in revealed religion; Mr. Spurgeon was an infidel because he did not accept the exclusive claims of the Church of England. Doctor Gill called Wesley and the early Methodists infidels because they rejected the Calvinism which was so dear to the heart of Gill himself. Differences of doctrine, or even of systems of doctrine, may make it impossible for men to work together, but the old absurdity of calling names has been forgotten in all responsible Christian quarters. In Hugo's "Les Miserables" the old bishop, most orthodox of believers, went out to the hillside to meet the infidel of the neighborhood and to pray for his soul. He finally knelt at the feet of the so-called infidel, and asked for his blessing. In so doing the old bishop believed even more profoundly the things which he had been taught, but at the same time he found that the infidel had Christian truth which, because of unhappy experiences in life, he had not learned how to express correctly.

Another Ingersoll Impossible.

Modern scholarship has made the repetition of an experience like that of Mr. Ingersoll impossible. So much of what he alleged seems now so foolish that we wonder that even the credulous in another generation could have tolerated him. Modern psychology and the careful study of religious experience in all the ages of the church's history have made us understand some phases of community consciousness which used to be called "infidel outbreaks;" the world, the flesh and the devil work through that law of suggestion from which we never escape.

Much that was once called by the hard and divisive name of infidelity we now recognize as imperfect belief. The Christian church, in the thought of Paul, is a great clinic of the soul into which are brought all who are alive at all in the things of the spirit. "Lord, I believe; help thou my unbelief" is what makes the prayer of the upward look. The church has caught that upward look on the face of the man it would once have banned, and now gives sight to the eyes, truth to the mind, and blessing to the life. The fact that the infidel has disappeared—at any rate, in the vocabulary of the church—shows that the church knows its business better, and widens its field of redemption.

Russia's Call to American Disciples

EDITORS' NOTE: The Russian Church of Disciples in New York City is a member of the "All Russia Evangelical Christian Union," and last year sent a missionary offering of $12.50 for their work. When the permit to hold its annual convention at St. Petersburg was refused by the Government, a circular letter was prepared by the Executive Board of the Union and sent to all its constituent churches. A copy was sent to our Russian church in New York City. Rev. Joseph Keevil, the Disciples' Mission Superintendent in Greater New York, happened to be present when the letter was read and requested Pastor Johnson to translate it. The vivid picture of their church life with its struggles, sacrifices, discouragements and victories, reveals conditions that are truly apostolic. A committee, headed by Dr. Z. T. Sweeney, has been appointed to receive funds which may be sent to Mr. Geo. W. Kramer, Treas., 1 Madison Avenue, New York. In connection with the letter above referred to, which follows, we publish also a statement issued by Prof. Martin Schmidt upon taking his leave for Russia after attending the Louisville convention and touring the country as far west as Chicago. Concerning this appeal we ask our readers' attention to the editorial on page 6.

Rev. I. S. Prokanoff, President of the Bible College at St. Petersburg, editor of two periodicals and, by virtue of his preëminent scholarship and statesmanship, the acknowledged leader of the Evangelical Christians of Russia. Mr. Prokanoff was appointed by the convention to accompany Prof. Schmidt as deputy to the Louisville convention, but circumstances prevented his coming and Mr. Persianoff came in his stead.

From the Board of All Russia Evangelical Christian Union, to the Church of God in New York, Greeting—

Let it be known to you, brethren, that in answer to our appeal for a permit to hold our "Fourth All Russian Convention of Evangelical Christians" in the city of St. Petersburg, we received from the Prime Minister a refusal, but no explanation given or reason for this decision.

Thinking over the whole situation, from every side, the Board of the Union does not find it possible to make any arrangements for holding a temporary convention, and therefore the congregations composing the Union are compelled to be without a convention this year. The Board asks the churches for the power to transact the business that should be done at the convention, and carry out the work for 1913 on the same basis as agreed upon for 1912.

Important Questions.

During the year the important questions which may come up for action will be submitted by the Board to the churches for their approval by letter. Besides this, during the year, effort will be made to hold in various cities local conventions. For the holding of these gatherings there will be sent by the Board an experienced brother with a prepared program for the conducting of the convention. All important resolutions will be reported by the Board to the churches by letter. The important question, which must interest all members, is, the support of the preachers sent out by the Union.

From the inclosed report from the Union's treasurer, you will see that within nine months, from Jan. 1, 1912, to Oct. 1, 1912, the deficit is R. 4,801.14 and to the end of the year will reach R. 6,000—$3,000.

The cause of this deficit is not that we have had more preachers than we ought to have, but because the work of God is great and is growing every day, and the contributions from the congregations have not been as large as we expected.

Fruitful Evangelism.

The work of our preachers was very fruitful. They have visited all places where our brethren are, and many of them entered new places. If we had five hundred preachers, we would still not have enough, but we have only thirty-six. Therefore, in view of the facts before us, we must take action at once to provide for the deficit, otherwise the work cannot go forward.

Having in view this goal, the Board of the Union called some brethren with means to St. Petersburg on November 4 for a conference on this important matter, but not many came. At the conference the following pledges were made: I. S. Prokhanoff, R.

Rev. Alexander Persianoff.

200; F. Savelieff, 500; D. Bocharoff, 100; V. Pelivin, 100; I. Tuma, 100. Total, R. 1,000, or $500.

Deficit Unprovided For.

The deficit left is not less than R. 5,000. It is therefore necessary that the congregations who did not send their contribution to the Union for the missionary work during this year, send them at once. It is necessary to send all that was promised and that was collected in the "Missionary Boxes." Also it is proposed to take a special collection in the churches for the missionary work. It would be a good thing if, during the Christmas holidays, the churches hold special missionary meetings to receive offerings for the missionaries. It will also be excellent to make offerings at the time of your "Love Feast" gathering. Besides, it would be good to secure pledges from brethren and sisters having means, especially for meeting the deficit. (I Cor. 7:29-31.) We must make sacrifice for the work of God. All contributions must be sent before December 20 to our treasurer, Mr. G. Matveef, Tchernaia Rechka No. 39.

We believe that if the brethren will be encouraged and will pray about the work of the Union and put forth a great effort, our deficit will be covered by January 1.

Preachers' Salaries Reduced.

Also having in view the lightening of the burden of the treasurer of the Board, we propose for the next year, to reduce the salaries of the preachers as follows: Bro. Belousoves, from R. 30 to R. 10; Bro. Bodu, from 50 to 40; Bro. Bluherovu, from 25 to 15; Bro Naydanovu, from 25 to 20; Bro. Smorodinu, from 35 to 20; Bro. Jivitzkomi, from 30 to 10; Bro. Pechorskomu, from 35 to 15; Bro. Honushu, nothing at all; Bro. Ponamru, nothing at all.

If, by the first of January, only small contributions are made, then we must make further reductions. We ask forgiveness from those brethren who will be touched by these reductions at this time, but we cannot do otherwise.

To make less expense for the Union, we ask the congregations next year, if possible, to pay the traveling expenses of the preachers who will visit them.

Urges Faith and Courage.

The fact we did not receive the permit for our official convention must not trouble any one. This disappointment did not come without the will of God. It must teach us to work not only when we have praise from the public, but also when we have difficulties which proceed from the government. We must show to Jesus our faithfulness unto death. "This is the victory that hath overcome the world, even our faith" (I John 5:4).

We must also give you our sorrowful message: In the city of Moscow, a well-known brother, Ivan Verbitzky, has gone over to those who practice infant baptism. The church in Moscow discovered that a short time ago the said brother baptized his infant daughter, and they decided that the brother could not be a lawful preacher and a builder of the church, but could attend the church services as a guest.

A Disaffection.

Bro. Verbitzky, together with Bro. Svenson, decided to open a new congregation which they call "Congregation of Evangelical Christians Recognizing Infant Baptism." In view of the above fact, Bro. Verbitzky has separated himself from our Union, but the work of God does not suffer in Moscow. Among the brethren and sisters at this time there is a splendid spirit and zeal to push forward the work of God. They have opened meeting in several new places. They have called a well-known and well-beloved brother, with large experience, V. I. Dolgopoloff, who is working with great blessing among them.

In other places the work of God is growing. In Warsaw one of the Mariavite priests was converted and is now preaching, in lowliness, the truth of the gospel.

May the Lord give to his servants the zeal to do his work. Your brethren,

I. S. PROKHANOFF, Chmn., E. ERMAKOFF,

PROFESSOR SCHMIDT'S LETTER.

"To Representatives of the Churches of Christ of Greater New York. Brethren: Tomorrow, the 14th day of December, I am to sail back to Russia, where I expect to take up my work anew. My heart is not as happy as it was at the time of my arrival on American soil. In fact, I am quite distressed and discouraged. We, Brother Persianoff and myself, rejoiced when we came here, as we believed, and still believe, we had discovered a great and strong brother in the Disciples of Christ. Wherever we went we told the story of that terrible persecution our brethren in Russia went through. We told you of our suffering in the past and of our poverty as the result of the present time. This story we repeated before the convention at Louisville, and in the churches and universities throughout the country. We have assured you that the Christians of Russia are identical with the Christians of America, having the one Lord, having the same faith and ordinances.

A "Little Brother's" Plea.

"And now, dear brethren, I speak to you as the official delegate of your little brother in Russia. Have I come to tell you of our struggles in vain? Must I return to Russia without a word of hope and cheer to the waiting ones? Our people entertain the highest opinion of you American Christians; their joy would be very great if I could tell about your love for your young brother across the sea, and of your willingness to help us through the present crisis for the maintenance of our Bible College and the work of our thirty-six evangelists, as well as the erection of a house of prayer in our capital.

"My heart is full of the great things I have seen among you. I know you are a willing people to advance Christ's kingdom, and if you could demonstrate your love in a practical way, it will be much easier for me to return and tell my people of your greatness. This you could do in helping us to meet our present need.

Russia a Fertile Field.

"In entering Russia you will find a fertile field for the growth of primitive Christianity.

"The purpose in coming to America is not only to tell you our story and bring you our greetings, but also to ask your societies and churches to come over and help us, in our distress.

"There is now freedom of religion in Russia. The doors are widely open. No foreign missionary society of any Protestant church has thus far done anything for the Slavic people in Russia. American Christians can find no better opportunity and no more opportune time to enter a great missionary field.

Deeply Religious.

"The Russian people like the name Christian; they are immersionists and a deeply religious people at heart. You must do this work now, while the opportunity presents itself, while religious freedom flourishes, or the agencies of superstition and unbelief will do their work for you. The Biblical name of the Disciples of Christ, their New Testament creed and ordinances, with their strongly developed missionary zeal and faith in the Almighty, are the best adapted people to conquer for Christ just now. We have been telling these things in your churches for almost three months. Your newspapers have widely discussed these matters, but your Foreign Missionary Society and your Woman's Board of Missions were not able to make us any promises, and we have been sadly disappointed in our hopes at the end of our journey in the city of New York.

Colleges Must Not Be Closed.

"We believe it would be a great mistake to allow the College in St. Petersburg to be closed on account of lack of funds, as this would mean the forfeiting of the privileges granted by the government, which concessions perhaps never would be gotten again. We are besought by the president of our convention to pray to you to come to our help in maintaining the thirty-six evangelists in the field for at least a few months. In order to be able to do this we are compelled to have the minimum of $7,000 by the close of January, 1913. If we cannot get any money by that time, our college must be closed. (Our trouble in laboring hard for two years, connected with many difficulties to procure the government's permission, which meant cost to us, would be in vain.)

One Hundred Million Peasants.

"Remember one hundred million of peasants who live in darkness and ignorance, not knowing Christ or his gospel. Remember our evangelists who travel thousands of miles to bring the sweet gospel to these people; if we can keep them in the field, we can gain the victory.

"Let us not return home in tears and a heart full of sorrow and distress. Make it possible for me to tell our people in Russia about your magnanimity and love for a weaker brother. MARTIN SCHMIDT.

MODERN WOMANHOOD

Conducted by Mrs. Ida Withers Harrison.

Mrs. Harrison will be glad to receive communications from any of her readers offering suggestions concerning woman's welfare, criticisms of articles or inquiries concerning any matters relevant to her department. She should be addressed directly at 530 Elm Tree Lane, Lexington, Ky.

THE WOMAN WHO WORKS

II.

The article of last week treated of the changed conditions which the laboring woman of today has to face; these affect the home, as well as the home-maker.

Homes were once isolated and independent places, where almost everything necessary for family use was raised, and the women were the industrial army who turned the raw produce into the finished article necessary for home consumption. Now, the home is inter-related, and inter-dependent on public and political life. All our modern essentials of comfort and sanitation lead us straight to the city hall—there we find the modern equivalent to the hewers of wood and drawers of water of olden days.

The electricity with which we light our homes, the gas with which we heat them and do our cooking, the telephones that carry our daily orders, our water supply, our sewage disposal, all work under franchises within the gift of our city fathers. The taxes we pay, the construction and repair of our streets, the removal of nuisances, take us into the very heart of public life.

The home is more vulnerable today than ever before. The purity of our milk supply, on which the very life of our babes depends, is controlled by city ordinances. Like the prophet, we might cry every day, "There is death in the pot," unless the meat we buy and the bread we eat were protected by pure food laws.

Disease may lurk in the ready made garments that we buy—not only the cheaper grades, but the more expensive ones. Mrs. Florence Kelley, secretary of the Consumer's League, while pleading for better conditions for working women, tells of seeing a superb evening wrap being finished in a room, where a child lay in the most contagious stage of scarlet fever.

So the very pre-eminence of home and family duties to the mother and housekeeper forces her outside its boundaries for their protection. If the home be woman's kingdom, she must ever be on the alert to guard its interests and right its wrongs—and this leads her into the very storm centers of public and political life.

Changes Affect the Outside World.

Not only are the home and the home-maker affected by these modern labor conditions, but the great world in which both are placed is profoundly changed by them. Labor saving machines have revolutionized the law of supply and demand in the industrial world. The emphasis is no longer on the laborer with the bone and sinew of an Atlas—skill and dexterity rather than strength is the demand of the day; this has assured the entrance of the woman, even of the child, into the labor market. That was an ominous remark of one of the inventors of an early machine loom, when he said, "The whole machine may be started and kept in motion by a child, simply moving a rod backward and forward"—and child labor, the shameful anachronism of a Christian civilization, sprang into being.

From a few thousands of women, engaged in a handful of wage-earning occupations in the early part of the past century, we now have about seven millions of them working in all the three hundred trades, save four or five. The oppression of some of these poor toilers equals that of the child in the cotton mills—both are the victims of capital seeking for cheap labor in this day of fierce competition—and the cheapest thing in the labor world is the weakest and most unprotected—the woman and the child.

These women who work cry to us, in tones that must be heard, for better conditions surrounding them, for shorter hours, and for a minimum wage on which they can live decently. In my own state of Kentucky, experts tell us that the very least upon which a woman can live with self-respect, paying for her own board and buying her own clothing, is six dollars and a half a week—but that one fourth of the working women in our state receive but four dollars a week, or even less. And conditions are far worse in other states—for we are an agricultural rather than a manufacturing community.

A Still Darker Peril.

But an even darker danger threatens the laboring women, especially the young girls, than the sweat shop or the starvation wage. One of the perplexing things about progress is that with every upward and onward step in life we have new problems to solve and new dangers to face. In our new industrialism we have not only the anachronism I have mentioned, but others even more threatening to our moral and social life.

Those of us who have reached our fifth or sixth decade have never been exposed to such temptations as threaten the young working girl of today. Her new life in office, store, mill, or factory, with the new independence and liberty she enjoys as a bread winner, often throws her into contact with men and women of the baser sort, and hideous and irreparable wrongs are often perpetrated on them. Miss Jane Addams in her book, "A New Conscience and An Ancient Evil," tells how the ranks of the infamous white slave traffic are recruited from the working girls, and says, "Lack of employment and recreation, insufficient wages, overstrain, often help to lead poor girls into an illicit life."

This new conscience has brought a new publicity with it, for it would seem that the commercialization of vice has reached proportions today that it never had before, and the very stones would cry out, if we held our peace. Reginald Wright Kaufman, in a recent utterance, estimates that there are at least six hundred thousand prostitutes in our country today!

When we think that those who are enticed into this life are young girls, many of them hardly past childhood, does it not seem a shame that our government does not throw protective legislation about them? Our statutes forbid a girl under age from making a legal transfer of property, but no law prevents her from selling what is more than houses, or lands to her, while he who robs her goes free—leaving her to sink into hopeless depths from which there is no escape.

A Complex Situation.

How changed and complex then is the situation for the working woman of today! Homes, once independent and sufficient for their own needs, now linked with public life and government in scores of vital and fundamental ways! A great army of laboring women and children, all their work without the home, marching away into a world often full of snares and hardships for them; thousands of little children, robbed of their birthright to unobstructed, unhindered growth, to this wonder world of play, to an education that should fit them for useful and patriotic citizenship; millions of women, going to their daily toil, often under menacing conditions, without the help the ballot and organized labor gives them to secure better laws for their own protection!

A New Unrest.

Against these is another multitude of wives, mothers, home-makers, robbed by modern conditions of their right to needed and productive labor, the only labor worthy of the mothers of the race and daughters of the King, seeking blindly to adjust themselves to an environment they but little understand. The lady of King Lemuel's oracle received the praises of husband and children and friends, but the climax of her paean of praise was that "her works praised her"—and that is what every Christian woman must crave. Like their Master, they must be able to say, "My Father worketh even until now, and I work." They must feel that life would be vain, unless it could be said of them at the end, "Their works do follow them."

This is but a poor statement of some of the conditions that face the women of today. Like the problem plays, it leaves every one to draw her own moral, and make her own conclusions. The new leisure that has come to many women can find one outlet in the numerous women's organizations. When we look back to the source of these societies, we find, almost without exception, that their primary impulse was social service. So whether we work through women's clubs, or patriotic societies, or temperance organizations, or civic leagues, or woman suffrage associations, or, most of all, through missionary boards, we are helping to solve some of these pressing problems of today, and finding an answer to the craving of our own hearts for noble and satisfying work.

Misss Rase T. Arbruster, Akita, Japan, says, "Miss Gretchen Garst has been here over a month and we are so happy to have her. She fits right in, takes hold of the language and is so congenial every way. The society surely made no mistake when they sent her. The Akita Christians who knew her parents are delighted to see her and she will wield a fine influence I am sure. Early this month my Bible woman and I made an evangelistic trip through Shoni District being gone nine days. Everywhere the people listened to the message. At Sakata, where we had trouble to get any women out to our meetings, over thirty high class women and as many men attended both nights we were there. We rejoice over the brighter outlook of the work in Akita City. It was a bit discouraging for some months, but a new spirit is filling the Christians and they are more earnest than I have ever seen them before."

Have you written or wired your congressman yet to vote right on the Kenyon bill when it comes up Feb. 10?

First Church, Los Angeles, Calif., made offerings to missions amounting to $4,100 last year. Russell F. Thrapp, the pastor, has recently been ill, but is recovered and at his work again.

A circular sent out by a Chicago distillers and wholesale liquor house says that "the passage of the Kenyon bill will be the biggest victory ever won by the Anti-Saloon League." There's your cue, Mr. Christian citizen!

In Peoria, Ill., they speak of the pastor of Central Church as "the preacher who is coming to the oratorical front on the run." Since the burning of their church house this congregation has decided to worship in a Masonic Hall until their new edifice is built.

Jacksonville Ill., church received 69 accessions during 1912 and lost by removal and death, 68. The church offerings amounted to a grand total of $10,286 of which $3,000 was for missions and benevolence. The pastor, Clyde Darsie, preached 120 sermons.

Including the receipts on the local fields of the twelve mission churches, the sum of $23,564 was spent on city missions in Greater Kansas City last year. The report submitted by the city missionary, Frank L. Bowen, is a business like statement of the year's work.

The annual report of the church at Monroe City, Mo., shows that all departments raised $4,539. This included the building of a new parsonage and the missionary offerings. During the year there were 39 additions to the church. W. Garnet Ahorn has been called for another year to serve as minister.

"Teams" of workers are engaged in securing pledges for the completion of the church building of Third Church, Indianapolis. They have already secured $11,000. Mr. Grafton, the pastor, baptized three pairs of brothers in one evening during the evangelistic meeting just closed.

W. M. Baker, pastor at Poplar Bluff, Mo., reports 118 accessions to the church membership during 1912 and offerings of over $5,000 for all purposes. The church has a total enrolled membership of 600, has received 358 accessions during Mr. Baker's four years' pastorate and has developed a splendidly organized graded Sunday-school.

After two years and ten months of acquaintance, Lawton, Okla., church extended a call to A. R. Spicer to remain with them indefinitely. This congregation sustains a missionary "station" in Africa named "Lawton." The church raised over $4,000 last year in all departments and has received 360 new members since Mr. Spicer's ministry began.

Tipton, Ind., church, G. I. Hoover, pastor, reports 52 accessions to its membership during the past year and $6,578 raised in all departments, of which amount $348 was for missions. Besides this amount the debt on the property was reduced by the amount of $2,775. Present enrollment of congregation is 750. The church building and parsonage are valued at $35,000.

A unique plan providing for a church debt was adopted by First Church, Oklahoma

City, when fifty men took out life insurance policies, fifteen payment, amounting to $30,000. The total debt was $60,000 on a house costing $140,000. In fifteen years it is believed the entire obligation will be discharged through supplemental direct gifts in the meantime. J. H. O. Smith is the pastor.

Evangelist C. R. Scoville preached at Metropolitan Church, Chicago, the past two Sundays. With his evangelistic company Dr. Scoville is coöperating with the resident pastor, John D. Hull, in preparing for a revival which is to begin next Sunday.

Mr. A. T. Campbell, formerly a Disciple minister, but for several years superintendent of the municipal recreation center at Pullman, Chicago, has accepted appointment to the position of Director of Recreation in Dayton, O. Mr. Campbell entered deeply into the lives of the people of his community as was evidenced by many tokens of their affection which he received when leaving Pullman.

The Endeavor Society of Lima, O., church gave a special program at the hour of the Sunday evening service, recently, in which representations of the Foreign Society officers—A. McLean, F. M. Rains, S. J. Corey—and many well-known missionaries were the main features. New workers about to go to the foreign field were introduced and told their reasons for choosing the task of serving Christ in far away lands.

The resignation of E. M. Todd at Ft. Wayne, Ind., brings to a close a pastorate of extraordinary richness and success. Measured in terms of financial achievements, the offerings have averaged $1,100 per year more than the average of previous years. The church has grown by accessions of members. And yet more significant is said to be the growth in the spiritual life, the enlargement of the minds of the people as to what it means to be a Christian and a Church of Christ. Mr. Todd has not announced his plans for the future.

Some changes in the plan of the National Benevolent Association with regard to its approach to the churches are being wrought out and will be put into operation as rapidly as feasible. The new plan contemplates the division of the country into a few large districts, over which will be placed thoroughly competent representatives who will do an educational work acceptable to pulpit and pew alike, and profitable to the cause. The plan contemplates also the elimination, finally, of the solicitors.

The nineteenth annual "Powell banquet" was held in First Church, Louisville, Ky., Jan. 16 with 400 men as guests. The Courier Journal gives an entire page to a report of the affair. Dr. Powell was toastmaster. He introduced each speaker to the rhyme of original poetry. Rev. E. Y. Mullins, president of the Southern Baptist Theological Seminary; John E. Garner, of Winchester, Ky.; Alfred Herr Hite, of Louisville; and Judge Samuel M. Wilson, of Lexington, were the speakers, and it is estimated by the Courier Journal that 2,300 laughs punctuated their remarks.

Mr. and Mrs. Charles Traxler, whose residence in England for some years was graciously utilized by them to establish and advance the cause of Christ, especially at Hornsey, London, where Leslie W. Morgan is minister, are returning to the United States to make their home at Akron, O. Mr. Traxler is president of the Christian Association of England and his contributions made up a very substantial portion of the fund which built Hornsey's lately dedicated house of worship. They will be greatly missed among English Disciples.

T. A. Fleming, until recently of Miles Avenue church, Cleveland, Ohio, is conducting evangelistic meetings at Watseka, Ill. Mr. Fleming bears a strong resemblance to the newly elected president, Woodrow Wilson, so marked that he has frequently been mistaken for him. He at one time met a cousin of Governor Wilson, who was so struck by the resemblance that in spite of the fact that they were total strangers, he asked Mr. Fleming for a photograph which he sent to Mr. Wilson. Mr. Wilson also noticed the likeness and wrote Mr. Fleming a letter in reference to it.

The Christian Worker of Des Moines, Finis Idleman and Geo. A. Jewett, editors, notes the announcement of the projection of a "state paper" to circulate among the churches of Iowa, and adds: "To merit the support of the state, however, will mean that Christian charity must dominate its columns. It is too late in the world's history to practice the spirit of medieval heresy burning and too early to begin the Great Assize, particularly with the limited capacity of infallible judgment at hand." The Worker, by the way, claims to be the original "brotherhood paper" and we believe has a good right to the honor.

At the annual meeting of Central Church, Detroit, Mich., it was shown that the amount given for missions by that church was $13.50 per capita. The amount expended for all purposes, as reported by the treasurer, was $21,398.79. One new church has been dedicated during the year at Grand River Avenue and Allendale Avenue and a new mission begun at Harper and Ellery avenues. Plans for institutional features were discussed for Central Church and a committee appointed to consider the needs and possibilities of such work. The pastors of the church are C. J. Tannar and F. P. Arthur.

The united church plans at Tuscola, Ill., which were mentioned in these columns recently by quotation of a daily newspaper report, have fallen through, according to later reports. The papers say that the members of the Christian and Baptist churches could not see what they were to gain by the merger and withdrew, leaving the Presbyterians alone but united! One paper says the movement was "man inspired but woman defeated!" Such failures need discourage no one. They only reveal the easily forgotten fact that in Christian unity we have to reckon with human nature as well as the Holy Spirit. It is probable that the plans at Tuscola were prematurely acted upon.

There was an impressive installation service at the Union Avenue Christian Church in St. Louis on Sunday, the 12th inst., when just before the sermon, the pastor, B. A. Abbott, called the entire board of elders and deacons to the front, about forty in all, and after appropriate remarks on the duties and dignity of these offices led in a prayer of consecration, in which the divine blessing and help were invoked in their behalf. The church elects its entire board of officers annually, generally the same persons, however, and follows their election with a consecration service like the above. In the sermon which followed, the pastor spoke on the departments of service in the church—evangelism, pastoral oversight and training and social service, or the work of the deacons.

In a sermon on the subject "The Lessons of Creation," C. R. Neel of Central church, Salt Lake City, declared that the account of the creation contained in the Scripture is only the beginning of the story; that creation is continuous, and that in all creation, wherever one views it, one is led to think of God, the Creator. Mr. Neel said: "Creation is not something that God did thousands of years ago. Every flower is a new creation, every day is the beginning of a new world. Creation is continuous, God is ever revealing himself and will continue to reveal himself until the end of time. In looking back to the morning of creation, we think of God. In looking up to the heavenly bodies we think of God. In looking forward to the future with all its possibilities, we think of God. God becomes the focal point of all human thought, the answer to the soul's cry. The idea of God at times overwhelms us, humbles us, exalts us, inspires us, saves us."

College Life not Teaching Religion.

"Ninety-six per cent of the colleges under church supervision in this country do not teach religion," was the statement of Prof. Walter Athearn of Drake University, Des Moines, Iowa, before a mass meeting of Christian Church workers at Jackson Avenue Christian Church, Kansas City. Professor Athearn also declares that the average Sunday-school today is not a school but a mob. Thirty church colleges have put religion into their curriculum during the past year, but the remainder of the two thousand religious schools of America give credits only for psychology, sociology and the sciences. "Religious schools must furnish something the state universities do not furnish," Mr. Athearn declared, "or the day of the denominational college will pass with the present generation."

A Sermon on Kindness.

The tender message of the Apostle Paul to the Ephesians was the subject of a discourse delivered by James C. Creel at Princeton, Mo. The pastor's lesson was "Kindness" and his text taken from Ephesians 4:32. "And be ye kind to one another, tenderhearted, forgiving one another, even as God, for Christ's sake, hath forgiven you." Mr. Creel declared that from a practice of kindness came tender heartedness and if we expected God to forgive us for our sins we must forgive those whom we believed to have sinned against us. Forgiveness must be ever ready and frequent. "How often shall I forgive?" had been the query of Peter, "seven times?" "Nay, but seven times seven," had been the answer of Christ. If a brother trespass seven days in the week yet appears sorry and ask forgiveness each day it is our duty to forgive. Only in the practice of kindness and the ability to forgive rest our hopes of attaining the Kingdom of God.

A Life Work Series.

G. W. Wise, pastor of First church, Lincoln, Ill., has inaugurated a novel series of Sunday evening services which is attracting considerable attention. He planned a series of eight consecutive Sunday evening services to be addressed by gentlemen of the city on the various occupations and professions of life, styling the addresses the "Life Work Series." The first of these addresses was delivered by Prof. J. H. McMurray, president of Lincoln College on "The Minister," on Sunday, Jan. 5. The second was delivered Sunday evening, Jan. 12, by Prof. D. F. Nichols, county superintendent of schools, on the subject, "The Teacher." Both of these addresses were interesting and attracted large audiences. The pastor at each service supplements the address with a biblical or religious interpretation of the subject. The remaining topics to be discussed are as follows: "The Business Man," by E. E. Hanger, supplemented by an address by the pastor on "A Wise Investment;" "The Lawyer," by Judge Charles J. Gehlbach, supplemented by the pastor on the topic, "A Foolish Lawyer;" "The Journalist" by Morris Emmerson, supplemented by the pastor on "The Writing of Jesus;" "The Physician," by Dr. W. W. Coleman, supplemented by the pastor on "Luke the Physician;" "The Labor Union Man," by W. J. Williams, supplemented by the pastor on "A Desirable Union." No one has as yet been secured to deliver the last of the series, on "The Housekeeper."

Edgar D. Jones on Genesis.

Edgar Dewitt Jones is delivering a series of five sermons at First Church, Bloomington, Ill., on "The First Five Books of the Bible." On the first evening he talked about the book of Genesis. He gave an analysis of the book as a whole but devoted most of his time to the spiritual teachings of the stories of the creation, the temptation and the fall. Among other things he said:

"The old warfare between Genesis and geology has largely if not altogether passed away. We do not think of the Bible as a scientific book nowadays, but as a religious book. Science sets out to discover the laws of nature, the Bible deals with the power that laid the laws down. Indeed, there is no conflict between a reasonable interpretation of Genesis and science. Science is still learning. Both science and theology change, but religion (righteousness) does not change.

"The once widely accepted chronology of the Old Testament is only a human opinion and is largely discredited by modern scholars. The calculation was worked out by the erudite James Ussher, Protestant archbishop of Armagh, Ireland, in 1650, or 1654. It is ingenious and of some profit, but no man has sufficient data to estimate accurately the time of the creation account given in the first chapter of Genesis. The creator's calendar of his work is written in the rocks and according to them the earth must be many thousand times six thousand years old.

"The very first sentence of Genesis holds in essence the supreme lesson of the entire Bible. 'In the beginning God.' Behind the universe there is a person. The earth is not the outcome of blind chance, but the expression of sovereign will. Someone has said 'If you believe that God was ahead of the beginning, you believe the only mysterious thing of this universe. If you believe this you ought to be able to believe everything else in the world.'

"Genesis teaches that man is the crown of God's creation, that man is God's best work and that God's purpose is that man may become really what he is ideally—the very image of his maker. Man is the object of God's love and the beneficiary of His wisdom. The world, the Bible, the church, the Sabbath, all were made for man and not man for them.

"Our age is progressive, but we have not outgrown the book of Genesis. We never will outgrow this great book. As to the literary character of the opening chapters of Genesis it is unlikely that there will ever be unanimity of opinon. Some will accept them literally, others no less reverent and faithful will regard parts of them as sublime imagery, majestic poetry and divine allegory, all teaching God's truth. Only

New Invention SELF-HEATING IRON

The "Standard" Makes and Contains Its Own Heat

Works while it is heating, heats while it is working. Saves miles of walking.

Saves Its Cost Every Month

Economical, perfectly safe, convenient. The "Standard" is stove, fuel, heat—all in one. Fire is Inside. Carry it about, go where you please. Don't stay in hot kitchen; iron any place, any room, anywhere. Go right along, one thing after another. All kinds of clothes.

IRONED BETTER IN HALF THE TIME

No waiting, no stopping to change irons. Right heat. Easily regulated. No time wasted. Iron on table all the time, one hand on the iron, the other to turn and fold the clothes. The "Standard" is neat, durable and compact; all parts within radius of iron and handle. No tanks nor fittings standing out at sides or ends to hinder or be in the way. No wires or hose attached to both er. Right size, right shape, right weight. Cheapest fuel, one to two cents does ordinary family ironing.

WHAT USERS SAY.

Alex Stalker of N. Y. writes: "The Self Heating Iron received sometime ago and will say right here it is the most useful time and money-saving device that was ever made. My wife has just finished a large ironing in two hours that usually took her half a day with the old stove heating irons, and the house is cool. It is certainly just the only iron made. We want the agency." W. P. Farnum: "After receiving your iron and giving it a thorough trial it will be a perfect success. My wife is enthusiastic over the work it does and the economy in its use." Mrs. J. E. King, Ill.: "Received iron yesterday in good shape. Well pleased with it. I want the agency." I. N. Newby, Ill.: "Find it to be all you claim for it." Mrs. Josephine Route, N. Y. "Received the iron O. K. and did my ironing with it yesterday. I like it very much." A. E. Covert, N.Y.: "Have lighted it several times already and find I can do ironing so much quicker and cleaner than in the old way. Think it is the best thing I have ever had in my house." Miss Roxie Sheets, of N. C.: "The two irons received and am delighted. Have turned off our regular ironer and will do the ironing ourselves now. Sold the extra iron to the first lady I showed it to." Mrs. Watson C. McNall, N.Y.: "I am more than pleased with it and its work. It is not a bit clumsy. It is a delight to use it." Mrs. Cora Wright, Ill.: "I received the iron Saturday and like it fine." Mrs. C. M. Winstead, Ky.: "I received my iron about three weeks ago. Like it better than anything I ever saw in the way of irons."

"Standard"

So they go—hundreds and thousands of delighted customers—the work of ironing cut in half—the expense of fuel almost eliminated—a God send to every home. The poor can afford it—the rich can buy nothing better. Every iron tested before shipping—fully guaranteed—ready for use when received. Price low—$4.50. Sent anywhere.

fools will dismiss the book as useless, or outgrown. Paraphrasing Mr. Lincoln's words on the Bible as a whole, I would apply them to Genesis in particular: "Take all of this book that you can on reason and the rest on faith and you will live and die a better man.'".

M. B. Madden, Osaka, Japan, writes: "We have had four baptisms in our work since the last report. One of these is the wife of a soldier who received from the emperor a decoration of the fourth class on account of good service both in the Japan-China and Russo-Japan wars. The officer himself is studying the Bible and is a very humble minded man, although his life has been in connection with the army. Another one is a student in the commercial college. One young man is a student of the medical college. He is from a well-to-do family and when he graduates he will be at home in one of our outstations and will be of great aid to the work in all that country. Another man is a public school teacher here in the city, who has a family. These people have very much encouraged all the Christians, especially the young teacher and his wife."

O. J. Grainger, Mungeli, India, says, "I have just returned from Jubbulpore, where I gave a series of addresses at the convention of Indian Christians and where I attended the conference of Christians called together by John R. Mott. We received great benefit from Dr. Mott's conference. I spent two weeks visiting our stations and auditing accounts. The missionaries here are all working hard and accomplishing much good, but we need more direct evangelistic work. In Mungeli I have baptized in the last six months 19 persons and more are ready for baptism. These must be trained and taught. Especially do the women need attention."

Dr. L. B. Kline, Vigan, P. I., says, "The medical work here is being greatly blessed. We have been busy from the first day. The natives would hardly give me time to unpack. I did three operations this morning. One was performed on an old bamboo cot in the wood and store room. Another was done on the boards torn from my freight box and covered with paper. Of course this is only temporary. An operating table is on the way." Dr. Kline and family reached Manila on the 8th of October. They remained there five weeks that Dr. Kline might take the Philippine medical examination. After the examination they set sail for Vigan. Dr. Kline is very much impressed with the work on the islands.

Captain J. B. Daugherty is taking up a work that needed him badly and he is just the man for the place. The provincial work in which he is engaged needs a man on the field to hold the work together and to instruct the workers and to have general oversight of the work. The Filipinos need nurture and admonition. Another man like Captain Daugherty for the north of the island would do a great work. The crying immediate need, however, is better and more equipment for the men already there. With proper facilities with which to work, a man can double and triple himself and produce a better quality of work also.

Miss Emma Lyon has been in China now for twenty years. On the twentieth anniversary of her arrival the young women and girls in the Woman's College surprised her with a reception and with numerous gifts. Miss Lyon has done a monumental work in China for the girls and women of that great land.

Dr. W. E. Macklin, Nankin, China, has recently translated Schiller's History of the Thirty Years War in Europe. He has written a short life of John Wesley in which he has shown the political influence of the Revival. He has lectured in Wuhu, Nankin, Shanghai and Yangchow and other places before large audiences. Dr. Macklin publishes a bi-weekly little paper on Christian Sociology.

Missionaries Leslie Wolfe, Dr. W. N. Lemmon and J. B. Daugherty, Manila, P. I., report 53 baptisms during the month of November. Of this number 26 were baptized in the Central Chapel, Manila, and the rest in outlying sections. F. M. RAINS, Sec.

Church Extension Notes

At our board meeting on January 7, loans were promised as follows: Joliet, Mont., $800; Lafayette, Ind., $10,000; Bonners Ferry, Ida., $300; Seymour, Ia., $3,500; Merced, Calif., $300; Kellerton, Ia., $1,000; Lima, O., South Side Church, $3,000; McRae, Ga., $250; Havana, Ill., $500; Abingdon, Ill., $3,000; Phoenix, Ariz., $5,000.

During the month the following loans were closed on completed buildings: Sardinia, O., $1,000; Tucson, Ariz., $1,000; Union City, Tenn., $5,000; Breckenridge, Tex., $2,000; Welch, Okla., $750.

The annuity fund is still popular. A friend from Illinois sent us $1,000 and an annuity of $800 was secured from Missouri.

The corresponding secretary recently held Church Extension Institutes at Cotner University and Bethany College and attended the meeting of the Home Missions Council in New York City.

The associate secretary held a successful meeting of three weeks at Knox, Ind., providing for $3,000 indebtedness at the close, with 21 additions. These 21 gave $1,500. He is now at Shawnee, Okla.

Ten Big Reasons Why

BETHANY GRADED LESSONS are being adopted by so many of the best schools among Disciples

1. There is more to them—at least a third more—than is contained in any other series.
2. They are rich, vital and full of suggestion to teacher and pupil.
3. They are free from the sectarian spirit.
4. They are soundly and fervently evangelical.
5. They are truly artistic in all their illustrations.
6. They are printed on better paper with better binding and in better taste than any other series.
7. Every lesson writer is an expert of interdenominational reputation.
8. They are a monument to the modern spirit of unity—a dozen leading denominations have co-operated to produce them and are now using them.
9. The Disciples possess full editorial rights, through the editor. Charles Clayton Morrison.
10. Every Disciple school that uses them participates in and promotes a great Christian union enterprise.

EVERY QUARTER ADDS TO THE NUMBER OF SCHOOLS INTRODUCING THESE LESSONS.

Disciples Publication Society

THE DISCIPLES PUBLICATION SOCIETY is a corporation chartered under the laws of Illinois. It is organized for the purpose of publishing books, Sunday School literature and a weekly religious newspaper. It has no capital stock. Its profits are not to go to individuals but to be appropriated to advance the cause of religious education, especially the higher education of the Christian ministry. The term "religious education" is regarded as an ideal common to Sunday Schools, missionary societies, colleges, seminaries and universities, and other organizations that promote Christian progress through Christian education. The Society through its trustees has purchased the entire assets and good will of the New Christian Century Company (including the subscription list and good will of The Christian Century; a contract of participation in the interdenominational syndicate for publishing the Bethany Graded Lessons; a contract of membership in the United Religious Press; all books, Sunday School supplies and other stock on hand; all accounts and bills receivable; besides assuming liability for all accounts and bills payable), for $16,000 and has executed its notes to that amount which have been accepted by the stock-holders of the New Christian Century Company in payment for their property. To provide capital for enlarging the business the trustees are issuing 5 per cent bonds in the amount of $50,000, retirable after five years, to be sold to persons interested in the ideals of The Christian Century. It is believed at the present time that not more than $25,000 of these bonds need be sold in order to put the Society on a sound profit earning basis. Subscriptions for the purchase of these bonds are now being solicited by C. C. Morrison and H. L. Willett, editors of The Christian Century. During Dr. Willett's absence in the Orient correspondence may be addressed exclusively to Mr. Morrison. Full information as to all details will be given upon inquiry. The essential purpose of the transaction and proposals herein described is to provide a way for the general brotherhood of the Disciples of Christ to buy The Christian Century and its publishing house and to pay for them by patronizing them. The bonds and notes are to be retired out of the profits earned by the Society. The purchasers of bonds, therefore, will stand, with the holders of notes, in the position of sustainers or supporters of the enterprise while the brotherhood's patronage is paying for it and increasing its value. The question of defining the membership of the Disciples Publication Society is still open, and upon it the organizers will be glad to receive suggestions. It is the purpose to make it thoroughly democratic and representative. The five trustees named by the charter will act for the Society until the basis of membership has been determined and the members elected.

WANTS TO BE SHOWN!

The following letter accompanied by the blank appearing in the lower corner of this page, signed, was received last week:

"I never realized before," writes this appreciative business man, "how severe were the economies under which The Christian Century has been all these years doing its work. I marvel that you have done so well under those conditions, that you and Doctor Willett would consent to do the work at all with so little resources and compensation. And the fact that you have done so well without money makes me feel that you should now be given a chance to show what kind of a paper you can produce with money. I feel that it is our duty to give you a chance, and if you will give me a little more information and a little more time to make up my mind I will be with you with a subscription to your bonds. I would like to make it $1,000 but I am sure I cannot do that. But I want to do my part to give you a fair chance."

Now of course that kind of a letter just warmed the editorial heart. Here is one man who gets at it on the very human side. He doesn't talk about brotherhood ownership, and we have always supposed that he was not sympathetic with some of our editorial convictions, but he likes The Christian Century and thinks that he would like to see what we can do in the newspaper line if we were given something to do with! He writes as if he would be willing to spend something just for the satisfaction of seeing!

Well, there are two outwardly modest writer-men who in the far-down privacy of their souls cherish the feeling that they would just like to show him! They have some plans for making such a paper as Disciples have never before produced. These plans are not the dreams of inexperience but the result of living close—O so close!—to the newspaper problem for years and seeing just beyond their reach great open doors of opportunity which they could not enter because it would cost something that they did not have.

A Chicago daily paper prints a series of cartoons entitled, "When a Feller Needs a Friend." The last one we saw showed a lad standing in front of the nickelodeon counting his four pennies and looking beseechingly at the people going in while he lacked just that one cent to gain admittance too. That hit off the editors' feelings to the dot.

The Christian Century is tantalizingly near doing what it wants to do, what it has long dreamed to do. It has everything else needed. It has four pennies of the nickel. It has location—Chicago is the ideal place for a national newspaper and publishing house. It has a responsive and loyal list of subscribers who take the paper not from duty but because they want it, and a fine list of intelligent patrons of its Sunday-school supplies. It has an editorial staff that works for love of the working and of the cause, a staff which produces a paper each week that brings back a continual stream of appreciative correspondence to the office. And above all, it has a great Cause, a definite, clear-cut Christian Cause,—not a vagary, not "moonshine," not a hobby, but a Cause that is in league with the great tides of the Church and the social order, a Cause for which even the stars are fighting!

It has four pennies: Ideal location, a loyal constituency, a staff, a Cause!

But with all these it can't get in!

It needs one penny more.

This fifth penny is Capital!

Some of us believe that if our friends will provide us with the resources The Christian Century may be made one of the most attractive and influential newspapers in the American Church. We wish it to represent the Disciples' contribution to Christian journalism. Far-reaching and unique plans are in mind which will be carried out if the Disciples Publication Society is backed by its friends.

The editorial staff simply aches for the chance to show our esteemed correspondent just what kind of a paper it could make if it had a whole nickel!

By JOHN RAY EWERS, Pittsburgh, Pa.

The great communion of the Disciples is finding itself, and as it does so it demands among other good things that its journals shall be owned and governed by the communion which supports them. I am, therefore, highly pleased to know that The Century is to be thus managed. I wish you all success in the commendable enterprise of forming the Disciples Publication Society. The Century has a place among us. Its editorial genius and its glorious freedom will be increasingly welcomed among a developing communion such as we certainly are.

By PROF. O. B. CLARK, Drake University.

I want to congratulate The Christian Century upon becoming a paper for the whole Disciple family. Why should not a people who are growing in scholarship and progressive thinking have a paper which represents the highest and freest in religious thought? We have such in The Century! May it prosper and may the cause advance!

CHARLES CLAYTON MORRISON,
700 E. 40th Street, Chicago.

I am interested in doing what I can to aid you and Dr. Willett in your plan for firmly establishing The Christian Century in the ownership and control of the Disciples. Kindly send me additional information. How long do the bonds extend? In what financial condition does the new Society begin business? Can you accept payment for bonds on the installment plan or must you have immediate cash for entire amount subscribed?

Episcopalians Preparing the Way

MUCH MUST BE DONE before the proposed World Conference on the Faith and Order of the Church of Christ can be called. The mere details of the preparations are numerous and complicated. The names and addresses of the proper officers of those communions throughout the world which confess Our Lord Jesus Christ as God and Saviour must be obtained, and invitations issued to them. These invitations cannot always be accepted promptly, for meetings of official bodies may not be held for two or three years. What shall be the basis of representation? Where shall the Conference meet and how long should it remain in session? In what way and how far shall the course of its procedure be outlined beforehand? It may well be years before these and numerous similar problems, which will be disclosed as the preparations go on, can be fully solved.

But the first question is whether we Christians really desire reunion. Have we that deep and definite faith in the one Lord which must fill us with the desire to reunite in His one Body? What are faith and membership in Christ? Is the relation of the Christian to Christ merely individual or does it constitute membership in a body? Is that body merely a human organization, self-originating, or is it the living continuous Body of the one Lord? Do we know whether or not the brethren from whom we have been separated for centuries, possess any of the precious things of which we are stewards or which, perhaps, we do not ourselves possess? Can we learn anything from each other? What is the Church? Has it any authority and if so, what? What is the basis of its claims? What is its mission? Is there any sufficient reason for the continued separate existence of the communions to which we severally belong?

The Committee appointed by the Protestant Episcopal Commission to consider the Plan and Scope of the World Conference believes that, before the Conference can actually be called, there must be created a more general and intense desire for reunion, a warmer atmosphere of Christian love and humility, and some wider and clearer comprehension of such questions as the above which must be faced and considered when the conferenee meets. The Committee, therefore, urges that Christian people should assemble together informally in frequent meetings, first, for united prayer that the way to reunion may be made plain and that we may have grace to follow it, second, that coming to know and appreciate each other better, we may learn of those precious things which we have hitherto kept from each other, and thus may deepen and widen the desire for a reunion which shall convince the world that God has sent His Son. Such local and informal conferences will help to prepare the way for larger conferences which will gradually lead up to the World meeting, at which it is hoped that we shall see that there is no sufficient reason for much, at least, of our present separation.

The Committee recommends first, that such conferences should at first be very small and informal. If the smallest number of persons fairly representative of a community can first be brought together to discuss the problem thoroughly, there will be a better prospect of real progress. Secondly, that the devotional side should be emphasized throughout. The desire for reunion must be grounded in and fed above all by common prayer. Thirdly, that, in selecting topics for discussion, careful search be made to find those which are really fundamental, but which the divisions of the past centuries have obscured. As the meaning of these questions is grasped more fully, it may come to be seen that the divisions growing out of them need not have occurred. Divisive and disputed topics should be carefully avoided until, by repeated meetings, the members of the conference have reached a large measure of unity.

A bibliography will soon be printed and mailed to all who are on our mailing list which may help to suggest books for instructive reading, though it must be confessed with sorrow that, at present, too many of the books which attempt to deal with Christian reunion are disfigured by partisanship and lack of thorough knowledge. Let us pray that our hearts may be so filled with the love of Christ, and our eyes so opened by the Holy Spirit, that we may all be made one in Him. Who liveth and reigneth, Father, Son and Holy Spirit, one God, forever and ever. Your brethren in Christ.

WILLIAM T. MANNING, Chairman.
ROBERT H. GARDINER, Secretary.

On behalf of the Committee on Plan and Scope, representing the Episcopal communion.

A PRAYER.

O GOD of Peace, who through thy Son, Jesus Christ, didst set forth One Faith for the salvation of mankind; Send thy grace and heavenly blessing upon all Christian people who are striving to draw nearer to thee, and to each other in the unity of the Spirit and in the bond of peace. Give us penitence of our divisions, wisdom to know thy truth, courage to do thy will, love which shall break down the barriers of pride and prejudice, and an unswerving loyalty to thy holy Name. Suffer us not to shrink from any endeavor which is in accordance with thy will, for the peace and unity of thy Church. Give us boldness to seek only thy glory and the advancement of thy Kingdom. Unite us all in thee, as thou, O Father, with thy Son and the Holy Spirit, art One God, world without end. Amen.

When Greek Meets Mrs. Young

It has not been a case of Greek meeting Greek, but rather a case of Greek meeting the superintendent of Chicago schools. The war between the Greek letter societies in the high schools of Chicago and the school authorities, headed by the superintendent, Mrs. Ella Flagg Young, has reached a point where it looks as if the insurgents would run up a flag of truce. More than 100 pupils from one high school alone have been dismissed by the principal, and in other high schools pupils have met with similar fate. Recently a national college fraternity at its annual meeting in Chicago put its ban of disapproval upon secret societies in secondary schools by passing a rule which in the future will shut out all candidates for membership who have ever belonged to a high-school "frat." It is to be hoped that other similar organizations will follow this example. It is inconceivable that the school authorities, not only of Chicago but of other cities, should have such difficulty in stamping out what every clear-headed parent must admit, after careful consideration, to be a decided evil. If this is an indication of the weakening of parental authority in the American home, it is indeed a serious matter. Judging by the reports in the daily press, the attitude of far too many high school pupils is one of indifference toward what ought to be the absorbing purpose of the school and of rebellion against undue invasion of personal liberty outside of school hours. The regrettable phase of the situation is that many of the parents seem to have encouraged their children in their insurgency against the school authorities. They are sowing to the wind. Their grandchildren, if they ever have any, will reap the whirlwind.

The Modern Press From the Inside

The appeal to editors and publishers of newspapers sent out by the Society of Friends of Philadelphia last November has caused a good deal of favorable comment. It urges the newspapers of the country to play their part in social advance and not run simply as business enterprises. It pleads "for righteousness in the whole make-up of the newspaper," and asks "for a standard which puts purity and good conduct and honesty ahead of dividends and profits." In connection with this action by a religious body, it is interesting to approach this question of newspaper ethics from the point of view of one of the leading American journalists, Mr. A. Maurice Low, who has contributed two most significant articles recently to the Yale Review. Inasmuch as we shall have occasion elsewhere to refer to Mr. Low's estimate of the superficiality of the modern newspaper, it will be necessary here only to set forth his trenchant statements of the economic situation in the newspaper world. The modern newspaper, according to Mr. Low, is purely a commercial institution, like a drygoods store or a hotel, although the latter make no false claims to educating public taste or elevating public morals. It is a business rather than a profession. No manufacturer sells his output at loss except the newspaper publisher. For his profits he depends, not upon the sale of the paper, but upon the advertiser. The advertising depends upon the circulation. The newspaper is no longer a free agent. It cannot print matter that might offend or injure large advertisers. Its hands are tied. "While posing as a missioner, it grows rich on the profits of the merchant." "The advertiser must be treated with the same deference that an expectant nephew shows his rich uncle." The significance of this point of view is not that it contains anything new—for thinking people have long been aware of this situation—but that it is said by such an authority from within the ranks of journalism itself, Mr. Low having been the Washington correspondent of the Boston Globe since 1886. It is, however, a situation to which the greater part of the general public is as yet wholly oblivious. No one from the outside could bring a more serious indictment against modern journalism, an indictment in which there are several counts, than has Mr. Low in these Yale Review articles. It is to be hoped that they may be given a much wider circulation than is possible in a scholarly review. We hereby challenge the Sunday newspaper syndicates to print both of these articles, even though it may seem to them like committing hari-kari. Better still, Mr. Carnegie might provide a sum sufficient to print them as full-page display ads in every paper in the country. It is a message that lays the axe to the root of the trees.

Peace or War?

The center of interest in the pending negotiations for the settlement of the Balkan War has been transferred from London to Constantinople. On Wednesday, Jan. 22, the grand council of the Ottoman empire decided to accept the terms of the powers which meant practically the end of Turkish rule in Europe, Constantinople being the only stronghold left to them outside of Asia. The next day at the behest of the war party, the ministry of Kiamil Pasha resigned, and a new ministry was formed under Mahmoud Shefket Pasha, grand vizier. Rioting ensued, in which Nazim Pasha, commander-in-chief of the army, was slain by men under Enver Bey. The warships of several nations are hastening toward Constantinople. Accurate news on account of press censorship has had to give way to rumor. The Turks are most unwilling to give up Adrianople. The new government has not as yet replied to the proposals of the powers, and the latest news as we go to press is that the envoys of the Balkan states in London threaten to terminate the peace negotiations. It seems almost certain that Turkey's reply will be a refusal to cede Adrianople or to allow the powers to determine the fate of the Aegean Islands. It is equally certain that the Balkan allies will not resume the war unless absolutely forced to it by Turkey. The possibility still exists of complications in the rear from Rumanian and Austrian aggression. In the meantime, while the armies are inactive, they are eating—and furthermore the agricultural interests are at a standstill. War benefits chiefly the international pawn-brokers.

A Great Foundation

The house by a vote of 152 to sixty-five has passed the Peters bill granting articles of incorporation to the Rockefeller Foundation. The measure will go to the senate where there is every reason to believe it will be passed by that body and become a law before the adjournment of this congress. When the bill was first presented nearly two years ago, strong objection was raised to it in many quarters because of the clause which permitted the incorporators of the foundation to become a self-perpetuating body. The revised bill just passed provides that new members of the incorporation shall be subject to the approval or disapproval of the following: The President of the United States, the chief justice of the Supreme Court, the president of the senate, the speaker of the house, the presidents of Harvard, Yale, Columbia, Johns Hopkins and Chicago. The former bill did not limit the amount of the foundation, but it is in the present bill limited to the sum of $100,000,000. The breadth of the scope of operations made possible for the foundation by the terms of the act of incorporation is remarkable: "To promote the well-being and advance the civilization of the peoples of the United States and its territories and possessions and of foreign lands in the acquisition and dissemination of knowledge; in the prevention of suffering; and in the promotion of any and all the elements of human progress." The passing of the act which establishes this foundation is the high-water mark of modern philanthropy. The earliest of the organizations of this character was the Peabody fund, the work of which has been immensely fruitful. Since that time, other similar foundations have been created, the Carnegie Institution, the Carnegie Fund, the Sage Fund, and Mr. Rockefeller's endowment of the General Education Board, and now comes the largest of them all, the Rockefeller Foundation, so large, indeed, as one writer has said, that the language of appreciation has to confess bankruptcy. Whatever may be the opinion as to the methods followed in the making of this great fortune—and we cannot forget that these methods have been intimately bound up with the business and commercial methods of the age—we cannot fail to recognize at its true value the vision and service involved in such a gift as this. Mr. Rockefeller, Mr. Carnegie and other possessors of great wealth are asking the same question as the one in the parable of old: "What shall I do, because I have not where to bestow my fruits?" But their answer is the reverse of the man in the parable.

The life of Jesus was an active life. He would have His followers devote their lives to such activities as talent and opportunity render possible and advisable. Here again consecration to the highest ideals of the Master's life should dominate. He would have us not only perform useful service and do good, but so throw ourselves into the work we do and so strive to accomplish that which needs to be accomplished that the measure of our achievements shall be the full measure of possibilities under the circumstances that surround us. —Selected.

Vital Union With Jesus

How shall we know that we are in vital union with Christ? It is easy to deceive ourselves. Sincere men have done cruel deeds in the name of Jesus of Nazareth. Selfish men have enjoyed what they called the peace of Christ. Shiftless husbands and scolding wives have counted themselves among the disciples of Jesus and have been free from the suspicion that they were hypocrites. Men who sell honor and friendship for money have been known to set themselves up as worthy representatives of the Christian way of living. It is therefore not an idle question we have asked. We may be deceiving ourselves as to the kind of persons Christians ought to be.

The highest intelligence is required in the service of Christ. We must know ourselves, and this is difficult. We begin the life of thought by considering the world without. The world within is examined after the mind has grown strong in its power to observe and to compare. Many of us never subject the inner life to rigid examination. We know less of ourselves than we do of horses, pigs, and cows. We remain children in our knowledge of personal needs. The Christian has regard to the effect of his life on the world. The world is not a simple affair and no man can understand it unless he is willing to study it and to seek information and guidance from many sources. It is impossible for a man to stumble into the way of Christian acting toward other men. He must have knowledge and understanding.

"If ye keep my commandments, ye shall abide in my love." It is to be noticed that Jesus does not make the keeping of some of his commandments the test of fellowship with him. When he says "my commandments," he means all. And he is not speaking of formal rules of conduct issued by arbitrary authority. He refers to the laws of life. We are living beings. We grow, we are not built up like a house. The words of Jesus are life because they awaken hope and point the way to more abundant life. To follow his commandments it is necessary to have his mind. What he says can be interpreted by prejudice and selfishness to mean just the opposite of what he intended. When we know something of his mind, the doing of his work will add to our understanding. Carelessness in carrying out his will renders the mind incapable of appreciating the truth of the gospel.

The fruitful life is in vital union with Christ. The Christian missionary protesting against the traffic in opium and against the opium habit until the Chinese government was aroused to action bore fruit to the glory of God. The statesman bears testimony to his union with Christ when he works for peace at home and abroad, when he declines to allow the possibility of defeat to turn him from his duty, and when his career makes it harder for rascals to secure office and easier for honest men to be elected without laying aside their honesty. In the present day the Christian man labors to protect childhood, to remove unnecessary temptation from the path of youth, to secure a living wage for all workers, to free the race from the danger and anguish of preventable diseases, to train the children for efficient living, to provide comfort for those who cannot help themselves, and to give all mankind the benefits that come with a knowledge of God revealed in Jesus Christ. If we are doing none of these things, a claim to vital union with Christ is absurd.

Union with Christ is union with the disciples of Christ. It is co-operation in all good work. The church is a necessity. If it should disappear from the earth, the spirit of Christ would build another. The church is an organization that enables men to co-operate in the work of Christ. Forgetting this, we have all sorts of difficulty over what it is and how it should be managed. There is nothing sacred about an institution called the church if it is doing nothing. Its sacredness consists in the opportunity it offers to the disciples of Jesus to help one another to put their efforts together for the salvation of the world. Elders, deacons, Sunday-school superintendents, preachers, what are they doing? Are they strengthening the members of the church in faith? Are they guiding the activities of the church so that the message of Christ is being sent out to all the world? They have union with Christ if we answer in the affirmative. If in the negative, they are away from Christ and the formalities of the church confer on them no spiritual benefits whatever. [Midweek Service, Feb. 12. John 15:1-10; Rom. 8:9-17; Gal. 3:27.] S. J.

Continuing the Inquiry

Our readers will recall the editorial of three weeks since in which we renewed our request of the editor-emeritus of the Christian Evangelist for a statement as to just what Christian baptism is. Doctor Garrison had pointed out its antecedents and consequents and had named immersion as its "form." As a response to our inquiry he chooses to make an inquiry of us, which he formulates in the following communication:

Editors The Christian Century: Referring to your editorial "Renewing the Inquiry" in which you deal with an editorial in The Christian Evangelist, I beg to continue the "inquiry" by a statement and question which I hope you will answer promptly in your columns.

The Lord's Supper has faith in Christ and in his atoning death, and the desire to remember him in the way appointed by himself, as its antecedent; the eating of bread and the drinking of wine, consecrated by prayer and thanksgiving, as symbols of his body and blood, as its form; and the deepening of our love for him, and showing his death to the world, as its consequent. Now, subtracting its antecedent, its form and its consequent from the ordinance, "may we not kindly ask just what" the Lord's Supper is?

St. Louis, Mo. J. H. GARRISON.

If we take Doctor Garrison's analysis precisely as he has outlined it above we are compelled to reply that there is no such thing as the Lord's Supper at all! Everything that it could be he has apparently included either as an antecedent or a consequent of the Supper or else as belonging to its form. It is obvious that it cannot be its own antecedent, obvious also that it cannot be its consequent. And neither we nor Doctor Garrison will affirm that it is a mere form.

But the analysis presented by our correspondent does not analyze; and we marvel that a teacher so lucid as our very truly beloved Doctor Garrison almost always is should devise such an outline as this. Why call "the desire to remember the Lord in the way appointed, etc.," an "antecedent" of the Lord's Supper? Is it not of the very essence of the Lord's Supper or, not to prejudge the question as to what the Lord's Supper is, is it not at least a concomitant of the Supper? And how can he classify the consecration of bread and wine "by prayer and thanksgiving" as formal? Is not such an act a typically spiritual act? And why does our correspondent put "showing his death to the world" in the category of "consequents?" Is this, too, not at least a concomitant of the Supper, if not of its very essence?

In all considerateness we cannot avoid feeling that Doctor Garrison has forced an analysis here in order to make the appearance of an analogy with his definition of baptism which we criticised. But it should be remembered that both the above analysis of the antecedents, consequents and form of the Lord's Supper as well as of the antecedents, consequents and form of baptism were his, not ours, and whatever interest we expressed in asking Doctor Garrison to tell us just what baptism itself is, is now doubled by the desire that he shall state, consistently with the above analysis, just what the Lord's Supper also is.

In courtesy to our correspondent and because, in addition to what we deem its technical inexactness there is in Doctor Garrison's communication the suggestion of a yet more serious misconception of the Lord's Supper, we shall comply with his request for our definition of this sacrament and add thereto some observations.

The Lord's Supper is the spiritual act of communion with the unseen Lord by a group of his disciples under the symbolism of a social meal. The essential thing, the substantive thing, in the Lord's Supper is not the physical act of eating but the social act of spiritual communion. The physical meal is accessory, incidental, symbolic. It happens to be there because our Lord found the meal already invested by the custom of mankind with the symbolism of friendship, of communion, of mutual trust and social freemasonry, Custom loaned it to his purpose. But his purpose was to be remembered. His interest in the physical meal was derived from, reflected from, incidental to, this essential purpose.

And that the Church has so interpreted our Lord's mind is shown by the entire transformation which the physical form of the Lord's Supper has undergone since our Lord instituted it. In apostolic times this rite was an integral part of an actual meal, celebrated just as on the Passover night when Jesus had first suggested it. The bread that they ate was actual food. The cup that they drank was actual refreshment. The agape or love-feast was a common meal made sacramental by the remembrance of the unseen Lord and by expectation of his return. Jewish habits and temper, cultivated by Passover and other customs, were such as to have so perpetuated it. But Gentile Christians seemed to lack the restraining social traditions which would enable them to make a religious sacrament of a common meal. They fell, therefore, into gluttony and revelry. The simple, holy love-feast became a scandal. To save its sacramental character a distinction came to be made between the love-feast and the eucharist. The former retained in itself the human fellowship and the latter took to itself the divine communion, quite abstracted from the warm fellowship of the human situation in which it had first arisen. The actual bread became a wafer or a crumb-like bit, the refreshing drink was witheld from the communicant and taken by the priest representatively, or, as in our Protestant churches, became a mere sip. Thus the actual meal became a make-believe meal, a mock meal.

The change that has taken place in the practice of baptism since early days is precisely analogous to the change that took place in the observance of the Lord's Supper. For the primitive symbol of initiation—an actual bath in water—only the symbol of the symbol remains—a drop of water on the forehead. So for the primitive symbol of communion—an actual meal of food and drink—only the symbol of a meal remains, the symbol of a symbol.

There is no more "authority" in the New Testament for our modern way of observing the Lord's Supper than there is for the modern non-baptist way of administering baptism. In Doctor Garrison's analysis above he uses the expression, referring to our Lord, "to remember him in the way appointed by himself." But our Lord appointed no such way of remembering him as we follow Lord's day after Lord's day.

The realism, the human warmth, the immanent symbolism of the actual meal which our Lord "appointed,"—if his tender suggestion can be called an "appointment" at all—have given place to a conventional, bare, and artificial symbol of a meal, a pale substitute which possesses meaning only as, by definite mental effort, we invest it with the immanent meaning of its original.

If sprinkling is a "human" substitute for immersion, so also is our manner of observing the Lord's Supper a "human" substitute for the way "appointed" by our Lord.

These things are said in the interest of fact and truth and a clear understanding of the subject under inquiry, not in the interest of any theory as to our present duty in respect of observing the Lord's Supper. Yet it is a question which we who are striving to go back to Christ may well face, whether the restoration of our Lord's way of first observing the Holy Supper would not enrich our Church life quite as much as, if not more than, the restoration of the primitive way of administering baptism.

But the point we wish to make clear in relation to Doctor Garrison's inquiry is that the essential thing our Lord desired, not to say "appointed," is not lacking in the Lord's Supper as observed by his Church, even though her present way of observing it was not contemplated by him when he made his tender suggestion for the perpetuation of his memory. All through the ages this artificial meal has been used helpfully to symbolize this fundamental Christian reality of the friendly and comforting presence of the Lord.

The modification which the Lord's Supper has undergone has not sacrificed the essential purpose of our Lord, nor the essential character of the rite; and this means simply that the essential purpose of our Lord did not reside in the physical meal, much less in such thin symbols of a meal as we today employ, but in the definite social act of spiritual communion between himself and a social group of his disciples.

As devotees of a truly spiritual religion our first and elemental task is to translate all our religious customs and rites and institutions and duties out of the materialistic, literalistic or legalistic terms in which they may have hitherto been defined into terms of actual spiritual experience, and to affirm constantly that their essential character inheres in their spiritual reality, not in any particular physical form whatever.

If this is done with the Lord's Supper it yields us the definition given above.

If this is done with baptism it yields us the definition many times given in these pages: the act of conferring upon a penitent believer, and his act of accepting, the status of membership in the Church of Christ.

Interpretations

A Great Preacher at Close Range

First Church at Hannibal has just closed a meeting of three weeks lacking one Sunday. Dr. C. M. Chilton, for fifteen years the pastor of First Church, St. Joseph, Mo., did the preaching. It was a quiet, simple, effective and spiritual meeting. There were seventy-two additions to the church, sixty of whom were adults, the remaining twelve from the Sunday-school. The latter came singly and without persuasion on the part of any one.

Rev. C. M. Chilton, D. D.

Among the additions were several of the leading men of Hannibal. It is commonly remarked that the meeting was as substantial in its results as any ever held in the city. Certainly the church is benefited in its spiritual life and greatly helped by the valuable accessions. Both community and church felt that no violence had been done them, but that great benefit was theirs through the rich ministry of Dr. Chilton.

I have never heard preaching that more strongly appealed to me. It might be of interest to many for me to try to interpret Dr. Chilton's preaching, and seek to ascertain his power with strong men.

He is a careful student. His sermons are not loose but well prepared. He holds himself rigidly to his outline. I would take it that he rarely yields to spontaneous impulses while he is preaching. The central message of his discourse is strongly mystical. The heart of his preaching is the "living Christ." The final and supreme word of evidence he finds in our consciousness of Christ. He therefore is not at all afraid of the critic or the scientist. Never did he have a word of censure concerning either.

Although in his thinking he makes the living Christ self-witnessing, he is yet careful not to underestimate the value of the historical Christ. Feeling is supreme in Dr. Chilton's religion; yet it is not feeling that runs wild; but feeling held in check and ever tested by reason. His mind works logically. His sermons were closely bound together in logical sequence. He began with sermons on evidences and closed with hortatory sermons as to immediate duty. But outstanding in all was the living Christ in whom centers the passion of his soul.

Dr. Chilton's manner, voice and general attitude bespeak his deep faith in Christ. He trusts him for results. He believes in a tremendous way that man and Christ are for each other, and when the former is simply and truly interpreted the latter will receive him. He rests his case upon truth rather than method.

Over-modest is he with regard to advertising and newspaper reports. I think he fears their spiritually deteriorating influence.

Dr. Chilton is a strong exhorter to the intelligent. He does not overdo it, and the basis of his exhortation is always on a high plane. "Come because it is right, because God wants you" is a frequent expression. Rarely does he use an illustration or make a quotation. Most impressive speakers are rich in illustration; not so with Dr. Chilton. He is a wide reader, and of the best books too, but he seldom refers to one he has read. While he was here in the meeting he read "The Autobiography of Mark Rutherford;" "The Treasure of the Humble," by Maeterlinck; "Eucken and Bergson," by E. Hermann; "Does Faith Need Reasons," by Bollard; one of Dostoieffsky's novels and other good books.

But there was no echo of any of these books in his sermons.

His sermons are from his own own deep life. A book makes its deposit somewhere in the depths of his soul and after it has become a part of himself, and perhaps after he has forgotten the book, he draws upon it for sermonic messages—which come surcharged with the fires of his own spirit.

His preaching does not raise questions. He does not cause his hearers to ask, "Is that true?" but "Am I right in my life?" In a wonderfully simple yet powerful way he brings his hearers face to face with God. God is as real and as present to him as ever he was to the great mystics. His business as a preacher he conceives, I take it, to be to disclose God to man, and man's spiritual nature to himself. He is conversant with the intellectual difficulties of the modern man; but he solves them by getting him into spiritual fellowship with the personal Christ.

Dr. Chilton is a splendid personal worker. He is a quick discerner of the movements of men's souls. In his conversations with men out of the church he talks about the high things. God is his great theme. It takes a strong and tactful man to talk about God and prayer and eternity to busy men in their offices.

Many of us could argue about God in offices; but to talk earnestly of God as a Father to console, comfort and save, under such conditions, is an art not many of us have yet learned. But Dr. Chilton has learned it. He does not answer men's intellectual objections. Frequently he makes no rejoinder to the excuses they give; but keeps suggesting the one thing, viz., their duty to God. Many of us accentuate men's difficulties by trying to remove them. Here again Chilton seeks to dissipate objections by establishing right relationships with Christ.

One of Dr. Chilton's strong characteristics is his great sympathy with men. He believes most men want to do what is right. He preaches very little upon sin, and never uses the word sinner. People instinctively feel his sympathy and respond to it with their better natures. Perhaps some sorrows that have come into his life have tended to make him more patient with erring humanity. "We must be very patient with people" is a frequent sentence of his.

Dr. Chilton has zest for all life. He sees the funny and ridiculous side of things even in an exaggerated way, though his hearers do not suspect this side of him, for he scarcely has the suggestion of humor in his sermons.

He is aware of the day in which we live. He knows of the strain that is upon the Church; but he is not alarmed; nor does he take positive sides in controversial matters.

He does not believe in hurrying changes, though he thinks changes imminent in the universal Church. His plan is to wait for the Spirit of God clearly to show us his mind.

Now nothing I have written explains Dr. Chilton. Personality eludes analysis. That indefinable influence that radiates from his soul is not secured by adding together the characteristics I have suggested. Its source is in the depths that are hidden from mortal eye. Perhaps it depends most of all upon the discipline of one's mind and heart. Perhaps every wayward thought lessens the power of a minister. If all of us ministers were to cast out of our thoughts all impurity and all worldliness and all selfish ambitions, think you that our power would not be multiplied? Chilton is strong because his heart is pure—purified it has been by the fires of God.

GEORGE A. CAMPBELL.

Hannibal, Mo.

The Bible is a noble book, all men's Book. It is our first, oldest statement of the never-ending problem—man's destiny and God's ways with him here on earth; and all in such free-flowing outlines—grand in its simplicity, and in its epic melody.—Thomas Carlyle.

Editorial Table Talk

A Chill at the Capital

Washington correspondents say that a little chill has passed over society at the capital of the nation. It was caused by the announcement of President-elect Wilson that he would like to see the Inauguration ball omitted. Washington society could stand the omission of the ball, for it would be only for a night, and joy cometh in the morning. But the fear is that this is to be a Wilson habit, and that there is to be a return to simplicity. "Are we to have Jeffersonian simplicity?" asks one of the spokesmen. Well, hardly, for Jefferson rode over from Virginia, hitched his horse to the top rail of a back fence, and walked around the corner to the place of inauguration. The new president won't go back to that. He will have his "machine," and he will let the other man get down on his back and put on the missing nut when the old thing goes wrong. But there are simplicities and simplicities, and it is not one of the simplicities for a dashing member of society to appear with diamonds on the heels of her shoes, or for other members to turn a social function into a display of ropes of pearl necklaces and all the other contents of the jewelry stores of Europe, Asia and Africa.

There is immense room for improvement without becoming severely simple. And if the president, his wife and daughters are all of a mind to make a change toward plainer life and higher thinking, the country is ready to applaud.

What's In a Name?"

The Churchman of New York, since its change of owners and editors, appears to care less than ever about the Catholic name and to desire more than ever the Catholic spirit. In a vigorous leader it calls attention to the fact that words and rites seem to fall short of the great results that are expected of them. As an illustration it is shown how hard the Pope's forces fought to push through the council of the Vatican the dogma of papal infallibility. This was to put the church in possession of a weapon which would strike all its opponents cold. But having gotten its magic sword it has never dared to draw it since or known how to wear it. "It has come about that the infallibility proclaimed is to be understood now, not in the sense of the party that carried it but in in the sense of those minimizers they decried, and in the forty years that have passed since it was hailed as the church's salvation it has never been unsheathed." The editor of The Churchman hints that if the party which has fought so long to erase the word "Protestant" from the legal title of the Protestant Episcopal denomination should succeed, their occupation would be gone—and the church would remain as soundly Protestant as ever. And he is right.

The Democracy of the Bible

The fact is that the democracy of the Bible is far more radical than that of Britain's limited monarchy or the constitution of our own republic. The Young Turk realizes today that the Sultan understood the facts when he tried to keep the Bible out of his dominions. The opening of the Bible in any country is the death-knell of autocracy, and the reading of the Bible will eventually give each nation "a church without a bishop and a state without a king." The Old Testament commonwealth was far more democratic than any existing republic, and the church of the New Testament knows no head—no priest—but Christ. Moses tolerated no orders of nobility in his state and Peter himself no lordship over the consciences of the individual Christian. More than once our Presbyterian brethren have found, some gladly and some with sorrow, that "presbyter was but priest writ large," and in our own "land of the free" our highest court told us that our constitution accorded to the black man no rights which the white man was bound to respect. The Bible may be "an old fashioned book" but it will be a hundred years—or more—before Christian nations themselves come up to its ideals of human rights or Christian churches are true to the liberty with which Christ made his children free.

Jesus and the Possible Man

He is in each one of us, the person whom we may become. How shall we define him; how shall we dare to believe in him; how shall we achieve him? This question lies back of all our moral and spiritual problems and strivings. The answer is in Christ. In him is seen the possible man. Triumphant over every threatening circumstance rose the Carpenter. Supreme above every temptation stood Jesus. Master of death and every fear appeared the Redeemer. It was his triumph and it was ours also. What he was we are to become. If the day is dark we look to him and discover the radiance of his faultless character. If we are beset with temptations we look to him and discern the triumphant spirit of the victor. If we through fear of death are subject to bondage we hear him say, "He that liveth and believeth in me shall never die." Then we know that these are for us also and we are made brave and strong with the faith and trust of the Man of Nazareth.

—The World in Chicago, the great missionary exposition to be given in Chicago, May 3 to June 7, will be commensurate with what it portrays. The Coliseum is often taken for a few days to exhibit some great industry, but five weeks will be required to accommodate the crowds that will want to see The World in Chicago. The Auditorium, the finest theater in the city, will be required afternoons and evenings during the same five weeks to accommodate the people that will want to see the Pageant of Darkness and Light. The two greatest show places in the city will be given up to this world missionary exposition. About the middle of February, training classes of stewards for the exposition will be meeting in at least four hundred Chicago churches. In the remainder of the churches co-operating, these classes will be started before the first of March. Thousands of mission study books are being used. Never before in the history of Chicago have so many people been studying the problems, the work and the results of missions at the same time. It was said in Boston a month before The World in Boston Exposition opened, as the training classes were nearing the end of their period of study, that should the doors of the exposition never be opened, the preparations would still be justified by the results of ten thousand people studying missionary text-books. A total of twenty-four different text-books are being studied by the Stewards of The World in Chicago. These cover every non-Christian country in the world in which the work of Christian missions is being carried on, many lands that are partly Christian and several sections of our own land in which missionary work is being carried on.

—The Illinois commission on uniform marriage and divorce laws, last week, declared divorce to be the greatest menace to the nation The commission voted to adopt a report declaring federal control of marriage and divorce as the only adequate solution of the problem. The most striking portion of the indictment of divorce drawn up by the committee follows: "The divorce evil, by its rapid and widespread growth in the United States, has become a danger so deadly that it threatens not only the moral health, but the very life of the nation. Within the last fifty years divorce has increased, on an average, more than three and one-third times as fast as the population. In the year 1912 it may safely be said that 100,000 divorces were granted. It is conservative to say that 100,000 children, mostly under 10 years of age, were made divorce orphans, being deprived of one or both of their parents, and that 2,000,000 homes, actual or potential, were wrecked hopelessly and as utterly wiped out as by an infinite conflagration." The recommendation of the committee was: "The law whatever else happens, must stand for the home—teaching its sanctity, insisting upon its preservation—so that side by side with the uniform divorce law must be a uniform marriage law. To this end a uniform federal law on marriage and divorce must be demanded, based on an amendment to the federal Constitution and valid anywhere. We should at once secure the framing of these uniform laws and ask the legislatures of our states to petition Congress for an amendment of the Constitution along the lines of the law submitted."

—John Burroughs and Ernest Thompson-Seton have issued a joint appeal to the school children of America in which they say: "An urgent appeal we make to you in behalf of our native birds, many species of which are in danger of extermination. To you is now given the opportunity to render substantial help toward their preservation. A measure is now before congress, the purpose of which is to place all migratory birds under the protection of the federal government. Such a law is greatly needed. If it is not passed our birds will continue to decrease—to the great and everlasting disadvantage and shame of the American people. The destruction of bird life is costing American farmers millions of dollars annually through the constantly increasing devastations of harmful insects upon which the birds feed. But a greater loss their slaughter is bringing to all who love God's great out-of-doors. We therefore appeal to the school children of America to help in this vitally important matter. We ask you to get your parents, teachers and friends to write or telegraph to the congressman of your district and the two senators of your state, now in Washington, urging immediate action upon the pending bird protection bill—that they may understand how deep is the interest in it and how great is the need for it."

—On the evening of her wedding Miss Helen Miller Gould had 1,000 homeless and destitute men as her guests at dinner at the Bowery Mission. Miss Gould has been a particularly useful friend to the hungry and homeless men who flock to the Bowery Mission all night long, and while she has provided many feasts in the past her principal charity has been supplying funds to see that the individual applicant for relief has not been left cold, hungry or cheerless. Upon this occasion, Miss Gould expressed the desire to have all homeless, hungry and cheerless men enjoy a real dinner. Miss Sarah J. Bird, a widly known mission worker, was instructed by Miss Gould to make arrangements for the feast in celebration of the wedding. Miss Bird told Dr. Hallimond to "gather them in from the highways and the byways" and they certainly were all there.

—Where are the nine? Our request for ten defenders of the Disciple's practice against the vigorous critique of Geoffrey Palmer in the London Christian World has brought, to this date, just one lone response. Are the readers of that British critic willing to concede that his point is well taken? Ten years ago its publication in a paper reaching as many church leaders as does The Christian Century would have brought to the front one hundred defenders. The article was boldly frank, published in England's leading Free Church paper and given to our readers in the issue of January 16. Something ought to be said, but The Christian Century has nothing to say unless there are at least ten others whose hearts prompt them to speak.

—There is a growing sentiment in this country that its marriage and divorce laws should be changed. Every county attorney in Kansas would become a divorce proctor if a bill introduced in the state senate were to become a law. The bill delegates the county attorneys to investigate all divorce proceedings with a view to putting a check on the growth of the divorce evil in the state. Revision of the marriage laws of the state "in order to restrain youthful, hasty marriages and to prevent elopements into Delaware from other sections of the country," was the principal recommendation of Gov. Charles R. Miller in his inaugural address. He urged a law requiring residence within the state for at least six days by one of the parties to the marriage.

—The Toronto Convention of Disciples next fall will take advantage of the summer rates usually offered for travel in Michigan and Canada. These rates are better than those usually obtained for conventions. On recommendation of the national secretaries and the American Christian Missionary Society, the date of the Toronto Convention has been changed to September 30—October 6, inclusive, so as to take utmost advantage of these rates. Tickets can be purchased on any day prior to September 30, good for returning until October 31, with the privilege of a visit to Niagara Falls. Dr. McCash promises further information at a later time. Meantime it looks as if Toronto will be one of our best conventions.

—What is said to be the first wireless outfit ever established in a church has been put into operation by the Rev. Horace K. Holtzinger, pastor of the Fifth Street Methodist Episcopal church in Philadelphia. The clergyman plans to establish a wireless class for boys as an inducement to the youngsters to come to church. The receiving station is the minister's study and the necessary "flagstaffs," so to speak, are on the roof of the church. Rev. Mr. Holtzinger is an expert operator and it is said that the boys will have a competent instructor, therefore. Anything legitimate to attract the youngsters skyward.

—War to the knife on the Anti-Saloon league of America was declared by the National Liquor Dealers' association, which held its annual convention at Washington, D. C. In a resolution adopted after a brief debate it was determined that "immediate action" should be taken "to oppose the nefarious methods" of the league. Resolutions also were adopted advocating the re-establishment of the canteen in the army and abrogation of brewery ownership of leases on saloons and urging closer understanding between the liquor dealer and the excise authorities.

—President-elect Wilson has announced that he would not relinquish his office as governor of New Jersey before March 3, the day he leaves Trenton for his inauguration at Washington. When he starts out to become president he will not travel in a private car, nor will any member of his family. The 1,000 Princeton students who are to march in the inaugural parade will have their special cars attached to the same train, so as to escort the former president of their university into the national capital and give him a Princeton cheer when he arrives there.

—Vice-President-elect Thomas R. Marshall and Mrs. Marshall, it was announced have determined not to take a house in Washington, but will live in a hotel during their four years' residence there after March 4. Accommodations were engaged by the vice-president-elect's secretary. The butterfly froth and foam element at Washington does not like the idea one bit.

—All local records were broken in the way of public contributions to religious or other causes at the closing session of the council of the Union of American Hebrew Congregations, at Cincinnati, when subscriptions brought the total donations well over $200,000 to be used for the support of the Hebrew Union college and general work of the extension department. Of the 500 delegates assembled at the convention more than 50 per cent gave of their substance before the council closed.

—It shocks even those whose ears are most accustomed these days to hearing all sorts of erratic and radical utterances on religion to read Dr. J. H. Garrison's "Easy Chair" article in which he characterizes "joining the church" as "religious moonshine."

DR. WILLETT'S MISSION TOUR

Professor Herbert L. Willett is now making an investigative tour of the mission fields of the Orient accompanied by a university class whose members are devoting themselves, under his leadership, to an earnest and systematic study of social and religious conditions in the Far East and to the activities and results of Christian missionary effort. In this series of articles in The Christian Century Dr. Willett will write more or less informally about his personal experiences and observations, and, in addition, will report the results of his study and of those with him, giving our readers thus a delightful travel story and an instructive and authoritative report of actual missionary conditions and needs. No man in the American Church is better qualified than Dr. Willett to find the facts and to judge them discriminatingly

The Japanese

It is often said by those who have lived in Japan that one may associate with the interesting people of that land for many years and yet never know them. This is particularly the conviction of Mr. Hearn, who should have known the Japanese if anyone could, and whose estimate of them is almost fulsomely eulogistic. It would be out of place, therefore, for a mere passing visitor to do more than record a few impressions of the people as they may be seen upon the streets, in the shops, in their homes or on the roads.

If Japan is a little land, so are its people small. The impression given as they are watched from day to day is that they lack from three to five inches of the usual American height, both for men and women. One wonders how this fact is to be explained. They are closely related to the Koreans and the Chinese, both of which peoples are of moderate stature.

Sitting Upon the Heels.

One of the explanations offered is the universal custom of sitting upon the heels. A Japanese does not use a chair, but settles down upon his feet in a manner that would bring cramps to the legs of an American in the briefest space of time. Yet this posture does not appear to inconvenience the native in the least. It is quite natural and restful for him. Some of the missionaries acquire the habit by practice, but the foreigner finds it very difficult to be polite in a Japanese home, where the custom is for all to sit thus on the heels.

Would not such a practice, followed for many centuries, tend to shorten somewhat the length of the leg, and so reduce stature? Most people are tall or short by reason of leg measure. A very tall man seldom shows his height when seated. Whatever combination of circumstances has produced this shortness of stature in the Japanese, this habit of sitting, or squatting on the feet has doubtless had its influence.

Small But Hardy.

But if they are small in stature, they are a hardy lot. The temperature varies of course from one extreme to the other. Yet in all weathers they seem to care little for comfort. Their houses are lightly made, with easily sliding partitions which separate room from room, and doors and windows alike of paper panels or similar light construction. There is little fire, save for cooking. A brazier of coals for the warming of the hands is about the only manner of moderating the cold of winter. Yet they seem to feel little inconvenience.

Men at work go lightly clad in all kinds of weather. The 'rikisha men are usually barefooted, save for the straw sandal, which merely protects the sole of the foot. And if they have to remain two or three hours in front of the house where you are taking dinner on a cold evening, they do not seem to mind it in the least. It is an open-air life which is lived by people of all grades. And probably to this fact they may credit much of their hardiness and power of endurance.

Antipodes of Americans.

Comment has often been made on the fact that the Japanese are our antipodes in almost every regard. They stand feet to feet with us, on the opposite side of the world. They read from right to left, rather than as is our habit. than from the body, as we do. They plane boards in the same direction. And many such habits they have which are the reverse of ours. Yet such contrasts are really quite superficial, and give a mistaken idea of the Japanese character. In simple fact they are much like humanity elsewhere, and neither those who laud them without stint nor those who see in them little worthy of praise do justice to them. And interestingly enough, the Japanese themselves have been as little pleased with the books that have given them excessive praise as they have with those which have treated them in a cynical and cavalier spirit.

One trait which the stranger notices at once is the politeness of the people. Whether it is your host entertaining you in his home, or the tradesman in his shop, or the farmer whom you pass on the road, or the little maid who waits on you at the hotel, or the 'rikisha man who pulls you along the street, all are polite and courteous. At first you wonder if there is not a bit of play-acting in all this for the benefit of the stranger. But presently you see that it is the habitual attitude of the people toward each other.

Elaborate Introductions and Greetings.

If two Japanese are introduced to each other, they bow two or three times with the most elaborate and ceremonious politeness. Their greetings are of the same elaborate sort. Even in the hurry of daily work or business they do not forget a certain obligation of manners. There are no quarrels on the street. You never hear loud and vituperative language. At least you are told that such is the case by those who know. And you are perfectly sure that it is true from the manner in which a crowd of people handles itself. There is little jostling, children are carefully made room for, and where a westerner wants to push through with impatience, the Japanese wait quietly for the opening which is sure to come in another moment or two.

In dress the advent of western ideas has brought great changes. The women still wear the old native dress, with the exception of the ladies of the court and higher social groups, who have adopted European styles, with rather qualified results as to appearance. The native costume of the women is graceful and becoming. It is free, unconfined, makes no use of stays or laces, and gives free play to all the muscles. The head-dress is elaborate, the different styles denoting the station and condition of the wearer. The women wear no other head covering, save that in sunshine or rain the light and graceful bamboo umbrella is carried.

European Costume Being Adopted.

The men are rapidly adopting European costume. This does not mean that a majority are habited in trousers and coats, though probably in the cities that would be nearly the truth. But the army uniform, adopted from the continental armies, has had its effect on the habits of the people. The European clothing is much more practicable for the usual purposes of business or labor, and then too it conforms more nearly to that sentiment of imitation of the west which has been Japan's chief passion and chief danger in recent years. For head-dress the men have taken up with the English cap, though the soft hat of fedora shape is common. The men of the humbler class go bare-headed for the most part, or wear in rainy weather the broad, round, slightly peaked hats of the old tartar style. These hats are woven of bamboo fibers, and are a good protection from both sun and rain. You will often see in the country the grass rain coats, which make the wearer look as if he had on a suit constructed of cornstalks.

The foot-wear is various. With the European clothing have come the western shoes. But the common foot-gear for men and women alike is the wooden sandal, held on by the thong passing inside the great toe. And as the feet are used by the Japanese for a great variety of activities for which we employ only the hands, the shoe is held on with the firm grasp of a hand upon a cord. In rainy weather a sandal much higher from the ground is used, and the continual wonder is that any progress can be made with such cumbersome foot apparel. Yet everyone, even the smallest child, gets on without inconvenience. The poorest people wear the straw sandals, which cost but a trifle, and are slipped on in the same way.

Of course these foot coverings, of all kinds, are removed when one enters a house or shop. No well-bred Japanese would think of entering a building with sandals on any more than he would of walking on a table. For the floor is the table in nearly all homes, and it is kept carefully clean.

Three Classes in Olden Days.

In older days the people of Japan were divided into three main classes, the samurai, who were the fighting class, the yeomen of the daimyos or lords; the farmers, who were the main and honored support of the nation; and the tradesmen, who were regarded with little consideration as belonging to a lower and disfavored group. Then of course lower still were the coolies, common toilers, beggars and outcasts.

With the advent of new ideas, as the result of the revolution which placed the late emperor upon the throne in 1868, after a long period of usurpation by the shoguns, and inaugurated the "Meiji Era," these conditions have greatly changed. The samurai have ceased to be a separate class, though many of the military ideals still survive. The farmers have sunk relatively, and their lot is much harder, with the heavy taxes they are obliged to pay. While the tradesman has come to his own, as in other lands, though he has not as yet wholly escaped the reputation or even the characteristics which made him disesteemed in the old days. Business ethics are not ideal in Japan. But the Japanese is keenly sensitive to the opinion of the world, and he will not fail to repair those faults of behavior, either as an individual or a nation, which cause him to "lose face" with the other peoples of the world.

Marvels in Artistry.

Of the artistic qualities of the Japanese everyone who knows them speaks with enthusiasm. Their work in carving, iron, bronze, laquer, silk weaving and embroidery, bamboo weaving and other arts is famous. Even in the common utilities they are artistic. The roadways and railroads are everywhere banked up with stone walls of diagonal tessalated form which is in itself a work of art.

But most of all do they achieve marvels with their flowers and trees. The cultivation of these is one of the Japanese fine arts. They have a way of making trees that are ordinarily of forest size grow into dwarfed, yet perfectly symmetrical forms, in which trunks and branches and leaves are perfect, only reduced to the size of a green-house plant. The result is astonishing, and it forms one of the most diverting types of gardening.

What the Japanese people have not yet learned, as a race, is that the moral life is the great work of art. A people cannot be truly artistic till it becomes sensitive to the hardships to which womanhood is reduced, in fields and on highways; and to the fact that human life and character are worth more than palaces, temples and museums. This lesson the western nations are learning also, and Japan, with its quickness of imitation, its cleverness of appropriation, and its keen sensitiveness to what the western world is saying and thinking about it, may be trusted to learn and master it in due time.

"Christocentric!"

From a Sermon by C. F. Aked

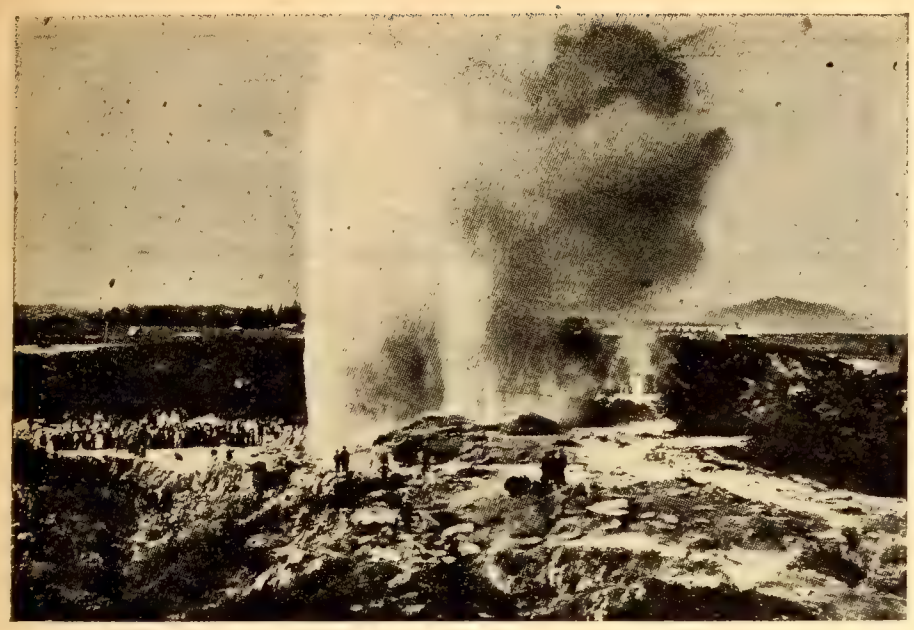
Christocentric! Does the word sound eccentric? And does the thing intended seem eccentric? And are you one who will consider Christocentricity another, if a nobler, form of eccentricity, or perhaps not even noble, but merely foolish in the end?

Well, you know the meaning of the words you use, else you would not use them! What does "eccentric" mean? The dictionary says, "Not having the same center as another." And is that all? For that is true; these men move with a motion which is not from self as the center of their universe. It is Christ who lives in them. "Eccentricity," it is clear from our definition, is no fixed and determinate quality. It is relative to the position of the person who so describes it. Who told you that you are so much wiser than your neighbor that it may be taken as a thing of course that your center is the true center, and motion from any other is "eccentric"? Madness can only be defined when you have first established a standard of rationality. One Christocentric soul went through life and went to his martyr death declaring that either Christianity justified the utmost degree of enthusiasm or it justified no regard at all, and for himself he was willing to count all things and life itself but loss for Africa and Christ. Doubtless he was mad. But then, what is sanity? I agree with Dr. John Watson:

"Place a dozen cold-blooded and hard-headed men in a Salvation Army meeting when the army is on fire, and they will think of bedlam. Take half a dozen Salvation soldiers to the bourse of Paris when there is a crisis in European affairs, and the Salvation men will be aghast. If any one believes that the kingdom of God will remain when this world has disappeared like a shadow, then he is right to fling away all that he possesses, and himself too, for its advancement and victory."

So, I repeat, it depends on your standard of sanity. While John Wesley, and Whitefield, and Charles Wesley were preaching Christ to thousands, so that down the grimy cheeks of colliers fresh from the pit-mouth tears of contrition flowed, heathenism reigned in low places and rank profligacy in high, clergymen stirred up the mob to riot, and archbishops encouraged the king in vice. Somebody certainly was mad. But was it the men whom the wits of Oxford nicknamed the "Holy Club?" While Charles II. sported with Nell Gwynne in the palace of Whitehall, John Bunyan in a filthy den in Bedford jail dreamed immortal dreams and wrote that which has gladdened and strengthened and purified the souls of millions. I admit that somebody was mad, either king or tinker. But I don't think it was the tinker. When Luther blew a trumpet blast that shook the walls of the Jericho where Leo revelled in luxury and sin, the pope said that the shabby little monk was mad. There is no doubt he was—from Leo's point of view. But it was Leo's point of view that was mad, not Martin Luther. Perhaps this world has never seen a stranger meeting than the old palace of the Asmonean kings beheld when Christ stood before Herod. You may search the historical portrait galleries of the whole world for another such human thing as Herod, and you will have difficulty in finding him. Of him Christ spoke the only contemptuous word he ever spoke of man or beast. To this day I do not understand it. Can Christ be contemptuous of any living thing his Father made, however marred and fouled since the making? "Go and tell that fox," he said; and now the Messiah stands before the fox. Herod is a buffoon, a coward, steeped to the lips in deeds of blood and shameless vice. He has brought Christ before him as a new kind of conjuror, who would perform some miracle-tricks to amuse himself. "Go tell that fox," said Christ. One of those two that day was certainly mad. Their contemporaries, naturally, were on the side of the king. They said of Jesus, "He is beside himself." But we have not so learned Christ. And they who have kept him in their hearts and lived by the faith of the son of God sit on thrones today, judging mankind by the power of his word and the immortality of his redeeming love.

There is but one conclusion possible. Let a man be possessed by this spirit, let his whole life be so Christocentric, and I care not whether he be cultured or illiterate, millionaire or son of the soil, he will "shake the gates of hell and set up the kingdom of God on earth."



Wairoa Geyser in Action.

The White Terrace. Lost in Eruption of 1886.

New Zealand's Wonderland

By A. J. Saunders

It was a saying among the ancients: See Athens and die. Their probable meaning was—we have now seen the very best, the most wonderful; there is nothing more to see; let us away! In a limited sense, yet with a great deal of truth, that saying can be applied to the Thermal district in the North Island, New Zealand. I was talking to an American tourist on one occasion in Wellington, and I said: "Have you seen Rotorua?" "You bet I have." "What do you think of it?" "Why! It is an awful place." "What do you mean by 'awful' place?" "Well, I mean," he said, "uncanny, weird; when you see ashes and lava and sulphur everywhere; when you see boiling water and steam issuing from every crevice and hole in the ground, boiling mud, hot lakes, and geysers; why, then you think you have reached the last place on earth, the very entrance to the infernal regions. That is what I mean by an 'awful' place."

The Round Trip.

The trip which everybody makes is the celebrated Round Trip. It takes a day, and that day will never be forgotten, so full of wonder and interest is it.

It is early morning, we eat a hasty breakfast, and soon the drag and four-in-hand are at the hotel entrance calling for passengers. Our company is a very pleasant one, and as we roll along the road all strangeness disappears in the general anticipations of the day.

Just about two miles out of Rotorua is the famous Maori village, Whakarewarewa. Towering hills surround it in a semi-circle. There is a well preserved Maori Pa, that is, fortified village, here. Some of the chief guides of the district live in this place. Perhaps the most widely known is Maggie Papakura. She was present at the King's coronation in London in 1911 with a company of Maoris.

Noted for Geysers.

Whakarewarewa is noted for its geysers. Large numbers of them are in this valley. At night the shooting water, the issuing steam, the continuous noise really give one the "creeps." The principal geysers, all on the Government Reserve, are Pohutu, meaning the splasher, which throws up boiling water to a height of about sixty feet, and Wairoa. There is a strange sympathy between these phenomena. For instance, Te Horo always overflows before Pohutu plays. When the Prince of Wales' feather reaches a height of twenty feet, Pohutu may be expected to perform. Wairoa, which means in the Maori language, high column of water, when in action, sends up a mass of boiling water to a height of one hundred feet and more. It is a beautiful sight.

Te Wairoa.

On the way to Te Wairoa our coach takes us through some beautiful and typical New Zealand scenery. There is the great Tree Fern standing out so majestically. Now and again one may see the peculiar Nikan Palm, and everywhere the dense forest scrub. We pass by two beautiful lakes; beautiful, because of their strange colors. Here is the Blue Lake, so named because of the dark blue appearance of its water, and the Green Lake, just as green as the first one is blue.

Te Wairoa was the original center from which the early tourists set out to see the wonders of the Thermal district. There was a hotel, Guide Sophia's Whare (hut), and numbers of European and native homes. Today it is a dismal ruin.

Eruption in 1886.

It was in 1886 in the stillness of the night, that Mount Tarawera burst forth in sudden fury, and desolated that whole region. Nine great craters belched forth fire and molten lava and ashes, bringing death and suffering to hundreds of people. In addition to that the bottom of Lake Rotomahana was blown clean out, and its mud carried for miles. One has only to go there to see even to this day the awful desolation and ruin which that eruption brought.

Te Wairoa is nothing but a heap of ruins, though miles away from the volcano. Here is the hotel half covered up, and all stove in. There is Guide Sophia's Whare, in which she saved fifteen people on that terrific night. Here is the school master's house, completely covered, with only the top of the roof above the ground. The once beautiful Te Wairoa is no more.

Desolation and Ruin Everywhere.

Taking the government launch we go for a very pleasant ride over Lake Tarawera. The water is perfectly clear, and the precipitous hills on either side seem to rise abruptly from very deep foundations. Before us is Mount Tarawera looking grim and sullen, while on our left as far as the eye can see is awful desolation and ruin. We are now passing what once was a bright little native village. It is now buried in mud to the distance of one hundred feet.

After a short walk over lava and cinders at the foot of Tarawera we come to another water—Lake Rotomahana. It is a peculiar color, light blue, even whitish, in appearance. We board another launch for what proves to be our most wonderful experience.

White and Pink Terraces.

We are now passing the once famous terraces. Here to our right is the site of the lost White Terraces. A little farther on, and there is pointed out to us where once stood the Pink Terraces, now gone forever, buried beneath that cruel overthrow. "There can be no doubt that most of those who saw them thought the lost Pink and White Terraces the finest sight in the thermal region. They had not the grandeur of the volcanoes and the lakes, or the glorious energy of the geysers; but they were an astonishing combination of beauty of form and color, of what looked like rocky massiveness with the life and heat of water in motion. Then there was nothing else of their kind on the earth at all equal to them in scale and completeness."

Boating in Boiling Water.

Rotomahana means "warm water." Our launch speeds toward the steaming cliffs. These are hills actually on fire. Great funnels out of the solid rock belch forth boiling water and steam. The atmosphere is full of sulphur. There are scores of these blow-holes, and their report is like booming cannon. As we glide along, the guide says: "Feel the water." It is warm. "Again;" it is warmer. "Now, put your hand in;" you may do it once, but not a second time. The water is boiling. The steaming cliffs at Rotomabana, and that cruise through boiling water is the most wonderful experience in the thermal district. This place is as suggestive of the infernal regions as anything on earth.

A Black Geyser.

An interesting walk of two or three miles brings us to the Waimangu Basin. This was the greatest geyser of the district, throwing huge rocks, boiling black mud and water a distance of 1,500 feet into the air. But unfortunately Waimangu has not played for several years. The genial host at Waimangu House treats us to a refreshing cup of tea, and from here we again take our coach, and finally reach Rotorua, tired, but with experiences of some of earth's wonders whose pictures in our memories shall never fade away.

MODERN WOMANHOOD

Conducted by Mrs. Ida Withers Harrison.

Mrs. Harrison will be glad to receive communications from any of her readers offering suggestions concerning woman's welfare, criticisms of articles or inquiries concerning any matters relevant to her department. She should be addressed directly at 530 Elm Tree Lane, Lexington, Ky.

A CHAT WITH CHICAGO'S STORY LADY

Miss Georgene Faulkner Talks About her Work and the Art of Story Telling.

That all the world loves a story, from the tiniest child at its mother's knee to the old man in the corner by the fire, we know full well, but it was not until recent years that we learned that story telling could become a beautiful art and a distinguished profession. The honor of raising story telling to this high position belongs to a young Chicago woman, Miss Georgene Faulkner of Kenwood, who is known everywhere as one of the best story tellers in this country. She is, in fact, a story-telling genius for she can tell stories in such a way that her audience, no matter what their age, color, creed or nationality, sits entranced and fascinated beyond expression. They simply lose themselves while listening to her and become little children with imaginations that absorb her stories as a sponge does water.

Her love for stories began when she was just a baby, listening with her ten little brothers and sisters to "mother's stories" at bed time. As she grew older she would have all the children in the neighborhood come over to her yard and climbing up in an old willow tree, with a well worn fairy book in her hand, she would take them all far away to fairy land and its "castles strong," "fair ladies," "brave knights," and "prancing steeds." Sometimes they would all dress up and act out their best loved fairy tales, using an old lace curtain for a wedding veil and discarded shawls for fine court trains.

Back of the Yards.

After a while, of course, these children grew up and could not play at fairy tales any more. The brave knights had to battle in the work day world and the fair ladies became mothers with little children of their own to tell fairy tales to. Some of them may have forgotten their story hours together, but Miss Faulkner never could forget them, so after she graduated from the Kenwood Institute and the Chicago Kindergarten College she went to Brooklyn and for three years told stories to the children in the play centers of that city. She is now engaged by the Board of Education of Chicago to tell fairy stories to the children of the vacation schools, which position means, by the way, that she is the only paid corporation story-teller in the world. For five years the library committee of the Chicago Woman's Club has been sending her once a week over to the play center in Davis Square, back of the Stock Yards, to tell stories. Her audiences there are the children of the slums but they crowd around her and forget the dingy tenements, the dark alleys and the foul streets, as they listen with open mouths to her tales of storyland. Her audiences, however, are just the same everywhere she is entertaining them, whether it is in the slums, a millionaire's home, a fashionable club house, a Sunday-school or a Chautauqua gathering—she always receives an ovation. She has recently been made the children's editor of the Chicago Tribune and president of the Chicago branch of the National Story-Tellers' League, which has 150 members who have specialized in literature for children. Society girls who want to work among the children in their social settlements, are trained by Miss Faulkner, teachers in the public school who wish to bring their children closer to the vital forms in history and literature, and Sunday-school teachers who wish to make their Bible stories more attractive. This fall the trained nurses in the Children's Memorial Hospital began a course with her which will help them in their care of little sick children.

Joy in Her Work.

"I love to tell stories," says Miss Faulkner, "I love to play them out too and dress in costume. I cannot tell the joy which has come to me in telling stories to large groups of children in the play grounds of New York, and later to the children in the vacation schools and play grounds and library centers of Chicago. I would rather tell children stories than act tragedies before applauding multitudes of grown-ups. There is no acting so perfect that it can effect mature minds as a story well told will the minds of children. As I speak to them I read in their faces the glow of all the human emotions contained in the subject matter of the story. I have seen hundreds of children weep at the homely story of the poor ginger bread boy who is eaten out of existence, and I have seen little boys straighten up with the light of conquest and majesty in their eyes at the narration of kings and soldiers. Every child loves a story. I think that a story is the most potent force that can be applied to a child for good or evil. The child's mind is receptive and is susceptible to the influence of a story in which they can see the characters in life-like form. I have known children to yield to the attractions of a story where spankings, pleadings and threats had not availed. All children love hero stories, but the boys, of course, care most for them. The boys want the stories of battles, but I always try to make the personality of the hero rise above the fighting. The Russian children clamor after the historical tale and their country's mystical monster, the baba-yaga. Trolls and elves interest the Norwegian tots, and the German boys, with all their stolidity, long not only for the historical combat, but for dragons and witches. But the girl is the prophecy of the woman. She sighs ecstatically over the awakening of Brunhild with the lover's kiss. Always there must be the good prince who comes to carry the ragged little maiden into wealth and happiness; always there must be the home element, the jewels, fine clothes and great houses."

Interesting Experiences.

"My experiences? I have had loads of them. Once in New York I heard a little Scandinavian girl, "Solveig," singing these words,

"My countries 'tis of thee-ee
Swate land off libertee-ee
Off thee aye sing
Land-t where maye fadders diedt
Land-t of the pigeon pies.

"It was not until then that I realized that the parrot-like declaration of love for the flag, the flag drill, and singing of patriotic songs meant absolutely nothing to these children, who had come to me uprooted from the traditions of their own country, and had as yet been given nothing to take the place in the new. To interest these wee immigrants, I thought of the old story tellers—the men and women who with the ages were the transmitters of amusement, history and religion. Why not revive the custom for these people who came so strangely to a strange land, who in their simplicity were as primitive as the ancestors who sat about the camp-fire and the hearthstone and listened to the long-spun yarns of the ages? I made a systematic study of the heroes of the countries, men whose deeds had had a direct bearing on the history of America. When I put the theory into practice I found a boy who was Henty mad. "Gimme a Henty," he said one day, "I am sorry," I replied, "the Henty books are all out. Won't something else do?" "Naw," answered the boy, "I want a Henty or nothing." "Well, now," I said, "you liked the stories I told you today, here is one on the same thing I was talking to you about," and handed him Charles Carleton Coffin's, "Story of the Battle of Long Island." The boy took the book with the farewell remark, "Aw right, but save me a Henty for next week." In a few days he was back again. "Say, missus," he said, "gimme some more by the same guy. He's got Henty skinned to the ground." The boy read in succession all the historical works he could find. Over at Davis Square not long ago I was giving one of my little travel tales and exhibiting with the stereopticon some pictures Mr. Elmendorf had loaned the Board of Education. At a picture of the Vatican a little boy began to laugh at some of the beautiful statues. When I took him aside afterward and asked him why he had been making fun he answered, "'Cause you dast show a picture of a guy widout his shirt." I was glad later to take some of these children to the Art Institute and show them how wonderful and glorious a noble statue really is. I had been telling some stories of Lincoln and Washington when a little Bohemian woman wandered up holding by her hand a small Bohemian boy. "Missus," she said, "I liked all your stories, but I like that man Lincoln best." "You do," I answered. "And why, Washington was brave and good, too." "Yes," she said, "but Lincoln was a poor boy, what had no chanst, but he got there jest the same," and she looked down at her own bit of a boy with a new hope in her eyes."

—Miss Violet Asquith, daughter of the Prime Minister of England, has sailed for home, after a visit of two weeks in New York and Washington. The Countess of Aberdeen sailed with Miss Asquith.

—Miss Roxanna Hill is the youngest woman deputy sheriff in Illinois if not in the United States. She became 18 several days ago and was sworn in as a deputy by William A. Patterson, sheriff of Livingston County. Now she is performing all the duties required of an office deputy in handling official business.

—Miss Margaret McChord has introduced into Washington society the color "Nell rose," which was named and taken as her favorite hue by Miss Eleanor Wilson, the youngest daughter of President-elect Wilson.

—Mrs. Jennie Wilson Woodbridge, a first cousin of President-elect Wilson, and wife of the Rev. Samuel I. Woodbridge, of Shanghai, China, a Presbyterian missionary, died in Johns Hopkins Hospital last week.

—Mrs. Duncan U. Fletcher, wife of the senator from Florida, is generally believed in congressional circles to be the probable successor of Mrs. Roberts of Massachusetts as the president of the Congressional Club. Mrs. Fletcher's candidacy is a part of a movement to elect a senator's wife to the presidency which has hitherto been held by the wife of a member of the lower House of Congress.

—Mrs. Edyth Ellerbeck Read, member of the lower house of the Utah legislature, died last week from nervous prostration. She was elected on the republican ticket at the last election.

RESIGNATIONS.

G. A. Reinhart, Ionia, Mich.

Enid, Okla., church house was dedicated Jan. 26 by Geo. L. Snively.

O. C. Bolman, pastor at Pekin, Ill., spoke to over 100 boy scouts at Streator, Ill., on "Scoutcraft."

Pontiac, Ill., church pledged nearly $2,000 on a recent Sunday to pay an old debt. B. W. Tate is the pastor.

Owosso, Mich., church, C. R. Wolford, pastor, reports 18 accessions during 1912 and $2338 raised for all purposes.

Central Church, Peoria, talks of a fund of $50,000 for a new church home to replace the one recently destroyed by fire.

Jefferson Street Church, Buffalo, N. Y., Benj. S. Ferrall, pastor, reports congregational offerings of over $5,000 for 1912, and 111 additions to the church membership.

St. James Street Church, Boston, burned a mortgage of $2,000 recently. The debt was paid under the stimulus of a friend of the church who pledged one-half provided the other half was raised. Louis H. Stine is pastor.

Mrs. T. R. Ayars, president of the Christian Hospital, St. Louis, reports a prosperous and fruitful year for that institution. Twelve hundred and thirteen patients were admitted during the year. The receipts amounted to $27,991.

The College of Missions, Indianapolis, opened the doors of Graham Chapel to the public to hear Dr. I. N. McCash in a series of six addresses on American Missions. The attendance was large and the lectures were pronounced masterful.

Orange. Calif., church, C. C. Bentley, pastor, reports ninety-two accessions during the past year with forty-two baptisms. For current expenses the offerings of the congregation amounted to $2,861.89; for missions $742.21; for building fund $134.50.

C. W. Cauble, pastor at Martinsville, Ind., has offered his services to the Indiana state work, without pay, proposing to raise $5,000 from the churches in order to realize on Mr. M. T. Reeves' proposition to duplicate such an amount or any part of it that may be raised.

Several of our English churches are now without pastors. Leslie W. Morgan, Wringcliff, Priory Road, Hornsey, London, writes that these churches would be willing to consider American applicants who desire to settle in England, and he underscores the word "settle."

Following his "Midwinter Chautauqua" in Kansas City Prof. Walter Athearn, religious education instructor in Drake University, accepted an invitation to conduct an institute in Manhattan, Kan., under the auspices of the ministers' union, and the united Sunday-school teachers of the city.

Dr. J. H. Garrison, editor emeritus of the Christian Evangelist, is spending the winter and early spring in New Mexico and southern California. Dr. Garrison has been able to do a young man's stint of work on the paper for the past few months. He simply won't be retired! All his brethren are grateful for his good health and superabundant service.

A neat compliment was that paid to a local colleague, and deservedly bestowed, when Edgar De Witt Jones invited Milo Atkinson, pastor Centennial Church of Bloomington, Ill., to lecture in First Church auditorium, and gathered a fine audience to hear him. Mr. Jones introduced the lecturer, whose popular theme was "Love's Old Sweet Song with Variations."

H. A. Denton, pastor at Galesburg, Ill., is leading his church in preparation for an evangelistic meeting beginning on Easter Sunday. Mr. Denton will preach throughout the meeting. He reassures his people by promising them that there will be no personal solicitation during the singing of the "invitation hymn."

S. G. Buckner reports that his work at Somerset, Pa., is very promising. During the four months since he took that work the Sunday-school has doubled and now averages 400, and 125 men have enrolled in his men's class. Prayer meetings are running as high as 200, and evening audiences are reaching the 1,000 mark. The Somerset church has the finest plant in its section of Pennsylvania.

The second annual Workers' Conference of the Christian churches of Tipton County, L. E. Murray, Garry L. Cook, J. C. Todd and Mrs. Greist are expected to be present and participate in the leadership of the conference. The aim of this annual conference is to promote the efficiency of the local churches in their community life and in their co-operative work.

P. C. Macfarlane spoke in Central Church, New York City, J. M. Philputt, pastor, on Sunday evening, January 26. This is the first of four special Sunday evening services the pastor has planned After the service a social hour is held in the church parlors that the congregation, many of whom are alone and strangers in that great city, may make friends and acquaintances.

Prof. E. E. Snoddy will lecture at Bethany Assembly in Indiana next summer, on "Life in the Making;" R. H. Miller will speak each day of the first week on "Church Efficiency;" J. W. Street will lecture and conduct discussions on "The Country and Village Church Situation;" P. H. Welshimer will give four addresses. W. T. Brooks will have charge of a two and a half day evangelistic conference. Garry L. Cook and Mrs. Frank Wells will conduct the School of Methods and Missions.

H. O. Pritchard is well into the sixth year of his pastorate at Bethany, Nebr., and reports 695 additions to the church membership during his pastorate, with a net gain of 410. Fifty-seven were added during 1912. The Sunday-school now enrolls 610 pupils and the church 835 members. In 1912 the congregational offerings amounted to $3,673 for current expenses, $2,632 for missions and a total from all departments for all purposes of $8,964. The missionary spirit has been developed and refined greatly during Mr. Pritchard's ministry.

First Church, Bloomington, Ill., is entering a winter and spring campaign of much activity and promise. Early in March, Miss Eva Lemert comes to lead the church in a two months' Sunday-school campaign. The first week in April, Dr. Peter Ainslie of Baltimore, will begin a series of three weeks' decision services. The pastor Edgar DeWitt Jones is now in the midst of a series of evening sermons on the First Five Books of the Bible and so great is the interest in these studies that he may prolong the series through February.

Alfred O. Kuhn, pastor at Salina, Kan., officiated at the ordination to the ministry of Lee Woodward, a student in Drake University.

First Church, Youngstown, O., Levi G. Batman pastor, raised close to $7,000 last year, of which amount over $1,400 was for missions and benevolence.

The fourteen year old daughter of Pastor and Mrs. S. W. Nay of Central Church, Gary, Ind., died recently. The funeral was the occasion for a great expression of sympathy on the part of the community.

Dr. T. P. Haley, Kansas City's Bishop, Gone.

Word is received that the venerable Dr. T P. Haley, a bishop indeed for all Kansas City, passed beyond on Saturday last. The funeral services were held at Linwood Boulevard Church which he founded and of which he has been pastor-emeritus since resigning active leadership, and were conducted by Dr. Burris A. Jenkins, present pastor of the church, assisted by many pastors of Kansas City. Doctor Jenkins has promised The Christian Century an interpretation of Doctor Haley which will be given to our readers next week.

Values Children in Evangelistic Growth.

Charles W. Ross, who recently conducted an evangelistic meeting in his own parish of Litchfield, Ill., writes concerning the twenty-five children who made profession of faith, that they were all members of the Sunday-school and were ready for decision. "I am glad for the heads of families who came," he says, "but I believe that the Church of tomorrow is the one that is reaching the young people of today. In the long run, I wonder if these are not the most valuable and far-reaching results of our meeting." There were fifty adult persons gained for the church in the meeting.

Sunday School Institute in Local Church.

The church at Massillon, O., had an increase of over 240 in its membership during the past year. Offerings were made to the various missionary and benevolent interests. The Sunday-school has maintained its front-rank standing. An institute for mutual instruction and training was organized having five classes—training for service (beginners and advanced), missionary, social service and history. In the class in social service practical investigation is being undertaken. The church has maintained the Lyceum course of the city for three years. This year H. E. Stafford, the pastor, has induced the Ministerial Association to take charge of it. with the result that a larger course is being put on and more people are being reached.

A Veteran Minister's Passing.

Joseph Lowe, a veteran minister of 78 years, died at Topeka, Kan., Jan. 20. He was born in Greensburg, Ind., and was ordained a minister in the Christian church at McComb, Ill., in 1858. He held pastorates in Illinois, Minnesota, Nebraska, Missouri, California and Texas. In 1893 he went to the Pacific coast and remained there until 1905, being for a part of that time pastor of the East Side church of Los Angeles. His last ministry was at Goliad, Tex., from which place he returned to Kansas City about a year ago. During his fifty-four years' active ministry in the Christian church Mr. Lowe had administered the ordinance of baptism to more than 5,000 people. Funeral services were conducted by George H. Combs, pastor of Independence Boulevard church, Kansas City.

Vigorous Chicago Church's Active Year.

Jackson Boulevard church, Chicago, closed the year with a substantial balance in the treasury having raised $8,316 of which $1,140 was for missions. "There has never been a day since I have been with this church." says Pastor Austin Hunter, "that we have not had a balance in the treasury. There were 164 additions to the church during the year, 99 of these being by confession and baptism. These were all brought in at our regular services without any special series of evangelistic meetings. We continue the support of Miss Ora Haight as our livink link missionary in India. Our Chinese school reported nine baptisms during the year and fifty dollars given to missions. Our Sunday-school, under the fine leadership of O. G. Harris, is in the Front Rank column. We begin the New Year with a fine spirit of unity and hopefulness."

Dedicatory Week at Metropolitan Church.

This is "dedicatory work" at Metropolitan Church, People's Institute, Chicago. Dr. Charles Reign Scoville and his corps of evangelistic helpers are present to begin a revival next week. This week's services include addresses by S. S. Laffin, editor the Christian Standard, J. H. O. Smith of First Church, Oklahoma City, Charles S. Medbury of Des Moines, Iowa, and the resident pastor, J. D. Hull. The People's Institute was purchased recently by Metropolitan Church for $35,000. The property was built at a cost of $80,000 some twenty years ago. Considerable remodeling has been done and the place is said to be extraordinarily well adopted for institutional church purposes. This building was the rented abode of the Union Christian Church fifteen years ago during the pastorate of J. H. O. Smith.

Rev. Elster M. Haile, New Pastor at Monroe Street Church, Chicago.

Evangelist Asks Opinions of Business Men.

William J. Lockhart, the evangelist, addressed a letter to a number of prominent business men of Marshalltown, Ia., where he is holding a meeting, asking concerning the attitude of men toward the church. The letter follows: "Dear Sir: I am to be in your community for a time yet laboring in the interest of the moral and religious welfare of the community. In order to make the work definite and practical I am asking a considerable number of the representative men of the city, of whom you are one, to answer the two following questions. Please be perfectly rfank and right to the point. While your reply will be read publicly, your name will be held in strict confidence. First: Why in your opinion do not more men attend church and why do they hesitate to join the church? Second: What do you believe could be done to interest them more?" Replies were intended to be read at a subsequent service.

Discuss Central Headquarters for Societies.

At a recent meeting of the National Secretaries, a committee composed of Mrs. M. E. Harlan, Geo. W. Muckley, Stephen J. Corey, Robert M. Hopkins and W. R. Warren, was appointed to consider the question of a general headquarters' building for all our National Societies. Most of the societies are now compelled to pay heavy rents for quarters that are not only inadequate for the work, but unsafe for the records. They are scattered through four cities with no two in the same building. If all were assembled in one suitable building, it is felt that safety and facility would be secured, with the maximum of work for the minimum of expense. At the same time, the building might be such a structure as to perpetually proclaim the plea. W. R. Warren, chairman of the committe says that suggestions as to the location and character of the building will be gladly received. The committee is, of course. merely making a preliminary investigation, having no power to act.

Finds Prophet in Its Own Country.

Monroe Street Church, Chicago, after struggling for a year with a list of nearly one hundred candidates for its pulpit, including ministers located in all parts of the country, has finally found its prophet in its own country. The parish of West End mission church joins the parish of Monroe Street Church. Elster M. Haile has been minister at the West End for several months. Monroe Street people learned of his sturdy, plucky work against many obstructions and asked him to come into their parish, investigate conditions and say whether he would be their leader. He did so, and decided to undertake the work. He has already begun. His call is a compliment to him and a token of the good sense of the congregation. Mr. Haile graduated from Texas Christian University, studied at the University of Chicago, and was president of Hereford College in Texas before returning to Chicago determined to do Christian work in this city. Monroe Street Church has many difficulties, but its membership is united and loyal, and enthusiastic over the new pastor.

Denver Church Propagating Unity Ideals.

George B. Van Arsdall. pastor of Central Church, Denver, preached on a recent Sunday morning on "A Cure for Melancholia" and that same evening on "A Cure for Discouragement." Central Church conducts a training school for church workers of which Mr. Van Arsdall is the head and Dr. Frank Rall of Iliff School of Theology (Methodist) is dean. It is largely attended by representatives of all denominations. Eight denominations of the city recently united in a "Christian Union Propaganda" anticipating somewhat the suggestion of group meetings for the study of our fundamental unity made by the Episcopal commission and printed in this paper on page 3. Bishop McConnell for the Methodists, Dr. Robert F. Coyle for the Presbyterians, Dr. Frank T. Bayley for the Congregationalists, Dr. John H. Houghton for the Episcopalians, Dr. B. B. Tyler for the Disciples and Dr. A. H. C. Morse for the Baptists were among the speakers at successive Sunday afternoon services. The meetings were held in Central Church.

Pastor Approves Minimum Wage Scale.

J. M. Rudy preached to a crowded house at First Church, Quincy, Ill., on "Labor Unions." Among those present were many laboring men who were at that time out on strike. Mr. Rudy affirmed the vital importance of the minimum wage scale. "How many medical associations," asked Mr. Rudy, "care to have the wage scale that they have agreed on broken down? How many preachers care to have their salaries brought down to the starvation level? There are few people, indeed, who have any very deep or keen appreciation of the importance of our working men maintaining unbroken a minimum scale of wages. Let me ask you, what would be the profit to this community if 300 tramps were knocking at the city's doors and asking for quarters? You answer, 'no profit.' Well, suppose these 300 men got 50 cents a day, each, would they be worth any more? You say they would each be worth just 50 cents per day more. Well, suppose they received one dollar each, then your 300 men would be worth twice as much to this community. This is plain. Well, then, bring their wages up to the highest level which the principle of fair play and justice will allow, and maintan it there, and you have the labor union principle. "All the interests of society are best conserved by working men banding together for the purpose of maintaining a uniform wage scale. Let this principle be broken down among our workers, and you have opened the door for unheard of exactions from greed, and have laid the foundations for an industrial tyranny about which we know nothing at present. It is no wonder that men and women will almost starve in order to keep this great principle from being broken down."

Dr. Powell on God's Character.

The deeper question of skepticism was answered by Dr. E. L. Powell in First church, Louisville, thus:

"Is there a God? That is not the question, but if there be a God, what is He like? What is His character? What is His relation to man? The materialist asks that the proof of God be scientific. In other words, as Philip said here, in the language of the materialist of to-day: Show us the father and it sufficeth us. Well, He has not form nor shape; we cannot bring Him forth for the observation of the eye of sense, and Jesus says this, giving once for all the answer to doubt as respects the character of God, which implies, as a matter of course, the existence of God: 'He that hath seen me hath seen the Father.' 'Why,' said he to Philip, 'have I been so long a time with you and yet hast thou not known me? Do you remember the little child I took in my arms and blessed it? It was strength, loving strength, losing itself in tenderness and weakness; there you saw God at work. Do you remember, Philip, Zaccheus, the poor publican, who had lost all self-respect, how I said to him, 'Today I will abide in thy house,' and he was made conscious of a music so sweet and strong that he leaped to his feet as a self-respecting man? It was God awaking him from his dumb life into his conscious power. Have I been so long time with you, and yet hast thou not known me, Philip? Look upon me, look upon my character, look upon my ways and works, and you behold the shining of the face of God. And how else shall we interpret God except in terms of character? Better that there should be no God than that He should not be good. If any man look upon His character and call it less than divine, then there is such a thing as a smile without a face; there is such a thing as effulgence without a sun; there is such a thing as semblance without reality; there is such a thing as fragrance without a flower. My faith in God as respects His character and holiness is based upon my faith in the moral perfection exemplified in the life of Jesus Christ. 'He that hath seen Me hath seen the Father.'"

Two Most Desirable Things

One is this: the number of churches contributing to Foreign Missions in the March Offering this year should be greatly increased. Last year out of some eight thousand churches in our fellowship, not more than three thousand gave anything to the work in the regions beyond. It should go without saying that every congregation should have fellowship with Christ in what He is doing for the world's redemption. This is the one work our Lord gave His disciples to do in His name, and for His glory.

Every disciple of Christ should remember the great words of Alexander Campbell. "The Church of Christ is and ought to be a great missionary society; her field is the whole earth, from sea to sea, and from Jerusalem to the last domicile of man." A Christian community without missions and missionaries would be a solecism in creation, and a gross deviation from the order, the economy, and the government of the universe.

The churches should engage in this work for their own sake quite as much as for the world's sake. They need the inspiration and the gracious aid that can come only from loyal co-operation with our Lord in this His great work. Churches that stand aloof and refuse to do their part rob God and at the same time wrong themselves. The plea sometimes made by churches that they are too poor to give is not valid, for the scriptures teach that "there is that giveth and yet increaseth." They teach also that God is able to make all grace abound towards us, to the end that we may be able to abound in every good work.

The second desirable thing is this: this year should see a marked increase in the amounts contributed by the individual churches. The average offering should be much larger than ever before. We have great reason for encouragement from the fact that in ten years the average offering has been doubled in amount. Ten years ago the average offering was very small. Not only so, but in these ten years the resources of the churches as a whole have been more than doubled. The Lord wishes us to give as he has prospered us. There are some churches giving on that scale, but they are not numerous. Of the churches that gave last year, fifteen hundred and seven gave ten dollars or less, and six hundred and ninety-four gave five dollars or less. It would seem that there is no church

BY EDWARD SCRIBNER AMES

Is a popular statement of both the theological and practical truths centering in our evangelical faith in Christ.

It is scholarly, but not technical.

It lifts the problem of the nature and character of Christ out of the setting of the old-time dogmatism and places it in the light of the more empirical, human and meaningful thought of our own day.

Its Treatment of Unitarianism is original, fresh, illuminating. A single chapter entitled, "Why I am not a Unitarian" will furnish any reader, conservative or liberal, a new point of view.

It is glowing with religious earnestness. It is a living word spoken to the hearts and souls of living people.

Appreciations

Professor George A. Coe says: "These sermons display a remarkable union of intellectual boldness and spiritual warmth. I know of nothing else in print that brings out quite so clearly the positive religious values that can be reached by a rigorous application to Christian dogmas of the functional and valuational point of view. Even readers who cannot accept Professor Ames' position at all points must agree that such a book helps to clear the air, and to focus attention at the right point."

The Indianapolis News says: "One would go far to find a finer interpretation of religious thought and experience in terms of spiritual laws. Mr. Ames is emphatically a man with a message."

The Chicago Inter-Ocean says: "Six sermons full of broad humanity."

The Watchman says: "Professor Ames is avowedly a "liberal" in theology but his liberalism seems to be of a wholesome kind, in the sense that he is less concerned about doctrines and creeds than he is about service and the helping of people to their best life."

The Independent says: "Dr. Ames does not deny being a liberal, but strongly objects to being styled a 'Unitarian', quoting with enthusiasm a saying of one of the early leaders of his denomination: 'I am neither a Unitarian nor a Trinitarian, but strive to be simply a Christian.' The sermons are thoughtful, moderate in tone and straightforward in expression."

Unity says: "Those who were privileged to listen to these sermons must have found their spiritual natures quickened."

The Advance says: "These are strong, virile sermons, appealing to the reason and satisfying the heart."

Professor Edward C. Moore, of Harvard, says: "It is a very clear and convincing statement of the issue as it stands in the minds of modern men. It makes us realize how the old formulation of the question has become obsolete, no one any longer states the question in the old terms. Dr. Ames has availed himself in admirable fashion of the opportunity for a new statement of the case, and the spirit in which he writes must convey confidence and reassurance to all."

on earth that should give less than ten dollars, and very few that should give only ten dollars.

If a larger proportion of the membership can be enlisted, that of itself will raise the average. It is believed that in many churches not more than one-third of the enrolled membership have any part or lot in the Foreign Missionary offerings. This ought not so to be. Every one who has been baptized into Christ and who comes to His table week by week, should be ready and eager to help Him spread abroad a knowledge of His saving grace and power.

The Louisville Convention gave expression to the conviction that the Foreign Society should receive a half million dollars this year in regular receipts; this amount is to be over and above what is especially given for equipment, enlargement and maintenance. Does the sum named seem excessive? It amounts to an average of only forty cents for each member. Surely no one will say that an average of forty cents is too high! On the contrary, it would seem that it is far too low. If the Louisville watchword is to be realized the churches must give two hundred thousand dollars on the first Sunday in March.

The friends of the Lord and of His work should pray and labor to the end that these two things may be brought to pass this year. In doing so they will greatly glorify the name of our Lord. The work is His and He has honored us in admitting us into fellowship with Himself in the doing of it.

A Veteran's Dream

W. R. Warren, of the Ministerial Relief Board, sends a copy of the following letter received by the Board: "Your good brotherly letter of January 17, containing check for $30 is received, and I thank you sincerely for this second installment for this quarter. I often wish I could preach again, and bring souls to the Saviour as in years gone by, and I wonder if all old preachers feel the same. Sometimes in my dreams I am back in the good work again, and O! how blessed! But when I awake and find myself the same old ex-preacher, I have to be content with present conditions. And yet, the grat joy of my present situation is that "I have fought a good fight," and "I have finished my course," not as a money-maker, but a gatherer of sheaves in the great and all important harvest field of the Lord. Oh! what joy fills my heart in my declining years! Brethren, God bless you! Please again accept my hearts thanks."

National and State Secretaries' Meeting

ST. LOUIS, MO., MARCH 4-6.

Provisional Program.

Tuesday, March 4. How can we make our conventions more profitable? R. P. Shepherd; the Missionary Education of the Children of the Church, Robert M. Hopkins; An Improved Year Book, F. M. Rains. The Afternoon and evening is taken up with separate meetings of National and State Secretaries.

Wednesday, March 5. The Rural Church Problem, C. S. Adams, Expert Field Man from the Country Life Department of the Presbyterian Home Missionary Board; Grouping Country and Village Churches, John Wood; Our Supply of Preachers and how to locate them, I. N. McCash; The Spiritual Life of our Secretaries, A. McLean; Church Plans and the Construction of Church Buildings for Religious and Social Life, G. W. Kramer, Church Architect, New York City; Evening—The Relation of the C. W. B. M. to the Women's Classes in the Bible School, Mrs. M. E. Harlan; Definite Standards of Education for Mission Workers at Home and Abroad, Prof. Paul.

Thursday, March 6. Is there Really a Shortage of Ministers? Training the Church and Pastor for Long Service Together, B. A. Abbott; A Uniform Church Letter System, O. G. W. Dean.

Fifteen minutes is allowed for each paper which is to open the discussion of each subject. The meeting will be held at the Marquette Hotel, St. Louis, Mo., on 18th St.. three blocks from the Union Station. Railroad rates will be pooled, so that no secretary pays more than another.

Program Committee: G. W. Muckley, Chairman, Mrs. M. E. Harlan, Grant K. Lewis, Geo. E. Lyon.

Park Avenue church, Knoxville, Tenn., is to build a $40,000 edifice. J. L. Keevil is pastor.

Jefferson City, Mo., church is especially proud of its Ladies' Aid Society, which earned $1,600 for local work last year.

President H. B. Brown, of Valparaiso University, has been seriously ill since last September, having been stricken while in New York at that time. He is gradually regaining his strength and is expected to be at his work again in a few months.

Dr. Burris A. Jenkins, pastor Linwood Boulevard Church, Kansas City, has been kept from his pulpit for nearly six weeks by an affection of the knee which caused serious concern. He spent the last ten days of January in a Chicago hospital and received treatment by Dr. Murphy who reassures his patient as to the more serious fears previously entertained and has allowed him to return home. Doctor Jenkins' stay in the hospital was shortened a few days by the news concerning Doctor Haley's death.

Ten Big Reasons Why

BETHANY GRADED LESSONS are being adopted by so many of the best schools among Disciples

1. There is more to them—at least a third more—than is contained in any other series.
2. They are rich, vital and full of suggestion to teacher and pupil.
3. They are free from the sectarian spirit.
4. They are soundly and fervently evangelical.
5. They are truly artistic in all their illustrations.
6. They are printed on better paper with better binding and in better taste than any other series.
7. Every lesson writer is an expert of interdenominational reputation.
8. They are a monumen. to the modern spirit of unity—a dozen leading denominations have co-operated to produce them and are now using them.
9. The Disciples possess full editorial rights, through the editor. Charles Clayton Morrison.
10. Every Disciple school that uses them participates in and promotes a great Christian union enterprise.

EVERY QUARTER ADDS TO THE NUMBER OF SCHOOLS INTRODUCING THESE LESSONS.

THE LIFE WORK OF THOMAS P. HALEY

BY BURRIS A. JENKINS

CHICAGO

Disciples Publication Society

THE DISCIPLES PUBLICATION SOCIETY is a corporation chartered under the laws of Illinois. It is organized for the purpose of publishing books, Sunday School literature and a weekly religious newspaper. It has no capital stock. Its profits are not to go to individuals but to be appropriated to advance the cause of religious education, especially the higher education of the Christian ministry. The term "religious education" is regarded as an ideal common to Sunday Schools, missionary societies, colleges, seminaries and universities, and other organizations that promote Christian progress through Christian education. The Society through its trustees has purchased the entire assets and good will of the New Christian Century Company (including the subscription list and good will of The Christian Century; a contract of participation in the interdenominational syndicate for publishing the Bethany Graded Lessons; a contract of membership in the United Religious Press; all books, Sunday School supplies and other stock on hand; all accounts and bills receivable; besides assuming liability for all accounts and bills payable), for $16,000 and has executed its notes to that amount which have been accepted by the stock-holders of the New Christian Century Company in payment for their property. To provide capital for enlarging the business the trustees are issuing 5 per cent bonds in the amount of $50,000, retirable after five years, to be sold to persons interested in the ideals of The Christian Century. It is believed at the present time that not more than $25,000 of these bonds need be sold in order to put the Society on a sound profit earning basis. Subscriptions for the purchase of these bonds are now being solicited by C. C. Morrison and H. L. Willett, editors of The Christian Century. During Dr. Willett's absence in the Orient correspondence may be addressed exclusively to Mr. Morrison. Full information as to all details will be given upon inquiry. The essential purpose of the transaction and proposals herein described is to provide a way for the general brotherhood of the Disciples of Christ to buy The Christian Century and its publishing house and to pay for them by patronizing them. The bonds and notes are to be retired out of the profits earned by the Society. The purchasers of bonds, therefore, will stand, with the holders of notes, in the position of sustainers or supporters of the enterprise while the brotherhood's patronage is paying for it and increasing its value. The question of defining the membership of the Disciples Publication Society is still open, and upon it the organizers will be glad to receive suggestions. It is the purpose to make it thoroughly democratic and representative. The five trustees named by the charter will act for the Society until the basis of membership has been determined and the members elected.

THE EDITORS' CORRESPONDENCE

A friend writing concerning his subscription to the bonds of the Disciples Publication Society asks whether there have been secured in advance a number of "good sized subscriptions to be sprung at the psychological moment." He alludes to the methods often employed in "dedicating" a church building—many of the larger sums being pledged in advance of the day of dedication, and announced at the proper time in the service so as to stimulate other giving.

This friend has been written plainly that there has been no such provision made for carrying through the present enterprise. And lest there may be others who assume that the organizers of the Society have something "up their sleeve," it is desirable to say frankly to all our readers and friends what was said to this good friend in our personal letter.

The editors of The Christian Century are laying the case before the Disciples' brotherhood as a whole. It was recognized that a plan such as this would gain favor by frank publicity and discussion. It was desired that the support should come as a sort of precipitate of public sentiment, spontaneously, from many rather than from a few; and it was believed that the enterprise would be more firmly established if its support was gained in this way than if the appeal for support had been privately presented to a selected few.

Except the small part that we are able to do ourselves—which part we intend to do to the extent of our ability—no pledges were secured for the enterprise in advance of its first announcement.

The whole matter lies in our mind somewhat after this fashion: We believe that The Christian Century and its ideals are vitally important to the work of the Disciples of Christ. We believe that there are others of our brethren who hold this same conviction. We believe that their interest in the maintenance and development of The Christian Century is more than sentimental. We know that without their help we will be unable to develop the paper past the modest position it has now attained. We believe that if they are frankly informed of this fact they will answer with substantial aid. We believe that those who cannot themselves invest money will take an active and hearty interest in enlisting friends who can invest money. We believe that the public ownership and control of the paper and its house rests the obligation upon the conscience of every man or woman who, like ourselves, feels the importance of the principles to which the paper and house are consecrated. We therefore believe that a fair presentation of our cause is all that is necessary to enlist their co-operation.

A generous brother in sending us his subscription for $300 worth of bonds says:

"You will have my sympathy and prayers while you are engaged in this work. I know it cannot help being a distasteful feature to you; but it is a work of great importance, which will be your inspiration."

Yes, this task is anything but to our "taste." We feel about it much as Woodrow Wilson feels about his office-appointing junction, that it is a "hateful duty." Not less than our aversion to the personal soliciting of funds is our dislike of using a single column of the valuable space of The Christian Century for the promotion of the enterprise. But there are compensations. On the personal side there is the word of encouragement offered by our correspondent in which he bids us keep in mind the inspiring end toward which the present task points. And as for the use of a little of our space for promoting this cause, we are impressed with the fact that, quite apart from the money campaign, the discussion is valuable as a campaign of education in journalistic ideals. We believe our readers will be more clearly and definitely committed to The Christian Century as a result of the interpretation of its principles which the present campaign compels us to make explicit.

Here is a letter from a young man, a student in one of our colleges. He has been reading The Christian Century for three years and says that he hesitates to be ordained to the Disciples' ministry until he sees whether the Disciples are "the Christian Century kind or some other kind." "If there is not enough interest in true Christian unity among us to support the Disciples Publication Society," he says, "I cannot help having misgivings as to my success in the Disciples' ministry." And then he adds, reflectively, "But I do not see where else I could find true fellowship for my convictions if I cannot find it among the Disciples."

This is not an extraordinary letter for us to receive. Young ministers are telling us constantly that their hopes for the principles of Thomas Campbell are lodged in The Christian Century. It is not infrequently that letters are received saying that the very existence of the "Century" has been the means of keeping their writers in the Christian ministry.

To report these things is not to boast. Letters like these humble us. The responsibility that they lay upon us awes us. We would not encourage the young man to defer his ordination until he knows the fate of the Disciples Publication Society. But it is important that our readers and friends shall perceive by such tokens as these letters that the question before us is not simply that of the perpetuation of a newspaper—that is quite unimportant—but the perpetuation and realization of the cause, the movement, of which The Christian Century is the organ and symbol.

CHARLES CLAYTON MORRISON,
700 E. 40th Street, Chicago.

I am interested in doing what I can to aid you and Dr. Willett in your plan for firmly establishing The Christian Century in the ownership and control of the Disciples. Kindly send me additional information. How long do the bonds extend? In what financial condition does the new Society begin business? Can you accept payment for bonds on the installment plan or must you have immediate cash for entire amount subscribed?

Why We Celebrate David Livingstone

NOT BECAUSE he lies within Westminster Abbey, perhaps the only ordained Congregational minister who rests within those walls. We are not prouder of Livingstone's honored grave than of the dishonored graves of other and older Independents. Honored and dishonored alike have gone down in history as the champions of freedom and the foes of oppression. But this man drew no sword and fired no shot. He fought and won his desperate battle against immeasurable odds with the sword of the Spirit, which is the Word of God.

We celebrate his fame for many reasons. It is good in these days of wasting luxury to emphasize the noble product of a poor, simple and pious home, where there were more sacrifices than shillings, and where education had to be fought for and saved for and stinted for; where it was accounted a greater prize to buy a book than to see a football match, and where the extension of the Kingdom of God was a far more real and intense interest than what was "on" at a theatre. It is worth remembering that no home life and no home training can ever be narrow where the vision includes God and humanity, and where the governing ideals are of sacrifice and service, not for one land only, but for the world.

It is good to remember, also, what fateful destinies may rest upon a single decision for Christ. The decision on which the liberation of millions and the evangelization of a continent depended was made within the atmosphere of a very small independent church. It was just the heart-whole decision of loyalty to the Saviour which is the highest choice any of us can make and the best thing any of us can ever do. It will be no purpose of ours to deny, or to disguise, the effects produced upon him by other influences in the course of his eventful and adventurous life. But nobody who reads his life-story can doubt for a moment that this first, deep, memorable decision made Livingstone. This it was that gave us Livingstone as we know him. It was that Lord and Leader to whom he gave himself in his young manhood; and to whom, in the silence of that hut at Ilala, he surrendered his soul.

On his gravestone,, in the Abbey, he is commemorated as "Missionary, Traveler, and Philanthropist." We do not understand that he began as a missionary and ended as a philanthropist, or that there was a time when he was merely a traveler and nothing more, but it is right to put the word missionary first; for he was that always and everywhere. There were those who would have persuaded him to put his missionary work into the background, and on the principle of art for art's sake, science for science's sake, would have had him a discoverer and geographer and a botanist, simply for the sake of these things. But he would not do it. He was a man of many interests, but a single aim. He was a citizen of many worlds, but only as a citizen of the Kingdom of God. He told his scientific friends in England before his last great journeys that he could only "feel in the way of duty" if he went out as a missionary. The cap he wore might be a consul's cap, but the head under it was thinking out the strategy of a Christian campaign; and the heart that lies buried at the foot of Dake Bangweolo burned and glowed with the love of Christ and of Christ's "other sheep."

He was a great discoverer—not so much because he discovered great areas of Central Africa as because he discovered the African; discovered the virtues that were scornfully denied by those who valued the African only as a chattel and a beast of burden. It was Livingstone, who, by his death as well as by his life, showed to all the world the devotion, the fidelity, the honor, the heroism of which the native Africans were capable. It was Livingstone who inspired the greatest chapter in the history of that continent, which was not when forced labor built the Pyramids, but when voluntary labor, inspired by purest love, carried his body and all his personal property one thousand miles from Ilala to the coast.

Livingstone is one of us. He is one of our unperishable names. Thomas Hughes called him the greatest Puritan traveler. That is what he was. Through the whole marvelous pilgrimage from Blantyre to Ilala, that is what he was. Time and thought simplified his creed and strengthened his faith. Honor and fame sat lightly upon him. His heart was set on the supreme values. The world was hot and cold towards him, as its custom is; reserving its acclamations for the achievements that mattered least, and its criticisms for the endeavors that mattered most: becoming his eulogist when he discovered a lake, and his detractor when he championed the slave; pronouncing his science magnificent and his humanity deplorable. Governments were willing to do everything if he would explore rivers, and nothing if he persisted in rescuing the oppressed. Geographers asked for maps; they did not want to hear about man. "Tell us," they cried, "about the river systems, not about the slave system."

But this man, thank God! was a Puritan, and knew how to put first things to the first place, and make religion and humanity supreme. It was not to solve the problem of the Nile, or complete the circuit of the inland lake that hs endured incredible fatigues, marching with bleeding feet and slackening strength through swamp and forest and across the blistering plains. It was primarily to end a colored oppression, to save perishing and suffering humanity, and to preach the Gospel, in which he well knew lies the only permanent guarantee of human freedom.

That is why we must celebrate Livingstone. That is why we must think again of the vast problems of Africa in the light of the life and death of the man who loved her peoples as no other man has ever done, and whose heart lies buried in her soil.

Frankness About Franking

Our congressmen have always had a frank way about them, and it seems to be growing worse instead of better. Last autumn tons of election literature were dumped into the mails so that for the time being the postal service was completely clogged, to the detriment of the business interests of the nation, to say nothing of the nearly $4,000,000 paid by the government to handle the additional business. Every day while congress is in session there is franked out of Washington by senators and representatives twenty tons of government publications. According to a writer in Leslie's a large part of the 310,437,878 pieces of legislative and official free mail handled during the last year was sent out by congressmen. The actual cost to the government for handling it was $5,947,148. Last year thirty carloads of vegetable and flower seeds were sent out by members of congress, not where the most good would be done, but largely for political purposes. Whether the story that a certain congressman mailed his household furniture to Washington under the franking privilege is true or not, it is not uncommon for our public representatives to frank their typewriters to and from Washington. Mr. Hitchcock advocates the use of official postage stamps by senators, representatives, executives and judicial officers, so that a proper check may be placed upon the free mailing privilege and its abuse prevented. This has become so great a scandal that every self-respecting congressman—and we are sufficiently optimistic about our popular government to believe there are some of this class still left in our national halls of legislation—should see to it at once that steps are taken to end one of the biggest postal grafts in the world.

Saints Who Voted for Taft

To what extent is Mormonism a political menace? When Utah became a state the leaders of the church publicly and privately agreed to abstain in the future from interfering in the politics of the state and a clause was put in the constitution embodying that principle. In September, 1912, Pres. Joseph F. Smith sent a signed communication to one of the church publications giving his reasons why President Taft should be reëlected. During the first week in October at the general conference of the Mormon Church, held in Salt Lake City, several apostles made earnest pleas for the support of the Republican administration. They said that the people were not able to judge or rule for themselves, and Joseph F. Smith, Jr., referred to the letter sent out by his father and demanded that the "saints" should obey the instruction of their prophet. At the same time in the assembly hall, during a meeting of the women's auxiliary societies, a daughter of Brigham Young, Susie Young Gates, made a long speech of similar purport and closed by moving that all the sisters vote for President Taft. According to Dr. Bruce Kinney, hundreds of Mormons came from various parts of the state to the conference with "Bull Moose" buttons big enough to be seen a block away, but before the conference had completed its session they had completely disappeared. The landslide away from Taft everywhere except in Utah is an indication which cannot be mistaken as to the influence of the Mormon in politics.

Mummies Will Out!

Having seen what Mormonism can do in the present, it may be well to remind ourselves of one thing it did in the past, concerning which recently, through the activities of Bishop Spalding, fresh information has been obtained. When Joseph Smith founded the Mormon religion Egyptology was fortunately—for the Mormons—an unknown science. "The Book of Abraham," one of the books written by Smith, and published under the title of "The Pearl of Great Price," purported to be a new history of the world from the time of Abraham given to the prophet through the aid of an Egyptian mummy. It contained alleged translations of some Egyptian documents relating to Abraham in Egypt and some illustrations which, according to Smith, were Egyptian representations of God and Abraham and various deities. The prophet's diary records the fact that in the year 1835 he received from one Chandler some mummies and two or three pieces of papyri. Smith claims to have translated these inscriptions through a special revelation. It was an opportune time for the Mormon prophet to make his claim. Nobody knew enough about the language of the dwellers by the Nile to refute it. The Rosetta stone had not yet been deciphered, although two or three people in Europe were patiently engaged in working it out from the Greek translation of the inscription. Since that time the picture writing of the Egyptians has become as clear as any modern language. Recently Bishop Spalding asked the leading Egyptologists of the world to verify or disprove the pseudo-prophet's translations, with the result that it has become perfectly clear that, whatever may be true of Smith himself, his source of inspiration was completely ignorant of Egyptian language, history, or burial customs. What Smith declared was Abraham lying upon an altar to be sacrificed is nothing but a common mummy upon its bier. Murder will out, and so will mummies, if they are given time enough. There is no danger that Egyptian will ever be given either as an elective or a required course in any Mormon university.

The Turk's Trek Back to Asia

The delegates of the Balkan allies have packed their suit-cases and by this time have crossed the channel and are well on their way home. It is difficult to tell how much "bluff" there is in the public utterances on both sides. Each party has attempted to put the responsibility of resuming hostilities upon the other. It may be that before the storming of Adrianople begins—and the allies well know that ultimate victory can he won only at the cost of thousands of lives—some new pressure at the last moment may be brought to bear upon Turkey, whereby further conflict may be averted. During the last few days news has come of fighting between the Young Turk party and the supporters of the late Nazim Pasha. From what Professor Scott, of Robert College, says in his interesting article on another page, written several days before the recent new uprising of the Young Turk party and overthrow of the ministry of Kiamil Pasha, the internal situation of the Porte is far more serious than that resulting from the Balkan victories, and it would seem as if the new ministry under Shefket Pasha had but a short lease of life. The loss of Adrianople is now practically assured, even though the shrines of Islam may be left to direct Ottoman control. Turkey's trek back to Asia has already begun as will be seen by our first page illustration.

Putting Out Washington's Red Lights

The reform forces of the nation at Washington are experiencing some difficulty in getting through congress the bill to "clean up Washington for inauguration" by enjoining persons and places engaged in prostitution. This bill passed the senate unanimously on Jan. 17, and was sent to the house district committee. This committee has failed of a quorum every week congress has been in session since the Jones-Work's liquor act reached it from the senate as long ago as last May. All the efforts of its chairman, Benjamin Johnson, aided by Speaker Clark, to secure a quorum on Jan. 27 failed because of the conspiracy of cowardly inaction. The International Reform Bureau has appealed to the ways and means committee, of which Oscar W. Underwood is the chairman, and which selected the inefficient committee referred to, to ask the house to dismiss from the committee at least three Democrats and three Republicans who did not attend a single meeting for eight months from May 17, 1912, and substitute men who will earn the salary paid them by the people whom they are supposed to represent. Readers of The Christion Century can do a timely piece of reform work by writing Mr. Underwood at once, or better still by sending him a night-lettergram, asking him to use his utmost influence to have the house district committee reformed or "discharged" from consideration of the moral measures it has in charge. It is believed that the house will follow the example of the senate in passing this bill which will clean up the vice in our national capital, if only the religious forces of our country show their colors by voting in the mail-box for this bill.

—Dean Hensley Henson, in closing his farewell sermon at Westminster Abbey, proposed and answered the question, "What is it to preach the gospel?" "The prime end and object of all preaching," he said, "was the disclosure to men, even here, where they wandered in the dark and tangled ways of the world, of the secret of their true sonship, that they may glorify their Father which is in heaven. Men still cried, 'Show us the Father,' and still the answer which alone could satisfy that spiritual hunger was Jesus Christ. Preaching must be judged from this point of view. Is it in any true sense a revelation of the Father? Is it a presentation of him in whom the unseen Father is declared? All else is subservient and contingent. The church, the sacraments, social reform, whatever else there may be which forces its way into the Christian message and wins the audience of men, are all helpful or obstructive precisely with reference to this point."

The Value of Continuing

A good man has good habits. His actions are not governed by chance. Habits are formed by practice. It takes time to acquire accuracy, speed and confidence in the doing of a piece of work. We must continue our practice if we are to have the right kind of habits. Carefulness today and thoughtlessness tomorrow spell confusion and disaster.

There is a value in continuing in one place. The tramp is justly suspected. A man who is bound to no place is not to be trusted. To see nothing good in the place where we live and to be always planning to move signifies that there is nothing good in us. Every situation has its difficulties. Courage and patience are needed everywhere. The worker must look the world in the face and accept his part of the bitter along with the sweet. The moving habit deprives us of the discipline that comes from carrying to completion what we have undertaken. The preacher who discovers within a few days after he has settled with a church that there are stubborn men and opinionated men and idle men in the church and who resolves at once that he will go to another place as soon as he can get a call is not fit to be in the ministry. He loses power when he runs away from hard work.

By continuing in one place we acquire friends if we are worthy. A young man who gave it out on entering college that he was expecting to be a minister made application for a loan from an aid fund. He gave the committee references. Upon investigation it was discovered that the men to whom he referred did not know that he had ever been in their town or their recollections of him were of the vaguest sort. He was very indignant at the refusal of the committee to grant the loan. His protest was met by the advice from the committee that he stay in one place long enough for somebody to find out something about him. One cannot stay over night in a town and on the strength of his residence there secure recommendations from citizens who love the truth and have some sense.

If we are going to prove ourselves friends, we must stay with people. The man whom we love and help is not he whom we visit in the day of his prosperity and avoid in the hour of defeat. It is fortunate for us that we are compelled to live by the side of the same men for years. It is fortunate if we have the spirit of men. These neighbors of ours should be loved and helped in spite of their faults. Our friendship for them must show itself constant. If we are used to getting away from whatever is disagreeable, we shall get away from our neighbors just at the time they need us most. We can do this in a very refined and genteel fashion and make ourselves believe that we are persons of consequence, when in fact we are mean, sneaking cowards.

Knowledge of the Scriptures is acquired by prolonged study. A book with few ideas in it can be exhausted at one reading and we waste our time in giving it that. The difficulty of the Bible is in a great measure due to its worth. It contains great ideas. The motives of its writers are the noblest. The experiences it records are the great experiences of the race. A glance at its pages will not put us in possession of the secret of David's popularity and power, it will not enable us to understand how the psalmist found peace in God when all the world was his enemy and scoffed at him and his faith, nor will it give us any appreciation of the meaning of the life of Jesus. Bible study is not the reading of light literature for entertainment. It is a means of intellectual and spiritual culture.

We must bear testimony to the truth in season, out of season, if we make it effective in the lives of men. "The evangelization of the world in this generation" is a phrase that is apt to mislead. You cannot evangelize the world in one generation. The gospel of Jesus Christ is too profound to be taken to a non-Christian nation in one generation or in ten generations. It is only a superficial gospel that can be preached to all the world in a short time. The slowness of the world in accepting the principles of Jesus is a testimony to their depth. Fads and fashions change in a day. The convictions by which men live change slowly. But they do change and they change as the truth is manifested. What truth we have we should give to the world. If we are disciples of Jesus we cannot take a vacation from his work. Our testimony must be given at all times and in all places. [Midweek Service, Feb. 19. Of the Disciples, by the Disciples, and for the Christian World

A SHOP-TALK EDITORIAL.

The conception that dominates the minds of the initial organizers of the Disciples Publication Society is to make The Christian Century such a paper as will command the attention and support not of Disciples alone but of the larger Christian world.

In a single word it is our purpose to make this paper an organ of intercommunication between those who plead for Christian unity and those to whom the plea is made.

No newspaper among us does now so conceive its mission. This is an entirely unoccupied field—an open field, a field of rich opportunity and duty. It is to enable us to enter this field and perform this duty that the appeal is now being made for financial support.

Most religious newspapers can be classed as either denominational or undenominational.

Denominational papers are published to promote denominational interests, to give denominational information and to cultivate acquaintance within the denomination. The point of view of this class of papers is frankly limited to the circle of its own sect. The problems discussed, the duties enjoined, the news selected are all denominationally conditioned. The little touch bestowed upon the general religious world lying outside the denomination is often pathetic in its suggestion of the remoteness of Christendom from the real interests of editors and readers.

The other type of religious newspaper is the undenominational. There are several now being printed in this country, though not so many as a few years ago, and it is generally understood the circulation of those remaining is not increasing. Passing by those papers of this class which represent some organization of the general Church, like Christian Endeavor or the Sunday-school, it need only be pointed out that the limitations put upon the undenominational paper as a constructive force are not less but more stringent than those under which the denominational paper rests. The so-called "independent" religious paper is really less independent than the denominational organ. With respect to the mere reporting of news this statement does not apply; but in its selection and interpretation of news and its editorial discussion of problems such a paper is compelled to pick its way timidly among denominational prejudices. To the root of the Church's problems it cannot go. Many of the most acute problems it dare not even touch. Its editorial pages are colorless. Its news may be of interdenominational interest, but it can contribute little to Christian progress for lack of representative and vital contact with even a portion of the organic Christian body.

In thus describing these two types of religious journalism we are consciously aware that we are not doing anything like justice to their positive virtues, which are numerous enough. It is not to our present purpose to examine into and judge the value of modern religious journalism. It is to our purpose now only to draw the line of its limitations, in order to make clear the field into which it is our desire yet further to project The Christian Century.

Least of all is it intended to bring railing accusations, or even invidious comparison, to the discredit of the first class mentioned above. In spite of the fact that it is coming to be felt that the denominational press constitutes one of the chief inhibitions upon the growth of Christian unity, it would be very illogical to say that there is no rightful place for papers with denominational limitations. On the contrary, there is a rightful place for them. They give the little chit-chat of the denominational family, they tell of the movements of ministers and the current activities of the local churches. They discuss questions of denominational polity. Matters of these sorts have a natural right to a newspaper organ, just as the still more local and neighborly doings of the parish church have a natural right to a parish paper if the congregation can afford to publish one.

But The Christian Century holds another ideal for itself. Our readers have been made aware of the nature of this ideal. For five years a distinctive note has been sounded by this paper—not merely a distinctive doctrinal note but a distinctive journalistic note. The Christian Century is neither a denominational nor an undenominational paper in the mutually exclusive sense of these terms; it has striven to make itself the organ of a Cause, the Disciples' Cause, the Cause of Christian unity. It has been compelled to challenge and discuss certain indirections in the Disciples' own practice, but it regards that as simply incidental and temporary in the working out of its primary mission. Now that a clearing has been made with respect to certain issues that concern the Disciples themselves, it asks these same Disciples to enable it to take positive and progressive steps in the direction in which its policy has unwaveringly pointed during these years.

It asks support as an undenominational Christian newspaper, published unselfishly by the Disciples' brotherhood, and speaking that brotherhood's message to the Christian world.

In so conceiving the mission of The Christian Century we believe we are planning a paper that will serve the Disciples themselves in a capacity in which they are not now being served by the conventional type of religious journalism. Our brotherhood needs such a paper. Intelligent laymen, Sunday-school workers, church officers, the leaders of our church societies, the average Christian household, as well as our ministers, need a religious newspaper that represents the positive ideals of the brotherhood but is not limited by denominational interests in its treatment of those ideals or its treatment of religious news. There is an unoccupied field for a paper that acknowledges brotherhood loyalties while, at the same time, it takes a Christendom-wide view.

Such a paper, adequately financed, would greatly enrich the life of the Disciples. It would widen the vision of its readers. It would cultivate interdenominational acquaintance. Besides thoroughly "covering" all the news of the brotherhood that has significance enough to deserve to appear in a national newspaper, it would "cover" the salient happenings in the rest of the Christian world, interpreting the tendencies of other communions as well as of our own, and so cultivate a Christian union mind by freeing its readers from the provincialism of sectarian limitations.

In a word the function of such a paper would be to prepare a people who should be ready for Christian unity when it appeared!

And this too often, alas! is not the effect produced by denominational journalism. Most conventional religious papers proceed on the more or less conscious assumption that their very existence depends upon maintaining a sectarian mind in their readers. Subscriptions to such papers are given, for the most part, from a sense of duty to the denomination, not because they are really read and enjoyed. It is with his eye on the paper that appeals primarily to sectarian motives that many a pastor is today saying to himself—and an increasing number are saying it out loud—that he does not much care whether his people take a religious paper or not.

The Christian Century has fixed for itself quite a different ideal. It strives to find success not by catering to the sectarian feelings and tendencies which inevitably appear even among Disciples of Christ, but by cultivating an appetite for the worthier and richer values of the unsectarian Kingdom of God.

The time has long since come for the Disciples to produce a newspaper which others than Disciples will care to read. A people with the sense of a distinctive and vital message for Christendom, such as Disciples believe themselves to possess, cannot be justified in following the beaten track of conventional religious journalism with its sectarian limitations. Not since Alexander Campbell's day have we produced a journal which was intended to circulate outside our own group. Our papers have all been published by the Disciples and for the Disciples, just as other denominational papers are published for their respective denominations. One can hardly imagine a printed page more uninteresting to the average churchman than a newspaper not of his own denomination. There are two or three exceptions in the American Church to this characterization, but they only prove the rule. The pathetic inadequacy of denominational journalism will appear to any imagination that will exercise itself to conceive an intelligent Presbyterian or Congregationalist or Methodist of normal interests subscribing for and reading one of our present Disciple newspapers. That all our papers can respond to this characterization by pointing to a few non-Disciple subscribers on their lists does not weaken its force. The fact is that our papers are edited and published for ourselves, as a brotherhood. Neither their contents nor mode of treatment could command the interest of those not "of us."

This kind of journalism may be logical enough for others to produce,—and it is logical enough for us to produce a paper or several papers of that sort,—but that this should be the only kind of paper published by the Disciples is anything but logical.

This point was recognized by the Topeka convention, in 1910, when its president made an appeal for funds wherewith to produce a paper to circulate without cost among the leaders of all denominations and to bear to them the Disciples' message of Christian unity The response was instant and substantial. But it is apparent that a modest quarterly tract, for the most part reprinting articles appearing elsewhere, and lacking altogether a constructive editorial guidance, cannot be said to convey the positive and imperative message of Christian unity which Disciples owe it to their Lord to trumpet forth.

There is no denominational paper rendering the service to its denomination which The Christian Century desires to perform for the Disciples of Christ. It was with this ideal uppermost in mind that we were persuaded to relinquish our private ownership of this paper and put it into the common possession of the brotherhood. Such a paper ought not to be a private enterprise. The Disciples themselves should publish it, not a money making private corporation. It is a brotherhood task as truly as is foreign missions or church extension.

The Christian Century, moreover, is the logical organ for such a service of intercommunication between Disciples and the Christian world. It believes in the practice of Christian unity. It pleads a cause whose ideal and practice presuppose the equal status of all Christ's people, whatever their name. The recent period of constructive controversy within the circle of Disciples has brought it to the position where it aspires to displace controversy with teaching, with interpretation, with proclamation. The fruitage of this controversy may be taken for granted as the first principles of its position, while it goes on unto perfection in advocacy and practice.

The moment has come for Disciples to cease discussing among themselves the refinements of their "plea" and to begin heralding that plea abroad through whatever instruments are necessary to reach the Christian world.

In the fear of God The Christian Century offers itself to the brotherhood for no less a purpose than this.

Can Bryan Be Made Moderator?

Admirers of Mr. William J. Bryan and President-elect Woodrow Wilson have urged their election to the moderatorship of the General Assembly of the Presbyterian Church (U. S. A.) at its coming meeting in Atlanta. Both of these nominations were made with the knowledge that their proposal was an innovation, inasmuch as the General Assembly has never had an elder as moderator. Dr. Samuel J. Niccols, of St. Louis, one of the ablest ministers of the church, in which he takes the position that to elect an elder moderator of the Assembly would be in contravention of the constitution of the church as interpreted by the action of the church and by the ancient custom of the Assembly. In this matter the Southern church, twenty-six years ago, took an advanced step by amending the Constitution so as to permit the election of a ruling elder as moderator of the Assembly. It was thought to be in line with the repeated declarations of the church as to the entire parity of the eldership.—Christian Observer (Southern Presbyterian.)

Editorial Table Talk

Newspaperdom—Secular and Religious

Some interesting facts appear in the American Newspaper Annual Directory, which is just out. During the past year newspapers were born at the rate of five per day for every day in the year, and they died or were merged at nearly the same rate. The exact number started was 1,686. In the same period 1,650 were discontinued, making the net increase for the year 36, about equally divided between the United States and Canada. As in recent years, there were many consolidations. Much the largest comparative growth was in the daily field. The Directory also brings out the fact that the publishing and printing industry is one which, in number of employees, value of products, and value added by manufacture, is exceeded only by four others in the entire realm of our country's manufacture. The increase in value of output in this industry is remarkable. In ten years it was more than 86 per cent. The annual income of newspapers and publications is now estimated at $360,000,000—a million dollars a day—of which, perhaps, two-thirds is derived from advertising. This fact is another proof that the tendency of the day is to make advertisers carry American journalism. The Chicago daily papers, which are among the very best in the country, are sold for one cent, a mere fraction of what they cost. The advertisers pay the rest of the bill. Trade journals, which the Directory says are steadily increasing, running from the large ones, devoted to religion and agriculture, to small groups, representing sociology, woman's suffrage, cement and concrete, moving pictures, esperanto, etc., also are supported for the most part by advertising. But unfortunately the religious papers are made something of an exception in this respect, for they lack what might be called trade advertising. Every good cause, new movement and reform scheme wants the religious press to give it free publicity. It matters not how much these movements may be spending on secretaries, and agents and on circular matter, their promoters are disposed to consider it an offense if reminded that religious newspapers cannot pay bills by surrendering their columns to free advertising.

Proposed American Academy of Immortals

Within the past few days not a little has been said about our so-called "American Immortals." The lists of distinguished names have been published, the happy, or unhappy, owners of which names are to constitute the charter members of our National Academy. They are good names and their selection appears to us to reflect credit upon the judgment of those to whom the task was assigned. But we should not be disappointed were the whole business to be given up, because the society of letters is all too easily rent by various feuds, and in America it is impossible to judge any man's literary merit apart from his moral and religious standpoint. Robert Ingersoll was a distinguished orator and Thomas Paine one of the most vigorous writers of the age in which he lived, but no committee could pass upon their literary merits apart from their relation to the faith of the nation. Let any one look over the purely literary degrees given by Harvard and Princeton for the last twenty-five years and say whether there ever was a conservative theologian honored by Harvard or a radical critic by Princeton. Every school has its "favorite sons," and the American Academy, if it be established, will prove no exception unless human nature has changed all at once. It will become a little clique bound to honor its special pets, as the French Academy does to this day. If a man is a truly great scholar no Academy can add to his distinction but in ignoring him it may discredit itself.

Big Income for Higher Education

The enormous income of the state universities is shown by a bulletin which has just been issued by the department of education at Washington. It approximates $35,000,000 for the past year for 87 state universities and other state-aided institutions of higher education. Of this sum the federal government contributed about $5,000,000 and the states $18,000,000. The regular current income of most of these institutions from public appropriations represents a capitalization of about $400,000,000.

The year's income passed the $2,000,000 mark in the case of the Universities of Illinois, with $2,363,711; Minnesota, $2,682,499, and Wisconsin $2,122,297. Cornell university, which is technically a private institution, but receives state and federal aid, reported receipts exceeding $3,000,000, with a net income available for current expenses of about $1,500,000.

Other state-aided institutions in the $1,000,000 income class include the Universities of Michigan, with $1,343,057; Ohio, with $1,011,571, and California, with $1,711,393.

—Prevention is a good thing and the Central Howard Association is doing plenty of it these days. Possibilities for good that are in men who are paroled from prisons and reformatories form the keynote of the twelfth annual report just issued by the association. According to the report, the association during the twelve months aided 9,162 men in Illinois, Kentucky, Ohio, Indiana, Michigan, Wisconsin and Minnesota. Jobs were found for 1,600 of the paroled wards. "It is a strange fact that these men hold their jobs and 'make good' about as well as other people," is one of the statements of President William M. R. French in the report. While it cannot get hold of the offender before the first offense, the association plays a most important part in preventing the second offense. "Prison officials are pretty well agreed that the first offender at his discharge usually is in a penitent mood to the extent at least that he thinks it does not pay to commit offenses and suffer punishment for them." According to the report, the average earnings a month of paroled men was $37.72. The total earnings of paroled men during 1912 amounted to $43,453.44. The financial report for the year shows that the society had a deficit of $672.68. The income was $10,641, of which Chicago contributed $3,110.72. The remainder came from the territory covered by the association.

—If you are very busy and haven't time to read one of the big volumes on theology but nevertheless want earnestly to know how modern men are thinking about religion, just read Edgar DeWitt Jones' little story in this issue on "Was It God or Gold?" and after you read it sit still awhile and think about it. Without intending it, the author has put into that story the suggestion of the two most significant books in recent religious literature: Dr. Clarke's "Outlines of Christian Theology," an older book, and Prof. Rauschenbusch's "Christianizing the Social Order," a book of this very season. The story-teller gets at the truth, after all, better than the philosopher. And if there's any reader who can finish Mr. Jones' tale without a good-sized tear or two bubbling over on his cheek—well, we were going to offer him a year's subscription free, but it is not our business to pay for his deficiencies, so we will let it go with saying that the editorial heart, toughened by much criticism of manuscript, is tenderer than his.

—A news dispatch says that Congregational churches in Connecticut may soon put out "canned" church services for the benefit of "shut-ins" and other parishioners who may be prevented temporarily from attending church. The trustees of South church of New Britain have taken the phonograph scheme under consideration upon recommendation of a trustee who reported that he had investigated the plan, that it was practical and would not be costly, as one machine and the records could be loaned to more than one family. He said the "shut-ins" he had talked with were delighted with the prospect of hearing the pastor's sermon and the choir's music in such form. There is little doubt, it is said, that this church's lead will be followed by other churches.

—An interesting experiment in church federation is being made at Isabel, S. D., and will be continued for three months. If results after the expiration of that time are all expected, the federation will be permanent. By the terms of the federation there will be but one regular Protestant church service conducted there at one time. The churches which have thus become federated are the Baptist, Methodist and Congregational. Sunday forenoons the sermons will be delivered alternately by the Baptist and Methodist pastors, and the Sunday evening services will be conducted by the Congregational pastor, thus dividing the work.

—Agitation against the drunkenness and all around debauchery connected with New Year's eve celebrations in the large cities has begun in good time this year. The tendency to make New Year's eve a time for license, together with the special indulgence by the city government, was condemned in resolutions last week at the meeting of the federated Chicago churches. The resolution was proposed by Rev. Joseph H. Chandler, executive secretary of the church council, the object being to arouse public sentiment early against a repetition of the scenes of past years.

—"The lasting of the white race is involved in the question of the social evil," said Charles W. Eliot, president-emeritus of Harvard University, in an address at the City club, Boston. "We must remove this evil," he continued, "or this country will not be ruled by the race that is now here. The family life of the white race is at stake in its purity, healthfulness and fertility. We have tried the policy of silence and the policy of segregation, but there is no cure except the observance by men of the same standards that nearly all races demand of their women."

—Rev. A. S. Grant, superintendent of the Presbyterian church of Canada, has announced that ten laymen of that church have each subscribed $1,000 to pay the expenses of every Presbyterian minister in Canada to the general assembly at Toronto. Expenses of many American ministers also will be paid.

DR. WILLETT'S MISSION TOUR

Professor Herbert L. Willett is now making an investigative tour of the mission fields of the Orient accompanied by a university class whose members are devoting themselves, under his leadership, to an earnest and systematic study of social and religious conditions in the Far East and to the activities and results of Christian missionary effort. In this series of articles in The Christian Century Dr. Willett will write more or less informally about his personal experiences and observations, and, in addition, will report the results of his study and of those with him, giving our readers thus a delightful travel story and an instructive and authoritative report of actual missionary conditions and needs. No man in the American Church is better qualified than Dr. Willett to find the facts and to judge them discriminatingly

Japanese Industries

To one who keeps along the thoroughfares in this land, it seems like a very modern place. The train service is admirable, and in regard of punctuality and cheapness it is superior to our own. The tram-car is to be found in all the cities, and even inter-urban electric roads are beginning to be seen. The telephone is in common use. The automobile is no unusual sight on the streets of Tokyo, Kyoto, Osaka and Kobe. The shipping industry has reached wide bounds. Even the aeroplane has been seen in the air above Yokohama.

Of course a people could not change its manners and habits as rapidly as have the Japanese in the last generation, since the opening of the late emperor's reign, without keeping much of its primitive life undisturbed. One has only to go back a little distance into the country to find the signs of the old Japan. There primitive custom still prevails. Early habits of industry are not to be shaken easily. And the symbols of the old paganism and phallicism, which have been carefully removed from the pathway of the ordinary traveler, are still met.

Increase of Industries.

The industries of the nation have increased and widened in scope very much of late. Factories are to be found in all the centers. The introduction of more rapid vehicles than the ox and the jinrikisha has made a demand for the construction of roads which is beginning to be met. The wonderful natural resources of the country are sure to find quick development. The mines are of sufficient productivity to have yielded most of the minerals for past needs, but their capacity has never been tested. And the wonderful wealth in water power, capable of supplying the entire empire with light, heat and motive power, is only in the infancy of its employment.

Farming, as with all people, is the basis of Japan's wealth. Yet the farmer is the least rewarded of any class. His work is very hard, for much of the soil must be carefully hunted among the bases of the mountains, the implements of tillage are old and of little worth, and the taxes amount to one third of all the nation's wealth. Rice is, of course, the great staple. Yet many of the people are too poor even to eat it, and must sell their rice and raise or buy wheat, barley or millet to live upon.

Fertility of Soil.

The soil is very fertile, in spite of the centuries through which it has borne the burden of a large population. There seems to be little system about its cultivation. Year after year it bears its allotted yield of rice, and sometimes a crop of wheat in addition. There is no thought of fertilizers, and little is known of that principle of rotation of crops which used to satisfy the American farmer. The gardeners, to be sure, gather the night-earth from the towns, and spread it on their gardens. In the total absence of any sewage system this serves a certain useful purpose, though it is highly offensive to the westerner who passes the loaded carts, or the bucket-bearers on the streets. But the oriental seems to have no sensibility to vile smells, and the system goes on.

In the southern portion of Japan, especially in the region of Nara, are the great tea fields. This industry affords employment to a multitude of families. It is now becoming a regular business, managed by large operators, rather than a domestic industry as formerly.

The Silk Industry.

Another culture is that of the silk worm. Mulberry trees are carefully tended in many parts of Japan, and the raw silk is used both for domestic manufacture and foreign trade. In recent years the traffic in the manufactured product has fallen off to some extent, and most of the raw silk is now sent abroad, particularly to New York and New England. A new line of ships is now being placed upon the Pacific whose chief function will be the transportation of raw silk from Japan to America and England in the shortest possible time.

It is unfortunate for Japan that she has not been able to compete with the rest of the world in manufactured products. She makes a certain quantity of silk, for example, and her fabrics are much admired. But the very silk itself is not infrequently woven abroad, and reimported for Japanese use. In this manner a loss is sustained annually. At the present time the imports exceed the exports to a somewhat alarming extent. And this state of the ledger, together with the heavy taxation, is the cause of no small amount of socialistic agitation, in spite of a very general feeling of loyalty to the empire and the existing order.

Enormous Task—Wonderful Success.

Japan has undertaken an enormous task in attempting to overtake the rest of the world in a few years. A wonderful success has been achieved in the effort, but the price has been a heavy one, and it has by no means been paid as yet. The Japanese have a laudable ambition to be "in" on every world enterprise. They want western machinery and methods, and are quick to borrow from every source. Yet they have not, up to the present time, shown a large measure of originality either in the creation of their own machinery, or even in the use and adaptation of that of the west. Many stories are told of the waste of appliances brought from Europe and America, which could not be properly worked, and one of the humorous incidents of the Japanese effort to provide a merchant marine was the failure to properly construct vessels, all the materials of which were prepared in England, but which the laudable zeal of the Japanese led them to believe they could assemble and put together as well and much more patriotically on the shores of Japan.

An instance of Japanese desire to have a "look in" on every international enterprise is connected with the recent Chinese loan. Six of the nations offered to finance a loan for the new republic. Of these Japan wished to be one, and was actually admitted to the group, though it is no secret that Japan is overwhelmingly in debt, and has not a yen to loan anyone. No doubt if the plan goes through she will go out and borrow the money to put up her share of the Chinese loan. She can neither endure nor risk the necessity of being left out of any important enterprise in the Far East.

Teapot Lane, Kyoto.

Yet a Child Nation.

These are mere incidents in the growth of a nation from feudalism to constitutional government and true democracy. Japan is as yet a child nation. To be sure it is of the firm opinion that it should be regarded by all men as grown up. The successes of the wars with China and Russia have enormously widened its horizon and expanded its sense of power. It is sure that its career has only just begun. To those who point out the comparative lightness of its task in dealing with the two moribund and misruled powers of Asia and Europe, it raises astonished protest, bidding them look at its splendid army, its developing industries and its enlarging dominion.

And Japan is right. All it needs is time to make good its hopes. A people with such abilities may be trusted to care for the future, and may be forgiven certain crudities of technique and certain limitations of character. None of the nations is perfect. None has made a more admirable record than Japan in the Meiji era. If Japan can have time, she will make good. Will that time allowance be granted her?

Was It God or Gold?

By Edgar DeWitt Jones

The accident was tragic and unspeakably pathetic. The chief actors were a little four year old boy, a big shepherd dog, and a train of freight cars. The little boy had tied a stout rope to the dog's collar and the big shepherd in great glee raced on ahead of the little fellow whose short, chubby legs worked hard and fast to keep up with the dog. Directly in front of the two a long train of freight cars was passing. The dog ran up to the track, paused a single second, then like a flash shot under a car dragging the child with him. The dog escaped to the other side of the track in safety, but the boy fell under the awful wheels and fifteen cars went over him. A very few minutes later, the conductor whitefaced and trembling was removing his coat and tenderly wrapping it about the maimed little figure in which life still lingered. A brakeman, likewise white and broken utterly, took off his sweater and reverently placed within its folds the chubby bleeding stumps, with the feet still encased in the scuffed shoes. In answer to the conductor's inquiry where he lived, the child was able to point weakly toward a cottage next to the railroad track and thence the conductor and brakeman stumbled, reeling along like drunken men.

The child spoke a few intelligible sentences to his mother and actually raised himself up and kissed her before he sank into unconsciousness, from which he soon passed into death.

The undertaker who took charge of the body, the coroner who held the inquest, and the men who composed the jury, were without exception moved as men are moved only when frightful tragedy strikes down a little child at play.

The day of the funeral witnessed the usual crowd drawn together by such an accident. The little house so meagerly furnished was full to overflowing. Two ministers took part in the service. A young clergyman but a few years out of the seminary, and lately come to the community, spoke first and briefly. He was a clean-cut, handsome young fellow and the falter of his voice and the tears that trickled down his cheeks spoke well for his heart. In substance he said,

"My friends, the sorrow that has come into this home is the sorrow of us all today. Our hearts bleed for this father and mother in the loss of their beautiful boy, but they have a great high priest in Jesus Christ who loved little children and said: 'Suffer the little children to come unto me and forbid them not, for of such is the kingdom of heaven.' The child is safe. Moreover, it was God's will that the child should die. Not a sparrow falls to the ground without His knowledge, nor His will. We must learn to say, 'Thy will, Father, not ours be done.' The little life, short as it was, had a beautiful ministry. But God willed it should come up higher. Our times are in His hand. Walk by faith. Trust on! Pray God that His will be done on earth as it is in heaven. The God of all comfort, bless and keep you, Amen."

The young man sat down, and a quartette sang. The other minister then arose. He was a familiar figure in the city, and long had his ministerial labors been in and for the community. He was tall and thin, and his hair was streaked with gray. His face was furrowed with lines that were deep but not hard nor cynical. He spoke in a low tone but everyone present heard him, so distinct was his articulation. In substance his words were these:

"My dear friends," he said, "my young brother has told you to trust in God, and he has advised you wisely. We must walk by faith, since there is no other way to walk and the Lord Christ has given us a great example of the life of faith. My young brother has also told you that this little boy is safe forever and so he is. You have given him back to God as God gave him to you, innocent, blameless, a little child unhurt by sin and in a large measure unacquainted with suffering. But my young brother here will pardon me, older and more experienced as I am, if I take a different view of the cause of the lad's death from that which he has set forth in good faith and sincerity. I do not believe that it was God's will that this little boy should die when and as he did. I cannot believe that, nor need any one so believe. God is in better business than killing little children. It was man's will not God's that caused this child's death. It is God's will that human life should be safeguarded and protected but man finds that human beings are cheaper than devices that protect life and limb. God, through Christ, has shown us that the life of a single child is priceless. If men did God's will they would make every railroad in Christendom enclose their tracks through villages and cities against such chance passersby as this little lad. If men did God's will it would not be necessary that any man should have to live for economy's sake so close to the railroad track and rear a family midst daily dangers. No, it was not God's will that this dear little boy should die so tragically, it was man's will. If the responsibility may not be placed specifically anywhere, society as a whole is to blame and some day society as a whole, will awake to its responsibility and opportunity. Let every man and woman here today, not in bitterness nor hate, but in tenderness and love, seek to make God's will as revealed in Jesus to be humanity's standard."

There was another hymn and shortly the procession was on the way to the cemetery with the brougham carrying the two ministers leading. "My brother," said the older minister, soon after the procession started, "I hope I did not offend you by my taking issue with one statement you made. I am older than you and I have seen more of men and the world's ways are better known to me." The older man paused a second and flecked a piece of lint from his coat sleeve. He seemed to be expectant of a reply, but receiving none he continued, "Besides I know the lives of many who were at that funeral today, and their lives are hard, but not unworthy. The idea that God wills that some shall have abundance, while others starve, the idea that God wills that certain children shall live in luxury and others die so horribly as this lad died has driven hundreds into atheism and out and out hostility to the church. And such a teaching is not true, never was, nor can be true if God be the God that Jesus revealed. I thought it was better, my brother, for you to suffer a little now than that a score of men and women present, should go on hating God and all because they believed Him to be a respector of persons. You will not hold it against me, my brother?"

The younger man made no reply other than to lay his hand on his companion's arm very softly and gently.

The carriage wheels crunched upon the cemetery's graveled driveways, and after many windings and turnings, stopped by the tiny open grave, about which a crowd had already gathered.

It was the young minister who pronounced the benediction, and his voice was quite steady and strong.

"Our Father," he prayed, "bless these dear hearts so broken and hurt. Help them and all of us to take the words of thy servant, our brother, to heart. Forgive us when in our ignorance or sin we ever try to fasten on Thee actions that we ourselves are responsible for! Thou art good and thy will is perfect. But our wills are stubborn and often evil. By the memory of this little life, so precious, so full of joy, may this father and mother, these friends, yea all of us, seek to do ever thy will as revealed in Jesus Christ in whose name we commit this body to the earth and its spirit to thy good keeping until the day break and the shadows flee away, Amen!"

It was the young minister who spoke first on the way back from the burial. As the brougham passed between the pillars at the cemetery entrance he turned to his gray-haired companion and said as though in answer to a direct question, "You are right, it was not God at all, it was Gold."

The Life Work of Thomas P. Haley

An Appreciative Interpretation

By Burris A. Jenkins

Thomas P. Haley, so long a pastor in Kansas City, Mo., died at his home on the night of January 31, at eighty-one years of age. He was born near Lexington, Ky., April 19, 1832. When he was six years of age his family removed to Randolph County, Mo. What education he obtained was from the district schools of that county until at sixteen he went to the academy at Huntsville, where he made such strides that he was soon selected to teach in the institution. Beyond this he was without college or university training.

He married Miss Mary Louise McGarvey, of Kentucky, May 1, 1855, who died about 1887. They had five children, all of whom are living and were at his funeral. His second marriage was to Mrs. Mary W. Campbell, of Kirkville, Mo., July 12, 1892, who lived with him for twenty years in Kansas City, and nursed him in his last illness.

Mr. Haley went to Kansas City in 1881 to take charge of the then recently united First and Second Christian Churches. He built the present structure of the First Church at Eleventh and Locust, and under his ministry this congregation grew rapidly to great proportions and established missions in all parts of the growing young city.

Dr. Haley more nearly filled the phrase—so overworked and hackneyed—"master of assemblies," than any man I ever knew. He could not be surpassed as a presiding officer. Whether the assembly were a small, quiet prayer-meeting or officers' meeting, or a great, restless, turbulent convention, he handled it with perfect ease. His great voice could ring like a trombone, over the perturbed waves of humanity; and his natural dignity and personal magnetism completed his domination.

Administrative capacity was his most marked characteristic. He could have filled any chair at the head of any board or organization, religious or secular, given the necessary training. It chanced or was ordained that his power should be given to the church; and no man could have managed the elements put into his hand with greater skill, or to better ends.

The Statesman of Kansas City Disciples' Progress.

It is commonly known that the Disciples are stronger in Kansas City than in any other great city in the country; yes, that they are stronger in numbers, wealth, and influence than any other religious body in the city. It is due, under God, to T. P. Haley that this is true. It was due to his foresight, his administration, his broad policy inaugurated many years ago, and so persistently pressed upon the minds of his brethren that the axioms of his purpose have become rooted in their being until they are no longer aware of the origin of these precepts.

"The Church in Kansas City is one congregation meeting in a number of places." That was one of his axioms. And while it is a high ideal, the twenty-four or twenty-five different churches have tried through the years to live up to it. They have sought, by their joint-board, their city missions' committee, and their common enterprises, to carry into their work that spirit of unity and solidarity that his slogan implies. In many instances, most notably in the case of the Linwood Boulevard Church, his last pastorate, it was his judgment of strategic locations, which led to the building up of great congregations.

A Master-Executive.

His knowledge and care in the organization and management of individual congregations are further evidence of the master-executive He came to Kansas City to heal a breach in the Church, to unite two divided congregations into one. With such consummate skill did he handle the delicate and difficult situation that, I believe, there has never been a split church since among the white people of the city —and even the colored folk have lately patched up theirs. Here comes in his attention to detail, which ever marks the skilled administrator. He was always chairman of his own board of officers, and his strong hand quelled disturbances, saved time, prevented the small rift in the lute. He never allowed an important measure to pass without a practically unanimous vote.

Profound and Sympathetic Knowledge of Men.

His knowledge of human nature, which, after all, is the foundation of all executive success, was profound. He could put himself at the point of view of the perplexed or disgruntled, sympathize with the aggrieved, lend patience to the slow-witted, touch the secret heart-strings and play upon the unconscious motives of the men and women who formed the pawns, knights, queens, and bishops of the game in which he was engaged. I do not wish to convey the impression that he was an adroit master of finesse. He seldom, if ever, resorted to it. He was large enough and strong enough, body, mind, and soul, to disregard and override all strategy.

Not merely in Kansas City has his influence been felt in all these years, but throughout the state of Missouri. His hand was present, and his Christian statesmanship, in the state Board, in the Missouri Christian Lectureship, and to the close of his life he retained his membership in the national Board of Church Extension. He stood in the foremost rank of the great men the commonwealth of Missouri Discipledom has produced: Alexander Proctor, G. W. Longan, A. B. Jones, J. H. Garrison, T. P. Haley.

A Modern Preacher of Yesterday.

His career was a forecaste of the most modern demands of the Christian ministry. He was yesterday what a city preacher has got to be today. It is an accepted fact now that business must be put into Christianity; that statesmanship must be put into the pulpit; that the great city churches and the world-wide policies and undertakings of Christianity call for every ounce of administrative capacity that ministers may possess, and the most up-to-date business methods that laymen may have.

Dr. Haley loved to preach, and he was a powerful preacher. His personal presence was so majestic, his dignity so great, his ease and poise so evident, that every word and every period gained by his utterance. Therefore, like Henry Ward Beecher, no sermon of his could have been, when written or printed, what it was when spoken. His taste and judgment, in the pulpit, never erred. He never uttered, in my hearing—and it is inconceivable that he ever did in anybody's hearing—one rash, spectacular, sensational, harsh, vulgar, or ill-judged word. His thought was conservative, and he never preached what might by any be termed a dangerous doctrine.

A Master of Impromptu Speech.

But to my mind, his greatest speeches were not made on set occasions. His carefully prepared address did not ring the bulls-eye so well as his impromptu, off-hand, unthought utterances. Once, when I told him this, he smiled and said: "Yes, Proctor and Longan and the rest used to say they were never afraid of Haley in a set speech, but when the fur began to fly in general debate, then they'd rather lock horns with anybody else." When called suddenly to his feet for a speech of welcome, of congratulation, of presentation, after dinner, in a convention, at a memorial, or interdenominational meeting, in a general debate, nobody that I ever knew was his equal.

In the closer relationships of life, Dr. Haley showed himself a man. Of his home, his love for his family, of his friendships, I might write; but perhaps it is better not. It is enough to quote a word of his to me a year or so ago: "Nothing within my power was ever too good for a child of mine." Let me only tell how he treated me, since I came, nearly six years ago, to my boyhood home, to take his place in the pulpit from which he had retired. Many of the congregation were officers and teachers in the old church where I had been baptized. They knew me as "Burt." Brother Haley warned them in advance that I was to be known as "Dr. Jenkins." Whenever my boyhood name was uttered in his presence, he answered with great dignity, "Dr. Jenkins, if you please." If in these six years I ever said or did a thing which did not meet his approbation—and I know such must often have been the case—nobody ever knew it, not even myself. So did his large tact and kindliness help a prophet in his own country.

Mind Growing Younger With Age.

Dr. Haley presented the unusual phenomenon of a man broadening in his intellectual life in his old age. During the past ten to fifteen years he has developed from a conservative thinker, theologically, to a rather pronounced liberal. In general, men change in the opposite direction. Perhaps his growth was due to the fact that during these last years he found time for the reading and thought that the earlier days of an extremely busy and practical ministry did not permit. Such growth is evidence of a mind that held its greenness and freshness to the very last. To hear him talk, no one would have known, if blind-folded, that the eighty-year-old speaker was not a man in his prime. He loved to be in the company of young men, and was in harmony of spirit with their most recent thought.

On Knowing Men

"I always size a man up the first time I see him, and I rarely, if ever, have reasons to revise the first impression." That seems to be an Adamic boast. My observation is that the men who size up on sight spend most of their time repenting their short-sightedness.

"The proper study of mankind is man," seems a superfluous utterance in the light of our unwavering confidence, for why should we study mankind when a glance suffices to pierce to the lowest depth of human nature?

Our human nature plays curious pranks with us all. This supposed infallibility regarding our fellows is an exhibition of the illusion with which nature indulges us. Is it not that same curious freak in us which makes us believe that we can hold down the other fellow's job better than he, that we can preach a better sermon than the excellent one we have just heard, that while others failed in such and such a pulpit, we know that their failures would be only bold trumpets to herald our success, that while we have just read a good book written by our neighbor we could write a better one, if we had time? These are the ways that nature takes to illusion us, to make us feel that we are much greater than we are. She seems to delight to have every man burn incense to his own vanity.

A few years ago I knew a man whom I considered the very man for a prominent pulpit, and in view of the disasters which followed the union, although I would have staked my hopes of salvation on the correctness of my choice at the time, I shall welcome in the future the suggestions of my friends whose pride in their own judgments is equivalent to the voice from the burning bush.

A friend in other days trusted to my knowledge of man, mere man, in the small matter of loaning some money. Knowing both to be good men, and knowing with painful exactness the unspeakable embarrassment of vainly trying to borrow, I recommended the loan, which to this day remains a loan. I think there is a lurking suspicion in the heart of the man that I owe him that money; I know that in my own heart such a suspicion rankles, and may force me to convert it into cash.

Of course, I haven't missed my guess every time, but I know of no thread so frail as man's proud boast of his ability to read his fellow man. We seldom record the mistakes of ignorance, for that would keep us at the pen everlastingly, and would plant mines under the confidence of our comrades in our judgments; but, for all, the thesis holds that cock-sure judgments as to our acquaintance with the unexplored depths of the genus homo, from turret to foundation stone, should be affirmed only in secret whispers, far from the maddening influence of writing material which some day may be thrust before our eyes as the final testimoney to our monumental ignorance.

Mrs. Harrison will be glad to receive communications from any of her readers offering suggestions concerning woman's welfare, criticisms of articles or inquiries concerning any matters relevant to her department. She should be addressed directly at 530 Elm Tree Lane, Lexington, Ky.

The Passing of the Rod

A few days ago, in the town in which I live, suit was brought by a patron of the public schools against the principal, for striking his son, a boy of ten or twelve years of age. The judge of the city court imposed a fine on the principal (who was an estimable young man), in spite of the testimony of some of his fellow teachers that the boy had broken the rules of the school, and had been insolent when rebuked. Several bore witness that the punishment was slight, consisting (as was specifically stated) of "a slap on the child's back, below the belt."

This sentence of the judge for a light blow to a boy, who probably richly deserved it, is but a symptom of a revolt in public opinion against the use of corporal punishment in our schools.

Spare the Rod, and Spoil the Child.

This brought back vividly to my mind a day in my childhood, when I was riding along a road with my father, and he was talking to me of his school days, and of the teacher of his boyhood, whom he called "old Endecott."

Presently we came to a very compact canebrake, and he remarked, "Old Endecott has worn out as many switches on my back, as there are canes in that brake. He always whipped every boy in the school once a day, and as many more times as he felt disposed."

He mused awhile, and then confessed, "The main reason I wanted to grow up and be a man in those days, was that I might get a gun and shoot old Endecott—and I believe all the other boys in the school felt the same way."

Another time he was talking of a family he used to visit in his boyhood, the father of whom had been governor of Kentucky, and whose name is nobly linked with the history of the state. There were a large number of children in the household, and the discipline was as strict as in a school. When they were all together at meal time no child dared speak unless he was spoken to. And this Presbyterian father conscientiously used the rod on his children, especially his boys, until they were approaching manhood.

Two mottoes were ruling principles in family and school life then—Children should be seen and not heard, and Spare the rod, and spoil the child. That the rod was often used injudiciously, as in the case of my father's schoolmaster, as well as conscientiously and reluctantly, as in the case of many a father, goes without saying.

Those days, and the days before them, were times when the rod reigned—may we never see their like again!

On the Plantation.

In studying conditions that existed sixty or seventy years ago, one should cultivate an intelligent perspective for social usages and ideals, as well as for the historical situation.

I was reading a volume of Emancipation Poems not long ago, and the sting of the lash on the backs of the poor, helpless slaves was the burden of many of the rhymes. Mrs. Stowe's picture of plantation life in Uncle Tom's Cabin, is still considered classic and authoritative in parts of our country—with the cruel overseer and the cringing negro as the normal condition in days before the war. There are two reasons why we should not accept Mrs. Stowe, or Whittier, or any other fervent Abolitionist, who wrote from a heated imagination and insufficient information, as presenting a sane or just picture of the old time relation between the master and the servant.

One is, as I have indicated, that it was a time when corporal punishment was the rule in family and school life, and no one seemed to doubt that the switch was a scriptural agency in the proper training of a boy.

The other is, that while there may have been parallels for many of the sad things they tell, yet granting all that, the picture they present of the slave in the South is essentially false—false, because it presents what was rare and exceptional as normal and typical. If one would take the trouble to collect every instance one could find of cruelty and neglect of children, and put them together, a respectable argument could be made against the authority of parents; or if one would mass the daily accounts one reads in the papers of martial infelicity in these piping times of divorce, one could denounce the marriage state as a mistake, both for man and woman.

While there were doubtless many instances of the misuse of the power of the master over the slave, yet we believe that, on the whole, those relations were kindly and mutually helpful; this statement is proved by the fact that while all the men, even the boys, of the South were in the army, and the negroes were left as protectors and bread winners for the women and children, not a single instance of misuse of their power is on record, but innumerable examples are known of their fidelity and devotion to their helpless charges.

Passing of the Rod.

But I have strayed a little from my subject. "Let us return to our mutton," as the French say. What is the cause of the decline and fall of corporal punishment, both in the home and the school?

I believe, it is because woman's influence and woman's voice have become a moulding force in forming social ideals. In olden days, the voice of the father and the school master was the potent and final one; now, the "still small voice" of the mother and the school mistress is heard, and is prevailing. More than three-fourths of the teachers of our land are women—was it not a foregone conclusion that when their rule began in the school room, the harsh and brutal methods that formerly obtained should depart forever?

A note of alarm has been raised of late about "feminizing the schools," and possibly with justice. In all life we want the point of view of the man as well as of the woman—we need the father heart as well as the mother love in child training.

But the school mistress and the mother stand for discipline, as well as the school master and the father—but discipline without brutality! Both would agree that in difficult and aggravated cases limited corporal punishment may be imperative. In my secret heart, I felt that the school boy in my town possibly received the discipline that was best suited to his case, when the teacher gave him a "slap on the back, below the belt;" and if I, or any woman, used to dealing with the youth of the land, had been in the judge's seat, the teacher would probably have been commended, rather than fined.

Woman's Voice for Peace.

And when the woman's voice is heard as potently in government as in the school and the home, will it not be for the elimination of brutality in the dealing of nation with nation—will women not stand for reason and justice (call it arbitration, if you will) in the settlement of difficulties, rather than a senseless resort to arms?

Nearly three millions of women now have the ballot in our country, and soon all will have the power of expressing themselves on the government of our land. When that good day comes, the "passing of the rod," as a means of settlement of international questions will also have come, and the dawn of the reign of the Prince of Peace will be nearer than ever before.

Women on Police Forces

Mayor Keller of St. Paul has announced the appointment of two women as regular members of the police department, in accordance with a recently enacted city ordinance. They assumed their duties by watching the old year out at the dance halls, where the authorities claim young girls are surrounded by bad influences. A year ago the movement reached Minneapolis where, as yet, however, only one has been appointed. A short time ago the commissioner of police of Denver appointed a woman as a member of the detective bureau, who will be entrusted with the execution of the new dance-hall ordinance and will aid in the fight against the social evil. Still more significant of the growth of the movement is the fact that there are three police women in Baltimore and one woman detective in New York. A Maryland law of 1912 provided for five, calling them "matrons to the police force," to distinguish them from "station-house matrons."

There is no true prayer without some response. Invisible wires from heaven to earth are ever virbrating with Divine blessings, and when prayertouches them, the electric stream of love enters the soul.—Newman Hall.

The church house at Beloit, Wis., built in a day some two years ago, burned to the ground last week at a loss of $2,000.

The Sunday-school offerings for American missions for the first four months of this fiscal year show a gain of $7,161 over the corresponding period last year.

Nearly $2.000 had been pledged for the Russian college at St. Petersburg at latest report. Mr. Geo. W. Kramer, 1 Madison Ave., New York, is treasurer for the committee.

Burlington Junction, Mo., church, J. W. Love, pastor, reports a net gain in membership of 57 during 1912. The offerings amounted to over $1,500, which sum was distributed for the first time by the budget plan to seven different missionary causes besides the local church.

Nashville, Tenn., churches have decided to give $10,000 to build a hospital in Tibet, to be known as the Loftis Memorial Hospital, in commemoration of Dr. Z. T. Lofts, who lost his life while engaged in mission service on "the roof of the world." Dr. Loftis had been the "living link" of Vine Street Church, Nashville.

Elmer Ward Cole and his church at Huntington, Ind., are observing the Lenten season by three special series of services one running through Sunday mornings, another through Sunday evenings and the third through Wednesday evenings. The purpose is evangelistic. During Passion Week the services will be held every evening.

Dr. Royal J. Dye, returned missionary from the Congo country, has been speaking to the colored people of our southern churches. At Nashville, Tenn., the Lea Avenue Church, of which Preston Taylor is pastor, pledged $500 toward the establishment of a hospital in China. Missionary A. E. Cory and others were present and spoke.

"Lincoln and the Twentieth Century" was the theme of an "oration" by C. C. Wilson at Perry, O., church, last Sunday night. A card bearing the announcement of the service contained a cut of Lincoln and this quotation: "I want it said of me by those who knew me best that I always plucked a thistle and planted a flower where I thought a flower would grow."

Eight Iowa City, Ia., churches are uniting in a three weeks' series of evangelistic meetings. Three pastors have been selected to preach, one week each. C. C. Rowlison, of First Christian, opened the series with six sermons on subjects as follows: "The School of Jesus." "A Christian Church." "The Christian's Secret." "Woman's Glory." "A Man's Christian," "The Marks of the Lord Jesus."

Dr. Z. T. Sweeney is preaching a series of three sermons on the topic, "Is the World Being Converted to Jesus Christ?" at Lenox Avenue Union Church, New York City. His first sermon took the position that the world is not even in a process of being converted to Christianity. The second inquired into reasons for the rapid growth of the non-Christian forces, and on last Sunday the pastor gave his remedy for the situation.

The Disciples Social Union of Philadelphia held an especially interesting meeting in Kensington Church, afternoon and evening, Jan. 22. Miss Clara Righter, missionary to China, spoke in the afternoon. The evening speaker was Rev. William B. Patterson, secretary of the Social Service Committee, Inter Church Federation, who pointed out most effectively the great problems confronting city churches, and urged united Christian action in meeting them.

Provides a "Matrimonial Parlor."

In the annex recently added to the house of worship of Central Church, Wichita, Kan., there is provided a special room called a "matrimonial parlor." The pastor, Walter Scott Priest, has solemnized many weddings in his study, which used to be on the second floor of the building, just off the auditorium. That room was small for wedding parties, so when the annex was planned for the growing Sunday-school, this novel but useful special provision was made. The annex cost $5,000.

A John the Baptist in Texas.

In a sermon preached in the Hippodrome Theater, Ft. Worth, Tex., J. O. Shelburne, of First Church, Dallas, told of a conversation he had with a wealthy manufacturer of Dallas who was converted and afterward wanted to give large sums to the church. The manufacturer had in his employ a large number of girls who were paid four dollars a week. Mr. Shelburne told him to pay the girls what they were earning before offering money to the church. Who says ministers lack back-bone?

Old Time Religion Revived.

"A Revival of the Old-time Religion" is the title under which Pastor George A. Miller characterizes a series of meetings now being held in Ninth Street Church, Washington, D. C. Some of his themes for preaching are: "The Fruits of the Old-time Religion," "Excuses for Not Accepting the Old-time Religion," "The Devil's Preaching in the Old-time Religion," "Two Opinions of the Old-time Religion," "Foolishness and Power of the Old-time Religion," "A Costly Journey Under the Old-time Religion," "The Universal Invitation of the Old-time Religion."

Miss Lemert at Springfield, Mo.

The Sunday-school campaign at Central Church, Springfield, Mo., conducted by Miss Eva Lemert, of Kansas City, is yielding noteworthy results. The attendance reached 431 on Jan. 26. Miss Lemert puts the emphasis upon efficiency, as well as the size of the school. No effort is made to have one big rally day, but rather to plan for a continuously large school equipped to do thorough Bible study. The result of the campaign is already being manifested in an awakened interest upon the part of the whole church in the Sunday-school. Officers and members are enthusiastic.

Deliberate Answer to a Great Question.

For nine weeks Pastor J. H. Goldner and his Sunday evening congregation at Euclid Avenue Church, Cleveland, made a search of the New Testament for the answer to the question, "What must I do to be saved?" Each evening a fragment of the answer was found and discussed. On the tenth evening, Feb. 2, the pastor presented "a complete, systematic, scriptural statement as to what God requires men to do in order to be saved." Dr. Loa E. Scott, whose lectures on Mormonism before the Christian women of Cleveland excited widespread interest, has been requested to repeat them on consecutive Sundays to a Bible class of Euclid Avenue Church.

A Terse and Rich Report.

H. H. Peters, pastor at Paris, Ill., would have made a good editorial writer for the Church Life department. His report of last year's activities of the church to whose leadership he was but recently called is terse and concrete. He puts the facts down thus: Resident membership, 1,089; non-resident membership, 625; total membership, 1,714. Average attendance of the Sunday-school for the year, 340; cradle roll, 151; Sunday-school of the Christian Chapel—average attendance, 44; home department, 439. Membership of the C. W. B. M., 106; King's Daughters and Sons, 128. Membership of the Christian Endeavor Society, 62. Total offering for missions, $2,281.56; total for regular work, $5,423.65; total money raised during the year, $7,705.21.

Disciples Lead Among Texas Legislators.

In a religious census of Texas' House of Representatives made by the chaplain, it was shown that fifty-nine of the ninety-nine members are church members, divided among the denominations as follows: Sixteen Disciples, sixteen Methodists, twelve Baptists, eight Presbyterians, two Cumberland Presbyterians, two Catholics, one primitive Baptist, one Friend, one Unitarian. Four of the fifty-nine are ministers. The remaining forty are friends of the churches and express their preferences as follows: Eleven prefer the Methodist church, five the Baptist church, five the Christian church, four the Presbyterian church, two the Episcopal church, one prefers the Christian Union, one prefers the Universalist church, ten have no church preference.

Southern Illinois Church Prospering.

Main St. Church. DuQuoin, Ill., has for many years and for many reasons had a considerable deficit to make up at the end of each year for current expenses. The year 1911 closed with all current bills paid and 1912 has closed with the same record, all current bills paid and money in the treasury of every department of the church, although nearly 27 per cent of the church's expenditures were for missions, education and benevolence, besides paying their minister, Charles E. Smith, a considerably larger salary than has been their custom in the past. Three things, says the pastor, mark the upward trend of the church: During the past year this congregation became a "living link" in Eureka College and will continue; a brotherhood flourished for six months and died without a spasm while the minister was away on his vacation; and the Sunday-school has adopted graded lessons which are proving a delight to most of the teachers and pupils.

Ex-Chicago Pastor's Ambition Realized.

In a personal letter from George A. Campbell he calls attention to the fact that his appreciation of Dr. C. M. Chilton in last weeks' Christian Century was of such a nature as to preclude his saying anything in praise of the Hannibal church, which, he now says, is "a splendid church—many of the leading business and professional men of the city are with us, and they are true." The offerings by this people were $15,500 in 1912, half of which was given for improvements on the church house. This recalls a farewell speech Mr. Campbell made to a company of members of the neighboring Methodist church in Austin, Chicago, when he was leaving Chicago for Hannibal some two years ago. The Methodist congregation is the largest in Chicago and quite overshadowed the modest Disciples church only a block away. "My great ambition." said the departing Campbell, "is to be pastor of a church that will be bigger than any Methodist church in town!" Judging by the good reports of his present church. he has realized his ambition, or else the Hannibal Methodists are surely "goin' some."

Dr. Guy to Go to Orient.

While our readers are enjoying the travel articles on Japan from the pen of Dr. Willett, it is interesting to note that Dr. H. H. Guy will take a student party through Japan and China, sailing from San Francisco April 19 and returning July 21. Dr. Guy's tour is under the auspices of Pacific Theological Seminary, of whose faculty he is a member, and is managed by H. W. Dunning & Co. The Japanese consul at San Francisco says this of Dr. Guy and his enterprise: "It is particularly fortunate, I think, that the students who go on the quest for knowledge have Dr. Guy for mentor, friend, interpreter, and guide. His long residence in Japan, his perfect knowledge of the Japanese language, his valued services in the missionary field, all coupled with the happy fact that he enjoys the exceptional respect and confidence of my countrymen everywhere, make of him the ideal guide. A class led by him through Japan, which he knows so well—and so sympathetically—would give educational results of inestimable value." Meanwhile the frequency and facility of these tours impresses us with the nearness of what used to be a very remote part of the world.

Prayed God for More Fishers.

Stephen E. Fisher's birthday fell on the same date as that of two of his parishioners in University Place Church, Champaign, Ill., so the pastor gave a dinner to 100 men in their honor. Incidentally advantage was taken of the situation to say certain things about the pastor which his modesty had not intended as a part of the entertainment. Of these expressions that of Dean Townsend of the State University is typical. He was talking on "The Minister and the Church" and said that the minster should bear the relation of "spiritual physician" to his people and should be a man of such broad principles that his interest will not be limited to his own congregation, but extend to the entire community in which he labors. Mr. Townsend's ideal preacher occasionally preaches a political sermon. One of the principal duties of the minister should be the development of lay leaders, who could direct the activities of the church most effectively without depending upon the minister to do all of the work. Summing up the good qualities that should belong to the preacher the Dean pointed to the pastor and said he came as near embodying them as any man he knew, and he prayed God to make as many Fishers as possible.

Would Clean Up Nation's Capital.

Vigorous and well directed talking was that of Earle Wilfley at Vermont Avenue Church, Washington, D. C., on a recent Sunday. He urged the crying need of a moral cleanup of the nation's capital. This moral cleanup Mr. Wilfley declared, should begin near the corner of Twelfth Street and Pennsylvania Avenue where houses of ill-fame were allowed to flourish within a stone's throw of a police station. This redlight district, was the first and the last thing strangers to Washington see on their trip to Mount Vernon. Other cities, the speaker said, had nothing so flaunting, so brazen. The students of three high schools, Mr. Wilfley continued, on their way to the Public Library, pass in seven squares twenty-five saloons. Within one square of Central High School and two grade schools are fourteen saloons. A map was shown by the speaker on which the schools of the city were represented by red dots, the saloons by black dots. On Pennsylvania Avenue between the Peace Monument and the White House, forty-seven licensed drinking places were counted. Many of the saloons are known to have "ladies' entrances," and some were said to have private rooms on the floors above the saloons. Mr. Wilfley declared it to be the duty of Congress to quit trifling with the Jones-Works excise bill and to meet the issue squarely. The legislators were urged to find a way to bring the bill out of the District committee and before the House for action.

In Praise of a Notable Pastorate.

W. H. Bagby writes concerning the nine years' ministry of Jesse P. McKnight at Magnolia Avenue Church, Los Angeles, Calif., an appreciative letter. Mr. McKnight began his ministry with this congregation while it was yet a mission with 87 members and has added thereto 1,245 souls. After furnshing the charter membership of two other churches and suffering the loss that comes through dismissal, the church has on her roster today, 820 names. "But the best results," says Mr. Bagby, "achieved by this splendid church under the leadership of its aggressive pastor, as is always the case, are not those that can be expressed in terms of mathematics. The walls of the edifice will crumble, the names on the roster will, in time, be transferred to tomb-stones. Only the character that has been created will abide. And this, after an acquaintance of several months. is the thing about Magnolia Church that impresses me most. It is not length of roster but depth of piety that makes a church. God's goal is not a house full of people, but a people full of his spirit. Measured by this standard, Magnolia Avenue Church does not suffer by comparison with any other known to me. In saying this I pay him who has been its teacher and leader from the beginnng, the highest compliment that can be paid a pastor." Mr. McKnight's resignation was announced in these columns recently. He has not yet accepted a call elsewhere.

A Clarion Call.

A call comes ringing over the restless waves of every ocean. Its clear note comes from every mission station in the whole world. Our Lord sounds His imperial clarion along the entire line of battle. The King's army has been halting already too long. The soldiers of the Cross have spent over-time in preparation. It is time for the whole column to move as one man upon the pagan world. The last commission of our Lord comes ringing in the imperative, "Go." We must respond quickly. God has opened the door of every nation on earth. The facilities of the modern world hasten our footsteps.

Will not the emphatic note from our workers pierce our dull ears in these days of preparation for our foreign offering? Tibet calls from the roof of the world. The Congo cries from the submerged continent. India asks with a tenderness and grace to touch the dullest of us who abide at home. China not only calls; she demands. Our missionaries call long and loud. They are overworked. Their children and wives wonder why we are so tardy in sending reinforcements.

The next month should be a period of self-examination, and devout prayer to God should be made that we may hear anew the call from the Captain of our Salvation. This is no time for deaf ears; but it is a time for prompt response.

Foreign Mission News

Transylvania University and the College of the Bible have raised the support of their living link in the Foreign Society through a very unique tag day campaign. The support is that of Miss Kate Galt Miller's school at Wuhu, China.

A great number of Sunday-schools will observe the David Livingstone Centenary in March and unveil the portrait of this great missionary on Sunday, March 16.

Mr. and Mrs. W. L. Burner of Transylvania University, who have recently been appointed to the foreign field, have been assigned to Cuba. They will go to Matanzas and take up their work there in the early fall.

The Foreign Society is very much in need of a college-trained woman who has specialized in music to go to the Girls' College in Tokyo, Japan. Her work would be that of missionary and music teacher.

During the past week the Foreign Society received the following telegram: "Palestine, Texas, L. B. Haskins, pastor, became living link today. Gave missionary address this a. m. and raised over $600 in ten minutes. Two hundred and seventy-five confessions in fourteen days." Signed Evangelist Wm. John Minges.

The Foreign Society has lost a loyal friend in the death of Mrs. Maggie C. Ferguson, Lexington, Ky., on January 16, 1913. Mrs. Ferguson was sixty-four years old and since girlhood was a member of the Christian church. In recent years she has made rapid growth in spiritual affairs. She gave $2,500 to build a home for Dr. A. L. Shelton, missionary of the Foreign Society in Batang, Tibet. She left $2,000 to the Central Church, Lexington, Ky., and $2,000 and some jewels to the C. W. B. M. She was greatly interested in missions.

Wellsville, Ohio, has recently come into the living-link column. They have already pledged $630 this year. B. R. Johnston is the minister and is a fine, energetic, enthusiastic man, a recent graduate of Bethany College.

Mr. and Mrs. Herbert Smith, missionaries of the Foreign Society at Lotumbe, Congo, Africa, have just reached America on their furlough. Brother Smith writes that they had a stormy passage, but that they are both quite well.

Miss Kate V. Johnson, Tokyo, Japan.

The Divinity of Christ

BY EDWARD SCRIBNER AMES

Is a popular statement of both the theological and practical truths centering in our evangelical faith in Christ.

It is scholarly, but not technical.

It lifts the problem of the nature and character of Christ out of the setting of the old-time dogmatism and places it in the light of the more empirical, human and meaningful thought of our own day.

Its Treatment of Unitarianism is original, fresh, illuminating. A single chapter entitled, "Why I am not a Unitarian" will furnish any reader, conservative or liberal, a new point of view.

It is glowing with religious earnestness. It is a living word spoken to the hearts and souls of living people.

Appreciations

Professor George A. Coe says: "These sermons display a remarkable union of intellectual boldness and spiritual warmth. I know of nothing else in print that brings out quite so clearly the positive religious values that can be reached by a rigorous application to Christian dogmas of the functional and valuational point of view. Even readers who cannot accept Professor Ames' position at all points must agree that such a book helps to clear the air, and to focus attention at the right point."

The Indianapolis News says: "One would go far to find a finer interpretation of religious thought and experience in terms of spiritual laws. Mr. Ames is emphatically a man with a message."

The Chicago Inter-Ocean says: "Six sermons full of broad humanity."

The Watchman says: "Professor Ames is avowedly a "liberal" in theology but his liberalism seems to be of a wholesome kind, in the sense that he is less concerned about doctrines and creeds than he is about service and the helping of people to their best life."

The Independent says: "Dr. Ames does not deny being a liberal, but strongly objects to being styled a 'Unitarian', quoting with enthusiasm a saying of one of the early leaders of his denomination: 'I am neither a Unitarian nor a Trinitarian, but strive to be simply a Christian.' The sermons are thoughtful, moderate in tone and straightforward in expression."

Unity says: "Those who were privileged to listen to these sermons must have found their spiritual natures quickened."

The Advance says: "These are strong, virile sermons, appealing to the reason and satisfying the heart."

Professor Edward C. Moore, of Harvard, says: "It is a very clear and convincing statement of the issue as it stands in the minds of modern men. It makes us realize how the old formulation of the question has become obsolete, no one any longer states the question in the old terms. Dr. Ames has availed himself in admirable fashion of the opportunity for a new statement of the case, and the spirit in which he writes must convey confidence and reassurance to all."

writes that she is just recovering from an attack of influenza. She says five of the children have been sick with it and several of their best workers are seriously ill. Their pastor has been unable to speak for them for two months and the only young man in the church able to supply is down with typhoid fever. She says further that the Christians are growing spiritually and the Sunday-school is back to its former numbers.

Geo. W. Brown, Jubbulpore, India, writes, "We are rushing on the press building (the press building that was recently destroyed by fire). There are many things to delay it, but we are doing fairly well. I think the walls will be practically up in fifteen more days. Of course, there will be considerable still to do. The roof and floors will have to be laid and the walls plastered. I hope we may have it done by the time of the convention in March."

Mr. P. A. Sherman, Bilaspur, India, writes: "Just before the hodilays we enjoyed very much a little visit from Mr. Jackson of Scotland, formerly one of our missionaries in Mungeli. He is traveling in India in the interest of the Christian Literature Society, with whom he has been employed for nineteen years."

During the month of February 147 churches contributed to foreign missions, an increase over the corresponding month last year of thirty-four. A good sign. The individual gifts amounted to $4,884, a gain of $2,229. There was also a gain in the number of contributing Sunday-schols. The total receipts for the month were $9,940, a gain of $1,216.

The total receipts for the first four months of the current missionary year amounted to $29,691, a gain of $6,033. There was a gain in the regular receipts of $8,603. The individual gfts amounted to $14,506, an increase of $9,131. The annuity gifts sustained a loss of $2,100.

Last week a friend sent $5,000, a direct gift for the work of the Foreign Society. A number of such gifts are needed most urgently for the growing work.

It will be remembered that Dr. Hardy is a son of our well known Brother Hardy, Nashville, Tenn., at present financial agent of Transylvania Unversity.

Austin Church gave a reception last week to its new pastor, A. R. McQueen, and Mrs. McQueen.

E. S. Ames, of Hyde Park Church, has returned from Harvard University, where he filled the first half of his engagement as university preacher. During the three Sundays of his absence his pulpit was supplied by Prof. W. D. MacClintock, Orvis F. Jordan and C. C. Morrison.

It was woman's day at Monroe Street Church last Sunday. Mrs. M. E. Harlan, C. W. B. M. national secretary, was present and made an address.

Englewood Church is expecting to dedicate its new Sunday-school and gymnasium annex on the first Sunday in March. The structure is costing about $25,000 and will lend itself helpfully to the diverse activities of this congregation. Pastor C. G. Kindred will be assisted in the dedicatory exercises by George H. Snively of Lewistown, Ill., who will remain a few days after for evangelistic services.

Dr. Charles S. Medbury, pastor University Church, Des Moines, Ia., brought a great message to the congregation of Metropolitan Church on Thursday evening of last week. It was one of the services of the week set apart for dedicating the People's Institute building recently purchased by Metropolitan Church. Dr. Medbury spoke on "The Church" and traced out with delicate and illuminating argument the lines of influence reaching from the church first to the individual member and secondly to every citizen of the community not a member of the church. Every soul went away with a more adequate appreciation of the church. The other services of the week were addressed by S. S. Lappin, of Cincinnati, P. H. Welshimer, of Canton, O., and J. H. O. Smith, of Oklahoma City, Okla. Groups from all Disciple churches in the city attended the several meetings, drawn by their interest in the well-known speakers and their desire to encourage the Metropolitan people in their heroic undertaking. The climax of the week came on Sunday when J. H. O. Smith, who preached five years in the Institute as pastor of the Union Christian Church, spoke and led in the raising of funds. Mr. and Mrs. J. C. Breeden, who gave $30,000 to the work of this church some years ago, came from their home down state and were introduced to the congregation. Pledges were made to the amount of $14,400 by the congregation in which Dr. Scoville, the pastor, led with a $5,000 gift. The old property of Metropolitan Church on the corner of Oakley and Van Buren streets is now rented for business purposes and yields the church an income of $70 per month above the interest due on its mortgage. People's Institute property contains several offices and ness etaoin shrdlu cmfwyp vbgkqj etaoin church to carry its unprovided indebtedness. Dr. Scoville and his evangelistic company will continue in a meeting until March 10, when they go to Lincoln, Nebr., for a union meeting, after which they will return to Chicago permanently to prosecute the work at Metropolitan Church.

Ten Big Reasons Why

BETHANY GRADED LESSONS are being adopted by so many of the best schools among Disciples

1. There is more to them—at least a third more—than is contained in any other series.
2. They are rich, vital and full of suggestion to teacher and pupil.
3. They are free from the sectarian spirit.
4. They are soundly and fervently evangelical.
5. They are truly artistic in all their illustrations.
6. They are printed on better paper with better binding and in better taste than any other series.
7. Every lesson writer is an expert of interdenominational reputation.
8. They are a monument to the modern spirit of unity—a dozen leading denominations have co-operated to produce them and are now using them.
9. The Disciples possess full editorial rights, through the editor. Charles Clayton Morrison.
10. Every Disciple school that uses them participates in and promotes a great Christian union enterprise.

EVERY QUARTER ADDS TO THE NUMBER OF SCHOOLS INTRODUCING THESE LESSONS.

Disciples Publication Society

THE DISCIPLES PUBLICATION SOCIETY is a corporation chartered under the laws of Illinois. It is organized for the purpose of publishing books, Sunday School literature and a weekly religious newspaper. It has no capital stock. Its profits are not to go to individuals but to be appropriated to advance the cause of religious education, especially the higher education of the Christian ministry. The term "religious education" is regarded as an ideal common to Sunday Schools, missionary societies, colleges, seminaries and universities, and other organizations that promote Christian progress through Christian education. The Society through its trustees has purchased the entire assets and good will of the New Christian Century Company (including the subscription list and good will of The Christian Century; a contract of participation in the interdenominational syndicate for publishing the Bethany Graded Lessons; a contract of membership in the United Religious Press; all books, Sunday School supplies and other stock on hand; all accounts and bills receivable; besides assuming liability for all accounts and bills payable), for $16,000 and has executed its notes to that amount which have been accepted by the stock-holders of the New Christian Century Company in payment for their property. To provide capital for enlarging the business the trustees are issuing 5 per cent bonds in the amount of $50,000, retirable after five years, to be sold to persons interested in the ideals of The Christian Century. It is believed at the present time that not more than $25,000 of these bonds need be sold in order to put the Society on a sound profit earning basis. Subscriptions for the purchase of these bonds are now being solicited by C. C. Morrison and H. L. Willett, editors of The Christian Century. During Dr. Willett's absence in the Orient correspondence may be addressed exclusively to Mr. Morrison. Full information as to all details will be given upon inquiry. The essential purpose of the transaction and proposals herein described is to provide a way for the general brotherhood of the Disciples of Christ to buy The Christian Century and its publishing house and to pay for them by patronizing them. The bonds and notes are to be retired out of the profits earned by the Society. The purchasers of bonds, therefore, will stand, with the holders of notes, in the position of sustainers or supporters of the enterprise while the brotherhood's patronage is paying for it and increasing its value. The question of defining the membership of the Disciples Publication Society is still open, and upon it the organizers will be glad to receive suggestions. It is the purpose to make it thoroughly democratic and representative. The five trustees named by the charter will act for the Society until the basis of membership has been determined and the members elected.

THE EDITORS' CORRESPONDENCE

This week we are impelled by the accumulating files of letters of congratulation to give over much of this "shop-talk page" to the messages of our friends. Meantime it is our earnest hope that many decisions will be made to support the Disciples' Publication Society. Our correspondence bearing directly upon this aspect of our common enterprise is not for publication, of course, except as extracts of letters may be used to correct a misunderstanding or to further illuminate our plans. We are receiving many encouraging letters, some subscriptions to the bonds, and some fine suggestions as to the organization of the Society. Two excellent suggestions have been received with respect to the constitution of membership in the Society. Both look in the same direction, but one is somewhat more precisely worked out than the other. Both look in the direction of making the Society thoroughly democratic and representative. Let all our readers read again the last paragraph in the standing announcement at the head of this page and bear in mind that the final form of the Disciples Publication Society has not yet been determined.

But bear this also in mind: that the immediate task is the capitalization of the enterprise. Sign the blank in the corner of this page and mail to us. Or simply write us indicating what amount of the bonds you will purchase on condition that $25,000 is subscribed for.

The following letters have been received:

By G. W. WATSON, Lafayette, Ind.

It is my hope that the change to the Disciples Publication Society will make it possible to give us an enlarged "Century" but not one changed in tone. Accept my best wishes for the new year.

By PROF. E. B. WAKEFIELD, Hiram, O.

I do want The Century to prosper.

By C. C. BUCKNER, Chicago.

I cannot quite see how the "Century" is to become the property of the brotherhood and representative by your announced change, but it does seem to me that it will belong to us more than any other paper. It will be ours just to the extent that we invest in it. I wish you success.

By A. H. SEYMOUR, Volga, S. D.

I offer hearty congratulations on the plans you are undertaking, and only regret that it is impracticable for me to give any material aid.

By O. C. BOLMAN, Pekin, Ill.

I congratulate you on the realization of your plans to make The Christian Century a brotherhood paper. I am glad to have fellowship with men who think even when they think thoughts that are not in harmony with my own. Lead on brethren in the great search for truth, for truth only will live.

By I. N. GRISSO, Indianapolis, Ind.

I am pleased to know that the Disciples are to have a brotherhood paper emphasizing the need of training leaders for leadership.

By N. M. RAGLAND, Fayetteville, Ark.

My dear Bro. Morrison: In my heart I congratulate you and Dr. Willett on your efforts to place The Christian Century in the ownership and control of the Disciples, and wish you abundant success in this enterprise, which means so much to the cause we all love.

By EUGENE N. DUTY, Charleroi, Pa.

I am delighted to know of the contemplated change in The Christian Century to a brotherhood paper and feel that as such there is a much greater field of service open to you.

By WILLIS A. PARKER, Pomona College.

I have said nothing of the proposed change of ownership of the "Century." I am jealous for the future of the paper. If the change means that the program of the paper is to be changed, I am against it. The "Century" is the hope of our people. Without it I should despair of our movement—or else I should start some such protest against sectarianism as the "Century" now voices.

By E. B. BAGBY, Baltimore, Md.

I wish to express my appreciation of the energetic thought and fine literary quality of the "Century" editorials and wish you great success in your plan for a brotherhood paper.

By GEO. T. PURVES. Tucson, Ariz.

I rejoice in your forward movement and hope your fondest anticipations may be realized.

By RICHARD DICKINSON, Eureka, Ill.

Your letter with the announcement of the new project for the "Century" was received during my absence. The proposition is a large one for me to grasp at once, but on the whole, it looks to me to be favorable. The ideals expressed as to its ownership are certainly commendable. While the endowment or ownership by the brotherhood generally is good for a "middle of the road" institution, it looks to me that it might handicap a magazine whose mission it is to lead, but at that, it looks as though your plan would provide a sufficient barometer of public sentiment to be a safe guide in shaping future policies. As one who has had to look a pay roll in the face fifty-two times a year, I can imagine the feeling of relief in this direction which the proposed change would hold. With my best wishes for your continued success in the regime.

CHARLES CLAYTON MORRISON,
700 E. 40th Street, Chicago.

I am interested in doing what I can to aid you and Dr. Willett in your plan for firmly establishing The Christian Century in the ownership and control of the Disciples. Kindly send me additional information. How long do the bonds extend? In what financial condition does the new Society begin business? Can you accept payment for bonds on the installment plan or must you have immediate cash for entire amount subscribed?

The Menace of Missions

THE MISSIONARY SPIRIT rocked ancient Rome to its foundations. A Gibbon exhausts his genius to account for the transformation wrought by Christianity throughout the Empire. He balks at miracles, and affirms that conditions were favorable for the reception of the doctrines of the new faith. The early conquests are still the wonder of the world. To the authorities in those far off days Christianity was always a menace, a disturber, a revolutionist.

Back of the message were men of tremendous daring and enthusiasm. Life to them was the fulfillment of their mission. If that could be realized by dying they welcomed the scaffold as a boon. For the sake of the cross they risked all things, endured all, and gained all. But the stake on which all their triumphs hung was life. All preaching, all labors, all sacrifices, looked to the one end—the redemption of the world through the giving of themselves. Such men are always a menace to the ancient order.

The church needs men with that same spirit today. If in the pulpits the sacrificial message is sounded out there will be a response in the pews. If there is some large degree of abandonment of selfish interests in the pulpit there will be a corresponding abandonment in the pew. The pew is always a reflection of the pulpit; as the preacher thinks and feels so do his hearers. Every congregation is a photograph of the preacher's inner life, if he has been in the pulpit long enough to make deep impressions upon his people. If the preacher is morose he will have that type of congregation; if he is vivacious the congregation will grow in his likeness; if he is deeply doctrinal or spiritual in his preaching he will reap his reward in the response of the pew. If he is an ardent missionary advocate he will find his hearers warming with him, seeing as he sees, and desiring what he desires. We surely need the men in the pulpit to give us sight and sense to apprehend the greatness of the missionary enterprise, and its bearing in so many divers ways upon the life of a congregation.

Such men are a menace. For them we pay a great price. Congregations are disturbed and some would say annoyed by their presence. They have the gift of jolting us, we frequently hear it said, into doing things we have never done; they will never give us a breathing spell. So runs the dreary chiding. It is missions this year and a large offering; missions next year and a larger offering. O, when will this mission task cease to be laid upon us! It is the result, brethren, of having men to preach to you who have a large measure of the apostolic spirit. They are a menace to your ease. You as a miniature Rome are doing what the imperial empire did—you are facing a new condition in the world, and must go forward in accordance with its demands, or go down under it as it goes forward. The church can dismiss that menace to its love of ease and call his successor at a larger salary, giving him to understand in the beginning that while Pastor A was a splendid man, and loved almost to limpness by the congregation, he didn't know us, and rubbed the fur the wrong way at times.

The new preacher rubs everybody in the direction toward which all the powers of gravitation in the universe are pulling. He is not a menace, but there is always a possibility that after his initial grooming he will be so colorless about many issues that he will lull all into the sleep of the just under the mellifluous drippings of the sanctuary. He will labor for an offering that will not arouse anyone to praise or to blame. And a brilliant success will crown his efforts. He is not a menace, but he would be greater and stronger if he were. It is better for us all to close our labors in this world under the encomium, he did well, rather than he meant well. "He meant well," as a general rule is the fine phrase that covers our failures with a compliment.

And missions will ever be a menace to the churches until they treat that great cause fairly. Missions are never a menace to those who feel an interest. The generous do not shrink from the approach of the first Sunday in March. The real missionary spirits in every congregation look forward to the sunrise of that day. It is a day of reckoning with conscience, of fidelity to a great task and to the Captain of our salvation. On that day we are weighed in the balances. It will be to our shame if we are found wanting. There is no menace to the man who is bent on being as well disposed to the enterprise founded on the Great Commission as he is to his own pleasures, or to the man who boasts that he pays every debt he owes in this world, but who never figures that he owes a debt to the future, to the needy in all lands, which he never includes in the list that occasions his honest boast. It is easy to pay a debt of that kind; it ought to be as easy to pay the debts we owe for things eternal. It is well at the beginning of each year that men can say, "I am free from debt." It is well also if they can say, "I shall pay my debt to Christ this year in better ways than I have ever done; I shall pray more for the extension of his Kingdom; I shall labor to that end; I shall give of the increase of my substance; I shall give myself." And such payment of a debt always makes one the richer. It is God's way of having us all, unconsciously, perhaps, raise ourselves into immortality. It is on the same plane with that wisdom which sows the heathen land with devoted men and women that a harvest of Christian living may appear; the wisdom of losing life that it may be found; the wisdom of service in darkened lands that the darkness itself may break into glory.

Eight Hour Day Movement in Britain

A resolution calling for an eight-hour day for all classes of workmen and workwomen was adopted by the Trades' Union congress at which more than 2,000,000 British working men and women are represented in London. The agitation for an eight-hour day without any overtime has been in progress for some time under the auspices of the parliamentary committee of the Trades Union congress, whose intention is to secure an eight-hour day or a forty-eight hour week for every member of every union allied with the congress. This means practically all organized labor in the United Kingdom. The miners already have an eight-hour day, fixed by law, but outside of London nearly all workmen have longer hours of labor. This has caused removal of shipbuilding and other works from the south of England to the north and to Scotland, because the southern contractors found it impossible to compete with the northerners, owing to the different conditions of labor. In the mercantile marine and transport industries, where fixed hours are impossible, the demand will be made for an arrangement of work such as will secure a corresponding reduction in work done by any one man in a week. A vigorous campaign for the settlement of the men's demands by conditions between employers and workmen is to be carried out and steps are to be taken to bring the whole force of the organized workmen to bear upon any trade which has definitely refused to come to terms. Notices are to be handed in March to those employers refusing the demand, and all contracts with them will be terminated at the end of April, when the men will walk out.

A POEM OF THE SOCIAL AWAKENING

"Scum O' The Earth."

At the gate of the West I stand,
On the isle where the nations throng.
We call them "scum o' the earth";

Stay, are we doing you wrong,
Young fellow from Socrates' land?—
You, like a Hermes so lissome and strong,
Fresh from the master Praxiteles' hand?
So you're of Spartan birth?
Descended, perhaps, from one of the band—
Deathless in story and song—
Who combed their long hair at Thermopylæ's pass? . . .
Ah, I forget the straits, alas!
More tragic than theirs, more compassion-worth,
That have doomed you to march in our "immigrant class"
Where you're nothing but "scum o' the earth."

You Pole with the child on your knee,
What dower bring you to the land of the free?
Hark! does she croon
That sad little tune
That Chopin once found on his Polish lea
And mounted in gold for you and for me?
Now a ragged young fiddler answers
In wild Czech melody
That Dvorak took whole from the dancers.
And the heavy faces bloom
In the wonderful Slavic way;
The little, dull eyes, the brows a-gloom,
Suddenly dawn like the day.
While, watching these folk and their mystery,
I forget that they're nothing worth;
That Bohemians, Slovaks, Croatians,
And men of all Slavic nations
Are "polacks"—and "scum o' the earth."

Genoese boy of the level brow,
Lad of the lustrous, dreamy eyes
Astare at Manhattan's pinnacles now
In the first, sweet shock of a hushed surprise;
Within your far-rapt seer's eyes
I catch the glow of the wild surmise
That played on the "Santa Maria's" prow
In that still gray dawn,
Four centuries gone,
When a world from the wave began to rise.
Oh, it's hard to foretell what high emprise
Is the goal that gleams
When Italy's dreams
Spread wing and sweep into the skies.
Cæsar dreamed him a world ruled well;
Dante dreamed heaven out of hell;
Angelo brought us there to dwell;
And you, are you of a different birth?—
You're only a "dago"—and "scum o' the earth"!

Stay, are we doing you wrong
Calling you "scum o' the earth,"
Man of the sorrow-bowed head,
Of the features tender yet strong,—
Man of the eyes full of wisdom and mystery
Mingled with patience and dread?
Have not I known you in history,
Sorrow-bowed head?
Were you the poet-king, worth
Treasures of Ophir unpriced?
Were you the prophet, perchance, whose art
Foretold how the rabble would mock
That shepherd of spirits, erelong,
Who should carry the lambs on his heart
And tenderly feed his flock?
Man—lift that sorrow-bowed head.
Lo! 'tis the face of the Christ!

The vision dies at its birth.
You're merely a butt for our mirth.
You're a "sheeny"—and therefore despised
And rejected as "scum o' the earth."

Countrymen, bend and invoke
Mercy for us blasphemers,
For that we spat on these marvelous folk,
Nations of darers and dreamers,
Scions of singers and seers,
Our peers, and more than our peers.
"Rabble and refuse," we name them
And "scum o' the earth," to shame them.
Mercy for us of the few, young years,
Of the culture so callow and crude,
Of the hands so grasping and rude,
The lips so ready for sneers
At the sons of our ancient more-than-peers.
Mercy for us who despise
Men in whose loins our Homer lies;
Mothers of men who shall bring to us
The glory of Titian, the grandeur of Huss;
Children in whose frail arms shall rest
Prophets and singers and saints of the West.

Newcomers all from the Eastern seas,
Help us incarnate dreams like these.
Forget, and forgive, that we did you wrong.
Help us to father a nation, strong
In the comradeship of an equal birth,
In the wealth of the richest bloods of earth.

—Robert Haven Schauffler.

Episcopal Cathedral at Anking

The permanency of the work of the Protestant Episcopal Church in the missionary district of Wuhu, China, is guaranteed now by the splendid cathedral consecrated recently at Anking. The cathedral is a noble demonstration of Chinese workmanship under both inspiration and supervision. The remarkable thing is that it cost only $10,000. Such an edifice in this country would have cost not less than $50,000, according to the Living Church, a splendid argument in itself for the multiplied power of missionary money.

Liberal Patriarch Dead

Joachim, Patriarch of Constantinople, is dead. This news may not mean much to the superficial reader of our newspapers, but to students of world religion it means much. Joachim was the hierarch who audaciously tried to modify the fasts of the Greek Church, from a hygienic point of view. But the Holy Synod opposed his move, and Joachim threatened to abdicate. This Patriarch also disclosed his liberalism in a public statement of his "desire that the cordial relations between Orthodox Greek and Anglican Churches should continue as during the occupancy of his predecessor, Constantine V., and even that more energetic action should be taken in the future than in the past."

Italian Episcopalians in New York City

The consecration last month of the Italian Church of San Salvatore, in New York City, by Bishop Burch (Protestant Episcopal) is a significant news item as showing which way the wind is blowing among Italians who have left the fatherland. The church plant is valued at about $100,000. It is an outgrowth of an Italian mission begun years ago by Grace Episcopal Church. Canon George F. Nelson, D. D., of the Cathedral of St. John the Divine, preached the consecration sermon in Italian. Bishop Burch himself read the Episcopal consecration service in Italian. A choir of forty Italian voices rendered the music of the occasion. Occasionally, one reads of Roman Catholic Italians who quietly excommunicate themselves by entering the communion of the Episcopal Church.

Roman Catholic Modernism

There are signs that the Holy Father's recent encyclical letter on Modernism, is being ignored in certain Roman Catholic quarters. Last October at Naples the Modernists of Italy held a congress. Priests and laymen were in attendance, chiefly from the southern provinces of Italy. The next annual session will be held in Rome, just a few hundred feet away from the "prison" of the man who tried to crush the whole thing. Now comes the announcement that the brilliant French Modernist, Abbe Albert Houtin, has just published an extensive history of Modernism. In England, Miss Maud C. Petre, the brilliant Catholic scholar, has just published her monumental life of Father George Tyrrell. Just how Modernism has died out since the papal encyclical, is hard to be seen. It seems to be a lively corpse.

Needed: More Naval Chaplains

A great Christian campaign for more chaplains in the United States navy should be waged. The enlisted strength allowed by law is 47,500 men and apprentice seamen. The naval enlistment stays around 40,000 men. When it is considered that there are only twenty-four chaplains among these 40,000 men scattered all over the world, away from home ties and home influences, the inadequacy of the naval chaplaincy is apparent. Hence, the need for more naval chaplains. Again, the naval chaplaincy has been an inconsequential one without change for seventy years, and it is time that Senators and Representatives were interested in the moral welfare of our homeless lads subjected to every conceivable temptation. The Churchman (New York) deserves unstinted praise for its work in enlisting the active interest and support of the nine men, who represent one-fourth of the membership of the House and Senate Committee on Naval Affairs.

Episcopalian Sunday Schools

In a period of five years, 1908-1913, there has been an increase of only sixty-eight in the Sunday School enrollment of the Protestant Episcopal Church, in the United States. In 1908 there were 436,795 pupils, while in 1912 there were 436,863, according to the Living Church (Milwaukee). In the same period, the records show that 252,638 infants were christened. Dean C. S. Lewis, of Indianapolis, editor of the Sunday School page of the Living Church, hazards a guess "that is possibly a fair one: out of that number of baptized children we should have won to the schools from 50,000 to 80,000, while as a matter of fact we have only increased our number by sixty-eight."

Recent Christian Union News

—Here is an example of Christian union between two parishes, aggregating 232 members. In Louisville, Ky., the other day, the Presbytery of Louisville effected the organic union of Immanuel Presbyterian church and West Broadway Reformed church. The two congregations, now indissolubly wedded, will be known as the Immanuel Presbyterian Church of Louisville. The consolidation was consummated by an agreement between a committee of the Reformed Board of Pittsburg and representatives of the Church Erection Board of the Presbyterian Church in the United States of America. The consideration was the payment to the Church Erection Fund of the Reformed Church the amount of $6,400 for money invested in the Broadway church property. The Reformed Presbyterian Church had been established as a mission in 1902 and as a church in 1905, and being desirous of uniting with the Presbyterian Church petitioned the Presbytery of Louisville on November 17, 1911, to take them under its care.

—Rev. S. A. King, D. D., LL. D., of Austin, Texas, comes out boldly in the Presbyterian Advance with a suggestion for Presbyterian union. He advocates "a union in the United States of all the Reformed Churches holding the Presbyterian system." He plainly says: "The evils and the distress of the present conditions are not so apparent nor so keenly felt in those sections of our country where only one of the separate families of Presbyterians is present in the field; or in the larger cities where there is room for numerous 'particular churches.' But in smaller towns, or in country districts, where there are churches labeled U. S. A., U. S., U. P., or A. R. P., all in the same field, and among whom there is more or less of rivalry and competition, the condition is far from desirable." Dr. King advocates this merger of all Presbyterian bodies on the basis of three Provincial Assemblies, the territory of one to include the states now partially occupied by the Southern Assembly, another, the states north and northeast of this, and the third, the Pacific and Rocky Mountain States. He would be "glad if the Southern Church would take the initiative." The Southern Presbyterians and United Presbyterians are now courting each other in negotiations looking toward denominational union.

—This leads to the news that committees appointed by the United and Southern Presbyterian General Assemblies have met and already agreed upon a basis of union between the two churches. These committees will report their actions to their several national bodies next May in Atlanta. Just what the proposed basis is apparently cannot be discovered, according to Rev. F. M. Spencer, D. D., writing in The United Presbyterian. He suggests that assembly action be deferred to 1914 by referring the Basis of Union to the Assembly of 1914, rather than by acting thereupon itself in 1913.

—News of the rapid consummation of the union between Baptists and Free Will Baptists is current. It is predicted that within the next two or three years the Free Will Baptists as a denomination will have disappeared entirely. The Free Will Baptists have 90,000 adherents and a history dating from 1780. The basis of union between the two bodies was agreed upon in 1908. Since that date sentiment has crystallized through the various congregations until it is now assured that the census man will have one denomination less to reckon upon in a very short period. The reason the union is slow lies mainly in the independency of the two bodies, the polity of both being strictly congregational.

—Still other news gives cause for genuine rejoicing. When Anglicans, Congregationalists, Methodists and Presbyterians can get together, surely the day is not far off when there will be in fact but "one fold." That they can get together is the implication of the news item revealing how these four bodies have actually united their seminarial interests by affiliating together with McGill University at Montreal, Canada. The union of four Protestant theological seminaries is a long step forward, particularly so when the seminaries are backed by so different a constituency as may be imagined in the four religious bodies already mentioned. These theological schools, according to the Congregationalist (Boston), "have united their faculties for common instruction of all their theological curricula, thus making a faculty of sixteen professors, with much larger classes than they have been having, and much better opportunity for specializing in their respective subjects, since the number of lectures required of each is diminished."

—And so we have spread on this page a union between two congregations of different sects; a proposed union of all the members of the great Presbyterian family; a union proposition between two members of one family and the rapid realization of another union actually begun between two members of another family, and finally a union of four theological seminaries of four entirely different denominational families.

The Business of the Church

Every church in existence is organized under the great commission as its charter. It goes without saying that an institution must comply with the conditions of its charter or forfeit its right to exist. The one work of the church as set forth in its charter is that of evangelizing the world. It is while engaged in this work that she has the right to claim the glorious promise of the continual presence of her Founder. Alexander Campbell had something like this in mind when he said, "The church of right is, and ought to be, a great missionary society. Her field is the whole earth, from sea to see, and from the Euphrates to the last domicile of man. A Christian community without missions and missionaries would be a solecism in creation, and a deviation from the order, the economy, and the government of the universe. It is through the church that the manifold wisdom of God is to be made known to the principalities and powers in the heavenly places. This is according to the eternal purpose which he purposes in Christ Jesus our Lord."

The example of Jesus has compelling force for his disciples. He sought out the needy and freely gave them of the richnes of his grace. The church that pretends to represent Jesus is false to him if it has no concern for any one outside of its own boundaries. Is God love? Are there anywhere on the earth human beings that do not know this? If we know that God is love and that the lives of millions are made miserable by their belief in demons and cruel gods, is a special text of Scripture needed to show us our duty? Will it not be our delight to tell the good news? Normal human beings like to follow in the footsteps of their heroes. Jesus is the great spiritual hero of the Christian. He allowed nothing to cause him to swerve from his duty to the ignorant and sinful. We have a weak admiration for him if we are content to receive the benefit of Christianity and civilization without making an effort to share our blessings with all the world.

He who would know the truth must share it. Salvation is something more than an individual experience. The saved individual is a social being. He lives with and for other persons. He recognizes that the gospel of his salvation is the gospel of universal salvation. There is nothing peculiar to himself or his circumstances that entitles him to a happiness that is denied to other human beings. The most degraded man and the lowest savage races have a right to know what God has prepared for them that love him. When a man begins to boast about superior races and superior individuals it is time to remind him that it is the habit of ignorant persons to boast and that it is a characteristic of the Christian to show his appreciation of any good he may have received by offering it to others.

In this age we must have a universal religion or no religion. We cannot retire into some little corner of the universe with our gods and there worship them with undisturbed minds. Science has demonstrated the unity of the material universe. The behavior of a falling apple is like that of the moon and the planets. Neither the head nor the heart is satisfied with a worship that does not have for its object the Lord of the whole universe. If we admit that there is some knowledge of the eternal goodness. But to many religious peoples the Christian must say, "What therefore ye worship in ignorance, that I set forth unto you." A religion that is for all men cannot be the possession of a few men who refuse to proclaim it to all the world. The anti-missionary church becomes anti-Christian. Its theology becomes a war about words and its love grows cold.

Formerly it was said by objectors to missions that when God wanted the non-Christian nations converted he would convert them. Nowadays we know that when God wants something done on this earth he puts it into the heart of his people to do it. And leaders are needed for his work. The business of evangelizing the world is too great to be managed by intellectual and spiritual weaklings. Men of vision and courage are needed. The church is fortunate when it has watchmen who warn it not of danger to its doctrinal standards but of the danger that it will fail to impress itself upon the life of the world. These watchmen know what is happening in the world. They keep the church informed of what its work is and of the methods by which it is to do its full task. They do not allow it to be undisturbed while it is doing the work of today by methods that were outgrown yesterday. (Midweek Service, Feb. 26. Matt. 28:16-20; Mark 16:14-20; Luke 24-44-49; Acts 1-8.)

Essays and Reviews Once More

A few weeks since I apostrophized the volume entitled "Essays and Reviews." This week I write about it.

As many of our readers know, it introduced to the Episcopal Church in England, through some of its most prominent members, lay and clerical, a few of the conclusions in theology which had been received with great favor in circles of scholarship. It discussed the evidential value of miracles, the traditional evidences of Christianity, the tendencies of religious thought in Britain, and subjects akin to these; and though in our time the positions of the writers seem stale and commonplace, so familiar is the modern man with them all, when they appeared they aroused a storm of opposition which stirred the ecclesiastical teapot of Great Britain as it had not been stirred in years before, and, certainly, as it has not been stirred since, with the possible exception of the furore created by Bishop Colenso's publication of his work on the Pentateuch.

At first it fell from the press unnoticed. But as reviews of it began to appear, the storm gathered strength. All England stood aghast. The frenzies of the frantic broke all bounds and refused to be confined or abridged. Some thought that the end of the world had come; others were sure that Christianity was "beating funeral marches to the grave." Men who had slept soundly on many issues that were raised since their ordination now girded their sword upon their thigh and went out to slay the grim Apollyon. William Temple, headmaster at Rugby and Arnold's successor, had written the first essay, and though there was nothing in it that could be construed as offensive, yet his connection with the volume made the friends of the great school uneasy, and they tried to induce him to write a repudiation of his effort. But William Temple knew full well that if a school could not stand what honest men believed to be the light of truth, it might as well go under first as last, and he refused to fly the flag of distress. He believed that what was in the volume was worthy the attention of the English Church, and he defended his positions with the valor and skill of a loyal knight of the true.

A passage or two from his letters to the Bishop of London will reveal something of his temper. One is as follows: "Many years ago you urged us from the university pulpit to undertake the critical study of the Bible. You said that it was a dangerous study, but indispensable. You described its difficulties, and those who listened must have felt a confidence (as I assuredly did, for I was there) that if they took your advice and entered on the task, you, at any rate, would never join in treating them unjustly if their study had brought with it the difficulties you described. Such a study, so full of difficulties, imperatively demands freedom for its condition. To tell a man to study, and yet bid him, under heavy penalties, come to the same conclusions with those who have not studied, is to mock him. If the conclusions are prescribed, the study is precluded."

Once again: "What can be a grosser superstition than the theory of literal interpretation? But because that has a regular footing it is to be treated as a good man's mistake, while the courage to speak the truth about the first chapter of Genesis is a wanton piece of wickedness."

Confusion became worse confounded. Archbishop Denison insisted that the essayists be treated with great severity, as he said, "for the sake of the young who are tainted, and corrupted, and thrust almost to hell by the action of this book." At another time he declared: "Of all books in any language which I ever laid my hands on, this is incomparably the worst; it contains all the poison which is to be found in Thomas Paine's 'Age of Reason,' while it has the additional disadvantage of having been written by clergymen."

The leader in the crusade against the authors of the volume was Samuel Wilberforce, Bishop of Oxford. An eminent critic says of him:

"The gifted son of William Wilberforce, who had been honored throughout the world for his efforts in the suppression of the slave trade, he had been rapidly advanced in the English Church, and was at this time a prelate of wide influence. He was eloquent and diplomatic, witty and amiable, always sure to be with his fellow-churchmen and polite society against uncomfortable changes. Whether the struggle was against the slave power in the United States, or the squirearchy in Great Britain, or the evolution theory of Darwin, or the new views promulgated by the Essayists and Reviewers, he was always the suave spokesman of those who opposed every innovator and "besought him to depart out of their coasts." Mingling in curious proportions a truly religious feeling with care for his own advancement, his remarkable power in the pulpit gave him great strength to carry out his purpose, and his charming facility in being all things to all men, as well as his skill in avoiding the consequences of his many mistakes, gained him the sobriquet of "Soapy Sam." If such brethren of his in the episcopate as Thirwall and Selwyn and Tait might claim to be in the apostolic succession, Wilberforce was no less surely in the succession from the most gifted and eminently respectable Sadducees who held high preferment under Pontius Pilate."

In time, and after various ecclesiastical trials and heart-breaking experiences the nation recovered its sanity, and "it was found that, after all, there existed even among churchmen a great mass of public opinion in favor of giving a full hearing to the reverent expression of honest thought, and inclined to distrust any cause which subjected fair play to zeal."

Of course the reconcilers were on hand, determined to prove that "A is B" and "A is not B" are but different ways of saying the same thing. They received their rewards, as that class always does, and forthwith retired to parsonages of plenty, and preserved an unbroken silence from that moment until the day of their death. The men who have always ushered in new views, some of which will stand the test of time and some of which will not, are cannonaded for their boldness while living and canonized for it when dead. All heretics are a pestilence in the pulpit, and an ornament in the graveyard.

As a chapter in church history "Essays and Reviews" is one of the most interesting in the long record of the English Church.

The God of Our Fathers

The birthday of Washington ought never to pass without the reverent mention of his name. Not every nation has such a name as his at the head of its roll of honor. Happy, and reverently proud, may that nation be which looks back to such a man, and calls him the father of his country. Well was it said of him, "Providence left him childless, that the nation might call him father."

We have passed the first period in our judgment of Washington. We no longer compare him with his contemporaries to his disadvantage as was done in his own day. We have passed the second period in which he was lauded to the skies as a man almost greater than humanity. We have come to the time when we can judge him dispassionately. The evidence is all in. All the men who knew him are dead. All the records that involved his public and private life are closed. The material is all in hand for a judgment of the man. And he stands the test. Human, and with the weakness of humanity, he was grandly noble, a fit leader of the people in his day, and a fit example of private virtue and public probity for days that have followed.

He was a great general with an undisciplined force, unused to the restraints of camp life, ill-fed, poorly paid, and often badly officered, he won our independence in a war against a great and brave nation.

He was a great president. Viewed from this distance it appears that there was no other man who could possibly have brought order out of confusion, and by his wisdom, patience, and at times his mighty will, led the thirteen little divided colonies into the unity of a nation.

He was a great citizen, leaving his wealth and home, and accepting for himself no pay, and putting at the front of our armies a man who had no private interests to serve—an example for our statesmen and soldiers for all time in courage and self-denying patriotism.

And he was a man of faith and prayer. He trusted God, and sought God's guidance, profoundly convinced that this country of ours had a destiny for which God had wrought it, a destiny full of hope and mighty purpose, needing only courage and faith to bring it to that greatness for which God had destined this republic.

That faith sustained him in the dark hours of defeat when starvation threatened his little patriot band. That faith in him and the men he led kept

> "The old Continentals
> In their ragged regimentals
> Yielding not."

That faith sustained him when calumny and jealousy sought to dishonor him. That faith held him true when ambition tempted him to sacrifice public good for private gain.

God honored that faith. The God of our fathers fought their battles with them and for them. The words of the Hebrew psalmist sound as if they had been written for us,—

"We have heard with our ears, O God, our fathers have told us, what work thou didst in their days, in the times of old. For they got not the land in possession by their own sword, neither did their own arm save them, but thy right hand and thine arm."

The nation that trusts God, that keeps its powder dry, that keeps its ballot box clean and its jury box free from corruption, the nation that seeks more earnestly to be righteous than rich, honest than boastful, that nation will stand.

Our nation is no longer the narrow strip along the Atlantic seaboard which it was in the days of Washington. Our ideas of heroes have changed in many ways. It might easily have been that a leader who appealed to the people of that time as a hero would have been outgrown by this time. It has not been so with Washington. As our nation has expanded, the name and character of Washington have proved adequate to our wider demands.

And this is the reason. His fame rests on the qualities that endure. Goodness, loyalty, sacrifice, are timeless. They belong to all ages. Our soldiers no longer wear the colonial buff and blue. Styles change in many things. The wars of the future will be fought very differently than the wars of the past. The problems of statecraft will not be the same in a nation of one hundred million which were with our fathers barely three million in number. But faith in God and fidelity to the public good belong to every age, and are the indispensable qualities of statesmen and soldiers in all generations.

Grateful for the good and great men of our past, we may well pray, "The Lord our God be with us, as He was with our fathers."

Uniform Divorce Laws

The Executive Committee of the Illinois Commission on uniform Laws of Marriage and Divorce held open session in Chicago last week, and considered various proposals looking toward a blessing of divorce evils. It was openly affirmed that fifty per cent of the divorces obtained in Chicago are fraudulent; and there is little reason to suppose that Chicago is the only city in America in which this evil is rife. Among the reforms proposed are the following:

Applications for a marriage license must be in writing in the form of an affidavit, verified, subscribed, and sworn to by one of the parties of contemplated marriage, and if one of the parties be a minor, the guardian, or one of the parents of such minor, shall join in making such affidavit. Such affidavit shall contain the following information:

"1. The real and full names of the parties

"2. The domicile of the parties at the time of the making of the application, and their actual place of residence and the duration of such residence.

"3. The age and place of birth of each party.

"4. To what race of mankind the parties belong.

"5. Whether the parties are related to each other, and, if they are, by what relationship.

"6 If either party has been previously married, the applicant shall state how often, when, and where, and also how and when each such marriage was annulled or dissolved, and shall give the full names of the parties to each marriage, together with their residences at the time of annulment or dissolution.

"7. That no legal impediment to the marriage is known to the applicant.

"If it shall appear to the clerk that either party to the proposed marriage is at the time of making such application or proof herein required an imbecile, or insane, or under the influence of any intoxicating liquor or narcotic drug, the application shall be refused."

There are also provisions that a judge may cause a license to be issued at once in extraordinary circumstances, but that ordinarily the application must be posted for fifteen days. If any opposition develops the case shall be heard in court.

Punishment is provided for persons who perjure themselves in making the required affidavit.

These provisions have at least this merit, that they begin at the springs instead of at the dam. One way to lessen the number of divorces is to lessen the number of hasty marriages.

"Nearer, My God, to Thee" Censored

The Roman Catholic Bishop of Dijon, France, has forbidden the singing of "Nearer, My God, to Thee" in his diocese. It seems that this great hymn was given an enormous vogue after the loss of the Titanic last year. It will be recalled that about 1,500 souls went to their oceanic grave while this hymn was being sung. The French Catholics were much effected by it, and a French translation met with an extraordinary sale. Now comes the Bishop of Dijon forbidding its singing in his diocese because of its Protestant authorship!

Church Reports for 1912

Dr. Carroll, who superintended the Religious Census of 1890 for the federal government, has each year since tabulated the year-books of American churches and furnished a summary in the New York Christian Advocate, to which paper we acknowledge our obligations for the figures here given. Only those who have undertaken the collection of so many denominational reports and their reduction to a "common denominator" realize the difficulties of the task. Some churches enroll "members," some report "communicants," and some minor organizations seem to have no basis for enumeration other than occasional attendance. These differences, however, affect only the "diaspora," for all the large bodies have practically the same basis of enumeration, namely those who have made a formal profession of faith and who have been received to the Lord's Supper.

We note this year that Dr. Carroll adds little comment upon the tables themselves, contrary to his usual custom, and we have been wondering whether this is one result of cutting down the subscription price of the Advocate and an indication of the economies necessitated. If so, the subscribers miss much; for the facts, in such a case as this, need to be supplemented by the comments of a skilled and veteran observer.

But according to the figures as we find them the actual net growth of membership in American religious organizations for the year 1912 was 579,852, bringing the total of church members in our states up to 36,675,537, in a total population of 96,500,000. Of this church aggregate 23,334,000 are Protestants, 3,292,526 being credited to the Northern Methodists alone, the first in point of numbers. Somewhat curiously our various churches seem to gain or lose in nearly equal proportions, taken "by and large." For example we often hear that the Episcopal church in America has "gained steadily upon all competitors," while the figures for the last 23 years show that it maintains the same relative position it had at the outset, standing now as it did in 1890, the eighth among evangelical churches. The Presbyterians (North) have advanced one number, rising from the sixth place to the fifth. As a group among groups the whole body of Presbyterians occupy the same relative position, that is, the fifth. We might think the rise of the Northern Presbyterians one notch due to the absorption of so many Cumberland churches, but the rise of the whole family would seem to preclude that explanation. They have risen as a family and not simply as a sect.

The Congregationalists have not completed their returns for 1912 so as to present a fair basis of comparison, but the "estimate" furnished Dr. Carroll puts the gains for the year as 9 ministers, 22 churches and 3,589 communicants, less than the Presbyterian "family" gain of 180 ministers, 65 churches and 37,768 communicants. Of the gain in communicants credited to the Presbyterians 33,000 and more are put down to the growth of the Northern branch, some of the smaller synods of minor bodies having lost.

Dr. Carroll does not seem to have much respect for the Disciples' statistics—no more than well-informed Disciples themselves have. It is high time that our people appointed some worker to gather the information systematically and keep it up to date. Not alone for our self-respect is this important but for our efficiency in rendering service to the kingdom.

Certain of the non-evangelical bodies still practice high guessing, the Spiritualists for example, reporting 200,000 members, not one more or one less—which reminds one of the old Latin proverb, "Dolus latet in generalibus," Beware of round numbers, it might well be rendered. The Christian Scientists still modestly decline to stand up and be counted; and their "communicants" (who do not commune) are put at the figures of years ago when they abruptly ceased to furnish reports; but Dr. Carroll from some source of information has put down to them a loss of 76 organizations out of 1,230, and of 152 readers out of the 2,460 previously reported.

A curious fact ascertained from these figures is that the "reorganized," or as we understand it, the non-polygamous Mormons, are gaining relatively on the Utah body, having now 1,400 of their own "ministers" as against the 1,960 reported by the Brigham Young church, and 600 churches as against the 820 of the polygamists. These figures seem large when they have but one-fifth the membership of the Salt Lake Church. Neither branch of it is of ecclesiastical or political importance apart from the fact that they scatter their forces among "doubtful" states, and so holding the balance of power in many localities get about what they ask from the bosses of either political party.

We shall refer to these figures again, but they are such as to give the earnest Christian "long, long thoughts," for they show to us that the further advance of evangelical Christianity is to be fought step by step, not so much by infidelity as by fad and schism. A score of so-called "religious" bodies hover on each flank and in the rear ready to pick off every disaffected member and, arresting the advance by the efforts needed to protect the wings and the rear. But the situation is not new and not discouraging. It only calls for a closing up of the ranks, and a more vigorous push, and greater fidelity to the only Lord we know.

Editorial Table Talk

The News Value of Philosophy

Prof. Henri Bergson, the famous French philosopher, has just arrived in this country. When the eminent French philosopher arrived in New York harbor his ship was boarded by newspaper men who asked him for his views on at least the following subjects: Laughter, American philosophers, syndicatism, Col. Roosevelt, Gov. Wilson, the Balkan War, seasickness, and woman suffrage. There must have been minor topics brought forward by the ship news men which Professor Bergson contented himself with dismissing in a word or two or with a smile. Of this list of topics the New York Nation remarks, "The list is sufficient to demonstrate how completely the New York reporter vindicates Professor Bergson's theories of a purposeless, spontaneous creative force, that formulates its questions as it goes along."

Bergson is an admirer of America, and especially of William James. He has some reason to admire James, for James first introduced Bergson's work into familiar American philosophical thought. Bergson in his interview thus spoke of James and of America: "You are doing such an immense deal of work in philosophy and psychology in America and such splendid work," said the great French philosopher. "The quality of the work done by American philosophers and psychologists is really remarkable. I consider William James one of the greatest men America has produced. I may even say, one of the great men of all countries and of all times. I am interested in the various religious movements in America, as far as they touch upon ethical questions. I am interested in these movements in America because it strikes me that there is more life in this direction in America today. In America religious and ethical questions are becoming a living study, while with us in Europe they remain theoretical questions. The Americans are practical people. They are supposed to be the most practical in the world today. They want definite rules of conduct and ethics. It is a curious fact that modern philosophers have neglected this. Liebnitz and others have given us systems of ethics, but their systems are too general. Even Kant in his great works on ethics, in his masterpiece on practical reason, laid down formulas that are far too vague to be of any use in practical life. America seems to realize that the philosophers have not given the real answers to the vital questions. And therefore there is a great feeling for these religious and ethical movements in America."

—The women have done another good thing. They have compelled the shame of Nevada's notorious divorce colony to face its probable end. Stormed by the mothers of Reno, who went to Carson in a special train to present their protest against a continuance of the "divorce colony," the Lower House of the Nevada State Legislature after a spirited fight passed an amendment to the divorce laws fixing one year as the residence requirements after January 1, 1914. It is certain the bill will pass the Upper House, and Governor Oddie has signified his intention of signing the measure. Three hundred women, the most prominent in Reno, chartered a train, and, with eminent members of the bar, the clergymen of the city and others, fairly stormed the State Capitol. The women filled every available seat in the Assembly and were hanging over the gallery. There is wailing among the merchants and hotelkeepers of Reno. Babylon is fallen. The good women have won.

—A three per cent gain in scholarship is noted by President David Starr Jordan of Leland Stanford, Jr., University, in his annual report, and he attributes it to prohibition of the sale of liquor in the neighborhood of the university. "Students who find alcoholism in any degree essential to their enjoyment," continues the report, "will not be tolerated on the campus, and those who do not have a legitimate interest in the class work will not be allowed to encumber the classes." Doctor Jordan finds that fraternity members are still below the outsiders in scholarships, although most of the evils in the chapter houses have been abolished. Greek letter men were warned last fall that they must look to their marks, and among other reforms, it was suggested that no members be pledged before the second year. The suggestion has not been adopted.

—"Both branches of the Illinois legislature are being organized satisfactorily to the Anti-Saloon League," said Rev. F. Scott McBride, superintendent of the Anti-Saloon League of Illinois, in a recent address. "The speaker of the house, is a fair-minded man and will see to it that the anti-saloon legislation is put to a vote in the house. The fight is on to the finish and we expect to have enacted into law the county option bill, the resident district bill and the search and seizure bill."

DR. WILLETT'S MISSION TOUR

Professor Herbert L. Willett is now making an investigative tour of the mission fields of the Orient accompanied by a university class whose members are devoting themselves, under his leadership, to an earnest and systematic study of social and religious conditions in the Far East and to the activities and results of Christian missionary effort. In this series of articles in The Christian Century Dr. Willett will write more or less informally about his personal experiences and observations, and, in addition, will report the results of his study and of those with him, giving our readers thus a delightful travel story and an instructive and authoritative report of actual missionary conditions and needs. No man in the American Church is better qualified than Dr. Willett to find the facts and to judge them discriminatingly

Education in Japan

No one who visits Japan with the least interest in the life of its people can fail to notice everywhere the evidences of an increasing desire for education for all the people, and a determination to make that education equal to the best known in other lands. This too is one of the phases of the transition from the feudalism of the last century to the modern life of the Meiji era.

Japan learned early in her time of awakening that the secret of western success and progress is education for all the people. She began the study of western educational methods at once. She sent many of her young men to Europe and America, not only to secure for themselves the benefits of western training, but with the knowledge that they would be able upon their return to organize an educational system, which would accomplish for Japan the needed end.

To be sure, these young men were not officially dispatched on their errand. But it was made increasingly evident that those who had paid the price of western training would be taken care of in governmental service. No one acquainted with the student bodies in American or European universities need be told that the stimulus was sufficient. The numbers of Japanese students in the West are far in excess of those of any other foreign people, though of course the Philippinos are now a close second. As a rule these Japanese students are able and successful in their work, and maintain an excellent standard of scholarship. The first student to receive the degree of Doctor of Philosophy at the University of Chicago was a Japanese, who is now filling an important educational position in Tokyo.

Gymnastics in Girls' School in Tokio.

Side by side with this educational awakening of the Japanese. and contributory to it, was the establishment of Christian schools by the missionary forces from the West. These schools were either the direct creation of the missionaries, or the result of Japanese effort under Christian stimulus. By the side of the mission chapel there is almost certain to be a school, and often this accomplishes what no direct preaching could do. The unselfish devotion of the Christian teachers to the welfare of the children of a community has often won entrance to the confidence and good will of the parents.

The story of the Doshisha University at Kyoto is an almost romantic illustration of the indirect results of Christian influence, even in the home land. Joseph Neesima was a youth who conceived the idea of securing an education in America. He had no means, and his people were hostile to his plans. At length he ran away to the sea, and after many adventures and hardships he reached America. He made his way to Amherst, and while a student there he came into the circle of a family whose influence so shaped his character and directed his ambition that he determined to return to Japan and give his life to the creation of a Christian college for his own people. The result of that determination and the heroic efforts he made, in spite of discouragement and bitter opposition from the Japanese, may now be seen in the splendid institution of which President Harada is the head, an institution supported in large part by American funds as yet, and with some Americans on its instructional staff, but managed by Japanese administrators.

The interest of the government in popular education has resulted in the creation of a series of schools all over the land, ranging from the kindergarten up through the middle and higher schools to the imperial universities at Toyko and Kyoto. This system is intended to reach every child, both boy and girl. And while there is as yet no compulsory school law, such is the pressure of official influence and the imitative zeal of the people that a very large percentage of the children are for some period in attendance upon the schools.

The equipment of these public schools is admirable. The teachers are graduates of the higher Japanese institutions, or even of western schools. Many of the public schools include both gymnastic and manual training apparatus, especially an equipment for the teaching of domestic science. The boys and girls wear simple uniforms, appropriate to their grades, and they often march in processions to places of interest, or on civic holidays.

Overcrowded Courses of Study.

The most outstanding point for criticism in this generally admirable plan is the overcrowding of the course of study, and the large dependence upon the oral method of instruction in the classroom. It is the fault of most new educational plans that they attempt to put too many studies into the space allotted. We have not yet outgrown this fault in America. But even more defective is the use of the lecture method in classes below the college grade. The child needs the aid of class text-book, home study and reference library to secure competent results from his work.

These schools are not free public institutions in our sense of the term. They are provided by the government, but the parents of the children pay a tuitional fee for each child. This would seem to bear rather heavily upon the poor, but the fee is quite small, and in cases of real poverty provision is made for the child.

The medical schools of Japan are of a high order. While the literary students have gone to America and England for their training, those who went in for medical and surgical work have gone to Germany. The result is that a very competent medical education can now be gotten in Japan under Japanese direction, and with instructors who have been trained in the best clinics of Berlin, Munich and Vienna.

Physical Culture Not Neglected.

As to physical culture, the Japanese students, both boys and girls, have abundant exercises in gymnastics, for the most part in the open air in all weathers. There is also a wholesome national devotion to the Japanese sports of wrestling, or ju jitsu, and fencing, the latter with the large two-handed fencing stick, in the use of which the swordsman is heavily padded and masked. Of late the returned students from America have brought the knowledge of base-ball and foot-ball, and now most of the larger schools and colleges have teams. The University of Chicago base-ball team made a visit to Japan two years ago, largely through the influence of Prof. A. W. Place, of Toyko, a former U. of C. star, and in the following year the base-ball team of Wasada University, Tokyo, made a return visit and played the teams of several American institutions.

A good deal is made in the Japanese schools of what is called "morals." And at first it would seem that the people of the island empire are ahead of us in the inculcation of ethics. But on closer inquiry it is seen that what they mean by "morals" is contained in the two favorite maxims of obedience to parents and obedience to the emperor. The system of ancestor worship is very deeply rooted in Japan. The parent is the embodiment of this ideal, and is therefore to be reverenced and obeyed. A little more of this sentiment would not injure western education. But it leads easily to an undue subjection in family life, particularly on the part of daughters, who are hardly counted the possessors of any rights. Under the successive control of father, husband and mother-in-law the Japanese woman attains freedom only when she herself reaches the coveted position of mother-in-law, and can rule as she will.

Obedience to the Sovereign.

Much of the extraordinary devotion to country manifested by the Japanese is the result of the second precept, that of reverence for and obedience to the sovereign. He is the greater Father of all the people. With no settled idea of One God, but a half-superstitious conception of a multitude of deities, it is easy for a people loyal to the country and its welfare to invest the emperor with all the essential attributes of a god. Accordingly in most of the government schools there is a custom of doing homage to the portrait of the ruler, which though largely formal, no doubt has its influence upon the minds of the youth. Probably the patient endurance of heavy taxation, and the quick response to the military call of the land, have in part resulted from this popular instruction in reverence and obedience toward the mikado.

Of late the Christian schools in Japan have had to face a dilemma. In accordance with governmental permission they have hitherto gone on with their work of instruction, and their graduates have received credit in the higher government schools. By a recent proclamation, however, they must choose between the privilege of teaching the Bible and the Christian ethics in the schools, on the one hand, and on the other the privilege of having their students accredited by the department of education. Many efforts have been made by the Christian leaders to secure some modification of the law, but thus far without success.

Difficulties in Teaching Christianity.

At first glance the proper course seems to be clear. Whatever happens, we must insist upon the Bible and the elements of the Christian faith, and let the government credit go. But the difficulties of this course are apparent. The young men in all the schools know that government credit is essential to recognition in the public service. Most of them secure some sort of government employment, for that offers the surest way to success. Now for a school to abandon government recognition and credit is at once to lose a large proportion of the best and most ambitious of its students. Yet not a few Christian schools have taken this bold step, confident that the law will be changed, or that in some way their course will prove best.

On the other hand some of the Christian schools have decided to keep their students, discontinue formal teaching of the Bible and other religious disciplines, and depend upon the influences of the class-room, the chapel services, which are not interdicted, and voluntary meetings and classes where the same objects can be attained, though in a manner less direct. We believe that this plan is the wiser. It secures the continuance of the most promising type of students in the school, and throws about them the very same informal Christian influences which have proved so effective in institutions like the Syrian Protestant College at Beirut and Roberts College at Constantinople, where all formal teaching of the Christian faith has been officially and necessarily excluded from the curriculum.

Need of a University.

But the great need of Christianity in Japan is a university of the first rank. The Christian schools of every grade are doing a noble work. But they are in direct competition with a strong, well organized and effective governmental system. Medical mission work lost its opportunity years ago. College work is in similar danger now. The only place at which a piece of work could be done above the level of competition, and with the promise of influencing the educational program of the nation, is in the creaton of a Christian institution of the highest grade, which could dominate in a healthful and stimulating way the educational life of the people. The Japanese are quick to learn the best, eager to appropriate whatever is conducive to the largest interests of the land, well disposed toward Christianity, but contented thus far with a religionless educational system, and likely to make the cardinal mistake of setting intellectual expertness above ethical vision, and thus sacrificing the future promise of substantial and permanent efficiency to the passion for individual and national self-realization.

In the creation of such a university some American or European philanthropist might find the means of highest satisfaction to himself and benefit to the race. The need is evident. The man with the vision is needed. Such a man could find the means and create the reality.

Beneath Balkan Battle Smoke-clouds

Life in Robert College During the Present War

By Haroid L. Scott

Those who know that every race, nation, religion, and sect in the Balkan peninsula is represented in the student body of Robert College, Constantinople, and that this statement can be said to approach the truth as regards the teaching staff, will quite naturally be inquisitive as to the situation created in the college by the Balkan War.

To be sure, we Americans were confronted by what we thought would be an exceedingly perplexing condition of affairs, and the feeling of responsibility and anxiety was at first great. We have Turkish, Greek, Bulgarian, Servian and Montenegrin boys in school, who have, a large majority of them at least, fathers or brothers, ofttimes both, who are engaged in the war. These boys intermingle in the class-room, in the dormitory, and on the playground; they contend with one another in debating, oratory and athletics. We asked ourselves if it were possible for them to continue to work and to engage in wholesome and natural contests, while those nearest and dearest to them were risking possessions and life in a bitter and unnatural struggle.

Self Control of Student Body.

As the days passed this question yielded a welcome answer. Not only did the students refrain from actually giving way to their emotions and so involving themselves in disputes and fistic encounters, but they pursued their daily round of duties with almost unflagging zeal. It is true that several of the autumn events of a social nature and the class football games for the championship had to be given up on account of the departure of some of the leading contestants; but otherwise there was scarcely a perceptible change in the life of the school. The only day that could be called at all trying was Sunday, Nov. 17, when heavy cannonading was heard early in the morning and continued all day. At first there was a great flutter of excitement, and a large portion of the student body rushed pell-mell to the top of the hill above the college, where even the firing of the machine guns could be heard. After an hour or two the first flush of excitement waned, and students and teachers were able to listen composedly to the morning sermon. Spasmodic firing could be heard for a few days after that, but we came to look upon it as an everyday affair, especially after it was learned that the Bulgarians would be unable to force the lines, at least for some time to come. The novelty of hearing the thunder of battle while conducting recitations, however, never quite wore off, and the whole affair was by no means soothing to the nerves of either teacher or student.

Presidential Tactfulness and International Baseball.

There are, of course, definite reasons for the good feeling that prevailed during the critical time. From the beginning all political discussion on the part of the students was proscribed; and teachers were urged to keep the students from thinking overmuch about the war by interesting them in every possible phase of school life. But even the rigid observance of these instructions would not have been efficacious had it not been for the conduct of the native teachers. I am sure every one of the Americans learned beneficial lessons of self-control and generosity from the broadminded, tactful attitude of both the Moslem and native Christian members of the teaching staff. It was a revelation to me to hear a Greek and a Turk, both patriotic representatives of two bitterly hostile nations, discuss calmly and with entire good feeling, certain aspects of the Balkan struggle. These teachers have, naturally, more influence over the boys of their respective departments than have the American teachers, and it is to them that we must assign a large share of the credit for preserving the usual atmosphere of good nature and of nonpartisan feeling in the institution. We must remember that the people of every one of the Balkan states are as patriotic and as deeply sentimental in their love for their country as any other people on earth; and that the Turks are just as fervently attached to the fatherland and their religion. Thus we know that the situation demanded a great amount of tact and fine judgment from all concerned. In the end, however, it was doubtless the coolness, tact and patience of our president, Dr. C. F. Gates, that counted for most. His was, of course, the most difficult position of all; he was responsible for the pursuance of a line of action that would insure the safety of the students and of all the members of the community. He managed so well that his measures brought scarcely any criticism from any quarter.

One can safely say that the college has passed through the crisis with its reputation for firmness, inherent strength and genuine desire to serve all races impartially strengthened within Turkey and without. Robert College was the only school in Constantinople the work of which was not interrupted by the contingencies of war or by the breaking out of cholera. Constantinople College, the American school for girls, found it wise to move from the Asiatic to the European side, where protection could be more easily given. In doing so it was forced to dismiss all day-students, and its work, of course, suffered to a certain extent. Every other school was closed for periods ranging from two weeks to two months. Some were converted into hospitals; others were ordered to close their doors to students because of their proximity to districts infected with cholera. There were only about forty students, out of a body of almost 500 who left our institution. This fact alone gives ample evidence of the confidence reposed in the school. But one is even more impressed when he finds that the only Bulgarians and Hellenic Greeks to leave were those who were ordered out for military service. There were some of the parents who recalled their sons out of fear for their safety; but they were those who knew little about the conditions here, and thus, as was generally true, were much more afraid than those who were better informed.

It was, of course, necessary to take thorough precautions as the Bulgarian army advanced; we were responsible for the safety of too great a number of persons not to be prepared for an emergency. The United States dispatch boat, the "Scorpion," was anchored in the Bosphorus just at the foot of college hill, and several blue jackets were quartered on the college grounds. The members of the community who live outside of the walls which surround the campus, sent all valuables to the college strong room, and were ready to come within the grounds at a moment's notice. And then, in case of serious trouble, there were the dozen or more foreign battleships ready to take on board all the foreign citizens. We were proud of the behavior of the American sailor boys who spent three weeks with us, and I think their conduct could not have been surpassed by the conduct of those of any other nation. They were gentlemanly and became popular with the student body, because of their active interest in all the games. Two hot baseball games were played between some of the teachers and students on one side and the sailors on the other; these contests helped materially in awakening interest in events other than those of the war.

All Quiet on the Bosphorus.

All these precautions, though undoubtedly wise, seem now to have been superfluous when we think with what a strong hand the government preserved the peace of the city, and how calmly and philosophically the majority of the Turks bore up under their awful defeats and numerous other troubles. There were no rioting, no marauding, and almost no threats of violence or massacre. If the army had been driven back upon us there might have been a different story to tell; but all clear-thinking persons regard as ridiculous the predictions made before the battle at Tchataldja of the great effusions of blood and the destruction of property that were to accompany the state of anarchy that would follow the "certain" defeat of the Ottoman army.

I will mention, however, two things that excited some real uneasiness. A party of about 4,000 wild fellows from Kurdistan, while on their way to the front, sent their chiefs to the prefect of the city to acquaint him of their arrival and to state that they were willing to kill a few Greeks before they left. The prefect appeared to be delighted at the proposal and suggested an assembling place; but as fast as the Kurds arrived at the appointed place at the appointed time, they were made prisoners by an overwhelmingly large body of troops and marched to the front under guard.

The second cause for apprehension, and for much more serious apprehension, was the untimely plotting and the agitations of the Committee of Union and Progress. My readers will recall the downfall of the Young Turk party last summer, and the coming into power of a government under the wise leadership of Kiamil Pasha. These honest and experienced leaders were unable to ward off the war, because the selfish policy and the blunders of the Porte, while under the control of the committee, made such a conflict inevitable. However, they have shown a firmness in dealing with the delicate situation in the city, and in stifling any expression of fanaticism on the part of the Moslem populace, that makes them deserving of the highest praise. The attitude of the Young Turk leaders during this decisive time has shown clearly how unfit they were to be the rulers of the nation. They have proved traitors to the country for which they promised salvation; for it was, no doubt, due to the mismanagement and corruption of the government of the past four years that the armies of Turkey were so utterly unprepared to meet those of the allies. The present government has adopted severe measures against the Union and Progress men; several were imprisoned and many more have fled the country.

It is to be hoped that Kiamil Pasha, the present grand vizier, will retain leadership until a definite peace is concluded; but as a party in favor of a continuation of the war is fast growing stronger, it may be that his pacific policy will crumble and fall before the reawakened hopes and the martial ardor of the Ottomans. The latest telegrams seem to indicate that the direct negotiations at London have failed, and that the time for the intervention of the powers has come. A renewal of the war would lead to most deplorable results for both Turkey and the allies, and the present is a period of great suspense for every one in any way interested in the future of Turkey and the Balkan States.

Constantinople, Jan. 8, 1913.

The Present Status of Foreign Missions

One of the Chicago dailies published a few days since a cartoon representing a matronly looking woman despatching a foundling to the police station and then contributing "a thousand dollars to foreign missions." That cartoonist belongs to the age of the pterodactyls and dinosaurs, not to the twentieth century of the Christian era. People who are anywhere within sight of present conditions know that the supporters of foreign missions are the supporters of all charities, and that nothing better approves itself to the well-informed citizen to-day than those missionary labors which, as Prince Ferdinand of Bulgaria says, lie at the base of every struggle for freedom. Except for foreign missions the old Sultan would be meditating new massacres of Armenians in the palace by the Bosphorus to-day, and the exiled Shah would sit on the throne of Persia and the Manchu dynasty rest undisturbed in its autocracy in the "Heavenly City," and Uganda be the scene of the bloody wars which raged through all central Africa fifty years ago. It is quite useless to expect that the boy reporters of the secular dailies, who get their church news in the hotel lobbies, will ever understand these things, but the intelligent and well-read American looks upon such scurrilities of the popular cartoonist with pity and contempt.

MODERN WOMANHOOD

Mrs. Harrison will be glad to receive communications from any of her readers offering suggestions concerning woman's welfare, criticisms of articles or inquiries concerning any matters relevant to her department. She should be addressed directly at 530 Elm Tree Lane, Lexington, Ky.

A Falling Birth-Rate

In his recent volume, "The Task of Social Hygiene," Havelock Ellis devotes a long chapter to the study of our falling birth-rate. He sees no cause for alarm in it, but considers it a distinctive mark of civilization, and says:

"Those who seek to restore the birth-rate of half a century ago are engaged in a task which would be criminal, if it were not based on ignorance."

The Birth-rate and the Death-rate.

He deprecates any consideration of the birth-rate, without also taking into account the death-rate. "We must always bear in mind," he says, "that a high or low birth-rate has no meaning so far as the growth of a nation is concerned, unless it is considered in relation to the death-rate. The natural increase of a nation is not the result of its birth-rate, but of its birth-rate minus its death-rate. . . . Many worthy people might have been spared the utterances of foolish and mischievous Jeremias, if, instead of being content with a hasty glance at the crude birth-rate, they had paused to consider this fairly obvious fact."

He shows how the relation is especially close between the birth-rate and infant mortality, and that they rise and sink together. "In most cases, it is the high death-rate in infancy and childhood, which exercises the counter-balancing influence against a high birth-rate. A high infantile mortality accompanies a high birth-rate, while a low infantile mortality accompanies a low birth-rate.

A Recent Phenomenon.

The decline in the birth-rate among civilized nations is hardly more than fifty years old. It began in Europe with France, which still holds a low place among the nations—mainly because it is not accompanied by an equally low death-rate.

In Norway, as well as in Australasia, on the other side of the globe, we see a low birth-rate, with a low death-rate, and a large natural increase effected, not by wasted births, but by economy in deaths, and this increase is accompanied by favorable social conditions, and great national vigor. Norway appears to have the lowest infantile death-rate in Europe.

But Russia is the most typical and appalling example of this law of population; it has at once the highest birth-rate, and the highest death-rate in Europe. In no other European country do the bulk of women marry so early, with the average size of the family so large, and the death-rate so high. Thirty years ago, the death-rate of infants in Russia was three times that of Norway, and nearly double that of England; if we compare it with countries outside of Europe, its percentage of infant mortality is four times that of South Australia. The other European countries which vie with Russia in this high birth and death rates are Austria, Hungary, Prussia, Spain and Italy.

We find this story of a decreasing birth-rate, and, when the people are fairly intelligent, of a declining infant mortality coming also from the great Anglo-Saxon centres of the world—England, Australasia, Canada and the United States.

Some Causes for a Falling Birth-Rate.

Mr. Ellis says, "Generally speaking, the age of girls at marriage is lower the lower the state of civilization is in the community to which they belong, and the earlier the period of marriage the greater the number of children to each marriage. It is said that in nearly all countries, except in northern regions, where women develop late, that mothers from fifteen to twenty years of age have the largest number of children. But in cold countries, like Norway and Finland, from twenty to twenty-five is the period of greatest fertility." "This is a reason, why, in an advanced stage of civilization, where late marriages generally are contracted, a high marriage rate is not necessarily associated with a high birth-rate."

Another reason that Mr. Ellis gives is that in city life, so many men contract venereal diseases, which causes either sterility in themselves and their wives, or a weak and degenerate offspring, unable to survive in the struggle of existence.

And a third reason that he gives, and he seems to think this the most potent and praiseworthy of all, is the voluntary limitation of the number of their children on the part of the parents themselves.

Mr. Ellis sums up his line of thought in these words: "The tendency of the birth-rate to fall with the growth of social stability is of the very essence of civilization. It represents an impulse, which may be deliberate in the individual, but may be regarded as an instinctive effort in the community to gain more complete control of the conditions of life, and to grapple with the problems of misery, disease and death."

A Suffrage Year

The New Year is barely a month old, and already three State Legislatures have voted by overwhelming majorities to submit constitutional amendments giving full suffrage to women. In New York there were but five dissenting votes in the Assembly and two in the Senate. In South Dakota the vote was 70 to 30 in the House and 41 to 2 in the Senate. In Montana there were only two dissenting votes in each House. In New York it must pass another Legislature, but in Montana and South Dakota it now goes direct to the voters. In Nevada, it passed the last Legislature by a large majority; in the present Legislature it has passed the House with only three dissentients, and it will probably have passed the Senate before this issue of The Christian Century reaches our readers. Certainly 1913 starts out as an equal suffrage year!

Woman Elector Lives Simple Life

Mrs. Helen J. Scott, the first woman presidential elector ever chosen in the State of Washington, is described as a small, vivacious brunette of Southern birth, with a trace of French in her ancestry. At home she is helpmeet for her husband, playmate for her children; everywhere she is active and charming, but simple and unassuming. She has gone through many troubles, loss of relatives by death, destruction of property by fire, etc., but has kept as fresh and bright as a girl. She is versatile, an active club woman, interested in charitable and educational work, always standing for justice and for the human uplift. She has spent most of her life in Tacoma, and is one of the most popular women in the State. Her husband, Horace G. Scott, is a broad-minded man, a warm admirer and staunch supporter of his wife in all her good works. They have a daughter of sixteen and a son of fourteen.

Woman Delivers Electoral Vote

Mrs. Margaret Zane Witcher of Salt Lake City delivered the vote of the Utah Electors to the President of the United States Senate. She was the first woman to appear among the messengers coming in from the various states. She traveled 2,380 miles, and received $585 for her mileage.

Church Life

Dr. Ames at Harvard.

Vaughan Dabney, formerly pastor at Douglas Park Church, Chicago, writes a personal letter to the editor telling of the rare delight with which Dr. Edward Scribner Ames was received at Harvard University, where he finished last week a two weeks' section of his appointment as university preacher. "From every source," says Mr. Dabney, "the most favorable comment is heard. In spite of examinations a steady attendance was noted at the daily morning prayers. On the two Sundays Appleton chapel was filled. Dr. Ames' subjects were 'Christianity and the Social Problem,' and 'The Joy of Jesus.'" Disciple students attending Harvard and Andover Seminaries dined on two occasions with Dr. Ames as guest at Memorial Hall. Mr. Dabney reports a student saying that his talks with Dr. Ames "helped mightily in keeping him from the paths of heresy."

Dr. Ainslie at Yale.

Concerning Dr. Peter Ainslie's visit to Yale Divinity School, during which he delivered three lectures on the polity of the Disciples, Dean Charles R. Brown spoke to the students as follows: "Not only has the warm geniality and the strong personality of the speaker drawn us toward him, but the fairness and completeness of his message have given us a broader sympathy with and a greater appreciation of the great modern movement which he represents, this large and growing body of the Church of Christ. When we go out into pastorates, and while we associate here together in the capacity of students, we shall all have a clearer appreciation of the purpose and the message of this communion, and we are all drawn into closer Christian fellowship by the message we have received." Following the ordination to the ministry of Mr. Andrew Lietch, of Toronto, Can., of which interesting fact mention was made in this paper two weeks since, a banquet was held in Dr. Ainslie's honor, attended by the twenty-eight Disciple students at Yale, Dean Brown, Prof. McIntosh, L. H. Stine, pastor St. James Street Church, Boston, Wm. Haushalter, pastor East Orange, N. J., and Prof. Vernon Stauffer, of Hiram College, now studying in Union Seminary, New York.

A Home-Made Evangelistic Meeting.

It is not often that a report of an evangelistic meeting is printed in full in The Christian Century as written by the correspondent, but the following by J. H. Fillmore tells so sincerely and reservedly of an evidently substantial meeting that it cannot well be edited. He says:

"Sunday, February 9, closed the most important revival we have ever had at the Norwood, O., Christian Church. The meeting was held by our new minister, C. R. Stauffer, assisted by Miss Una Dell Berry. The meeting lasted five weeks—stormy weeks for the most part; but the attendance kept up well all the time and was overflowing during the good weather. The total number of additions were 116. There are a number of others whom we expect at our regular services of the future.

"This was a good, healthy revival. The church was strengthened by it. We are not looking for any reaction or falling away. Mr. Stauffer pleased the people with his preaching. He combined teaching with strong preaching, and won the hearts of the people by his sincerity and intelligent interpretation of the scriptures.

"Miss Berry led a large chorus of young people and sang herself into the affections of the people with her beautiful solos. She did fine work also as a personal worker, visiting the people in their homes, encouraging them to overcome their doubts and leading them to make a confession of their faith.

"About one-half of the converts were from our Sunday-school. Our school is growing healthily. The attendance on the last Sunday of the revival was 485; the largest we have yet had. It will continue to grow in all departments. Our Baraca class of young men is one of the most interesting features of the school. They have outgrown their present quarters in the cellar basement, and are this week putting up a temporary building on our church lot along side of the church. This annex will seat 125 men. We expect this class to grow to the filling of this new house within the coming six months. The attendance last Sunday was sixty-four. Most of these young men are now members of the church.

"We have our new church lot and the complete foundation set and paid for. Will begin at once building, expecting to have within six or seven months the lower story built and roofed ready for occupancy. This will accommodate from 800 to 1,000 Sunday-school folks with modern equipment for thorough work. With Mr. Stauffer as leader we can, and will, go ahead and build the new $50,000 church and fill it with live, rejoicing people when it is ready for them."

Making Mid-week Service Worth While.

"The Baptists and the Disciples—Is Actual Union Possible?" was the mid-week meeting subject at Winfield, Kan., last week. The minister, R. W. Gentry invited two representatives of each body to speak on the topics "Our Attitude on Conversion" and "Our Feeling About Union," A characteristic exhortation is printed in the bulletin announcing this service. It is entitled "The Gift of Tongue," and says: "Don't hide your light under a bushel. It's unscriptural. Talk out. Wade in. Take part. Act as if you were an inventor and the church an invention which you are trying to improve. We have but scratched the surface of our splendid plant's possibilities. Lots of heat and usefulness is going to waste. Be free with advice. The pastor has a waste basket and pigeon-holes. Bad advice goes to the waste basket and good advice on file for use. Advise and then keep sweet however things go. Remember that you are only a part of a greater whole, and that the social consciousness is always wiser than the individual mind."

Membership Near to Doubling Itself.

If forty-one new members are secured before the summer vacation by East End Church, Pittsburgh, the membership will have been doubled in the three and one-half years pastorate of John Ray Ewers. It is said the congregation will work to reach that goal. Twenty-seven new members were received during the "Decision Meetings" recently held by W. F. Richardson, of Kansas City. It is difficult to get a hearing on week nights in Pittsburgh's East End, but Mr. Richardson's "masterly sermons," says Mr. Ewers, "were listened to by the largest congregations that ever gathered for such services in this church." He adds: "The meeting was quiet and deep. The fine, spiritual personality of Dr. Richardson was a benediction. His refined and enriched life speaks louder than words."

A Union and a Rural Opportunity.

Drawn by the double appeal of a union church of Baptists and Disciples and an opportunity to serve a typical rural point, O. W. Winter relinquished his successful pastorate at Creston, Ia., and removed to Villisca, Ia. The combined congregations at Villisca extended the call without the formality of a trial sermon. The two churches are now mixing together harmoniously as one congregation and are at the moment engaged with Methodists and Presbyterians in a union evangelistic meeting conducted by local pastors. Morton Mills is a village not far from Villisca, where the characteristic problems of the rural church are present. Mr. Winter will preach there on Sunday afternoons and conduct a week night service beside spending a portions of his time in pastoral labor. This field is altogether much to his liking and without doubt under his cultivation will bear a good harvest.

Another Monument to J. H. Gilliland.

Bloomington, Ill., has three church buildings and congregations which stand as monuments to the energy and foresight of the late J. H. Gilliland, who ministered continuously in that city for twenty-five years. The house of worship at Normal, a college city adjacent and practically suburban to Bloomington, was dedicated Sunday, Feb. 9, by E. A. Gilliland, the pastor, assisted by Geo. L. Snively, who led in raising funds. This house was begun while J. H. Gilliland was pastor at Normal and at his death his talented brother was called to succeed him. The task has been carried through to great success. It seems that three-fourths of the money with which to pay for the house was not secured until dedication day when over $30,000 was pledged to go with $12,000 that had been provided at the beginning of the enterprise. This total will cover the entire cost. It was a joyous day, in which all Bloomington Disciple churches joined.

The afternoon service was especially arranged as a memorial to J. H. Gilliland, who had inspired the church by his energy and faith to undertake the great enterprise.

Deacons Give Pastor Silk Hat.

Something of a departure from conventional gift-giving was the act of the board of deacons of Union Ave Church, St. Louis, in presenting the pastor, B. A. Abbott, with a new silk hat. Most of the prominent clergymen of St. Louis appear in public in the lofty tile, but Mr. Abbott, a southerner and a thorough democrat has never donned the somewhat showy and often uneasy covering. It is said that he has become convinced of his duty and will wear the hat.

Progress a Duty, Says New Pastor.

In beginning his new pastorate at Second Church, Cedar Rapids, Ia., T. P. Paris sounded a true note of leadership. He spoke on the law of growth, saying in part: "The past is of value only as it serves as a stimulus for the present and an inspiration for the future. When we are content to live wholly in our yesterdays we confess that we are not able to cope with the issues of today or to face those of tomorrow. We shall keep the faith with those who have labored here in former days to the extent only as we approach the heights which they so clearly pointed out. The church answers the age-long challenge to 'go forward;' just in proportion as it advances to new victories and new possessions."

A Preacher's Heroes.

While Dr. Burris A. Jenkins was ill in a Chicago hospital two weeks since, he was observed to be reading Carlyle's "Heroes and Hero Worship," and in his first sermon upon returning to his Linwood Boulevard pulpit in Kansas City, he confessed himself a hero worshiper. "Great men," he said, "men who've the personality to stir a nation, draw out the best in us. In recent years two men stand out pre-eminent as our national heroes. Bryan, in the '90s, almost put the nation in his pocket. He had indefinable magnetic charm that won our admiration. He was mysterious enough to hold our respect.

"Theodore Roosevelt has given us an example of personal popularity almost unparallelled in history. Aggressive, admirable, winning and holding the wonder and love of a nation, he made every citizen better by his heroism. He almost broke up a national party. I don't know but that he did break one up. I didn't vote for him, so I can say that without fear of being charged with making a political address.

"To me, he is a hero. He is a man, greater than king or potentate. I would rather take off my hat to such men as Roosevelt and Edison than to the czar of all the Russias. I admire the way he charged up San Juan Hill. 'Yes,' some say, 'but he did that for political effect.' What if he did? He charged just the same. What if he became a soldier to prepare the way for the governorship of New York? He deserved a nation's admiration, whatever motive inspired him. He is a brave man.

"I like the way he took that bullet last fall. In fact, I like most everything he does. But some people don't. A hero draws out the best in every nation. He makes us believe in ourselves and our possibilities. He gives us a new idea and a new ideal. He does us good to look at such a man. Don't try to check your admiration for a man or a thing. Give full play to your wonder."

New Record in Gifts to Colleges.

The largest single gift ever made to one of the Disciples' colleges was that of a St. Louis lady who while withholding her name has just given $160,000 to Christian University at Canton, Mo. The gift consists of one thousand shares of the preferred stock of one of the largest manufacturing establishments in St. Louis. The stock bears eight per cent guaranteed interest, and is now worth in the open market one hundred and sixty dollars a share. The stock thus already yields an annual income to the school of $8,000, which amount will be a great addition to the resources of this growing institution. In the last thirteen months, writes Pres. Carl Johann, Christian University has received a quarter million dollars increase in endowment.

H. D. C. Maclachlan, of Richmond, Va., practices social service as well as preaches it. He is president of the Juvenile Protective Association of Virginia, and has recently submitted to the city council of Richmond a memorial on behalf of children charged with offenses asking for the elimination of the publicity of a formal court hearing and its inevitable stigma. The memorial urges that a child be given a chance to reform under probation without being sent to jail. Evidently Virginia is behind some other states in its legislation for dealing tenderly with child offenders and Mr. Maclachlan and and his society are moving toward more humane practices.

The Christian people of Springfield, Ill., were much incensed at the fact that at the great banquet in celebration of Lincoln's birthday liquor was served. The ministers' association passed resolutions in condemnation. One pastor preached on "The Honored Lincoln Dishonored," while F. W. Burnham of First Christian Church made the matter the theme of his pulpit prayer on Sunday. It would seem that with its race riots and its liquor banquets the great Emancipator's home city is trying to be as much unlike Lincoln as it can.

Let the churches bear in mind the annual offering for foreign missions the first Sunday in March. The churches are taking a lively interest in the offering. The apportionments have been most cordially received. Many churches are determined to give more than a year ago. A number of new living-links have already been enrolled and the prospects are bright for a number more during March. There are many signs of promise.

Pres. Z. M. Williams of Central College delivered the education day address at Lexington, Mo., church, S. Boyd White, pastor. The New Era Mens Club was addressed by Judge John A. Rich and H. W. Hunter, Christian pastor at Higginsville. They considered the subject "Is the Church Making Good." Some very fine and significant things were said both by Judge Rich and Mr. Hunter. The church reports one confession of faith recently.

Pres, R. D. McCoy, of our Bible College, Tokyo, Japan, recently visited his Living-link Church, Independence, Mo., to the great delight of the pastor, H. K. Pendelton, and the whole church. President McCoy was delighted with the spirit of the church and the royal reception tendered him.

Resolutions on the death of T. P. Haley, of Kansas City, were passed by the Board of Church Extension of which Dr. Haley had been a member from the time of its organization.

S. L. Arnold has been superintendent of the Christian Sunday-school at Ashland, Ohio, for the past forty years. He has helped to lead that school and church into a larger missionary interest. Children's Day is always a great day in that school.

In the evangelistic meeting being held in Hutchinson, Kansas, Evangelist W. T. Brooks invited all the lodge men of the city to attend in their respective regalias on Sunday afternoon, each order marching from its room in a body to the church where seats were reserved for them.

C. G. Chapman, pastor First church, Joplin, Mo., has accepted an offer made to the preachers of Joplin by the chief of police to furnish a star and commission to any pastor.

Earle Wilfley, pastor Vermont Avenue Church, Washington, D. C., will conduct a party on a tour of Europe this summer, and later will go on to the Holy Land.

First Church, Ft. Worth, Tex., is laying plans for a new house of worship to cost $100,000. L. D. Anderson is the pastor.

R. A. Doan's "greatest Bible Class in the world" at Nelsonville, O., had an attendance of 1,045 men on Feb. 9.

CHICAGO

The attendance at ministers' meeting Monday, Feb. 10, was exceptionally large due to the announced presence of J. H. O. Smith, of Oklahoma City, formerly a prominent Chicago pastor and much beloved by his colleagues. Mr. Smith was in the city participating in the re-opening of the People's Institute for church purposes, a building in which he had maintained preaching services for the five years of his leadership of Union Christian Church. A number of laymen from various congregations were present. Mr. Smith spoke reminiscently of his Chicago pastorate, and declared that this city was ripe for the simple Christianity of the New Testament. The occasion was rendered yet more interesting by the presence of Dr. E. L. Powell, of Louisville, who was on his way to Valparaiso, Ind., where he is now engaged in a two weeks' meeting with Pastor Claude E. Hill. Dr. Powell also addressed the ministers, commenting especially on the type of unity which obtains here and declaring that Chicago churches have "solved the problem of practical liberty in the unity of faith, a problem which in most other places is still being discussed."

Memorial Church, Baptists and Disciples, E. L. Dakin, pastor, held its annual meeting last week and reported for the first time in its history all bills paid and a small surplus in the treasury. Mr. Dakin was called for another year. The official board of this church has voted to ask Dr. E. L. Powell, of Louisville, Ky., to preach two weeks in an evangelistic campaign. He has not signified his acceptance.

Mrs. M. E. Harlan, of Indianapolis, C. W. B. M. national secretary, was given a luncheon at Marshall Field's on Monday, Feb. 10, by ladies from the various auxiliaries of Chicago. Over fifty ladies were present. Mrs. Harlan spoke at Monroe Street and Douglas Park Churches on the preceding Sunday.

Valparaiso, Ind., church is in the midst of a meeting of great uplift conducted by Dr. E. L. Powell, of Louisville. A group of Chicago ministers went to Valparaiso last Monday and returned after the evening service.

Metropolitan Church invited neighboring pastors of all denominations and all Chicago Disciples pastors to a great Fellowship Meeting last Sunday afternoon. It was made an occasion of much rejoicing.

Hamlet on Church Finance

(With apologies to Shakespeare.)

"To pledge or not to pledge:
That is the question.
Whether it is nobler in a man
To take the gospel free and let another foot the bill,
Or to sign a pledge and help to pay the church expenses.
To give, to pay—aye, there's the rub—to pay,
When on the free-pew plan a man may have a sitting free,
And take the gospel, too,
As though he paid.
And none the wiser be,
Save the church's committee, who,—
Most honorable men—can keep it a secret.
To err is human; human, too, to buy at cheaper rate.
I'll take the gospel so,
For others do the same—a common rule,
I'm wise; I'll wait, not work;
I'll pray, not, pay; and let the others foot the bills,
And so with me the gospel is free you see."

If We Go Forward

If we go forward in the March offering for foreign missions on Marcr 2, then—

1. We will encourage our brethren in the forefront of the batle on the mission fields to be of good cheer. They need every heartening word we can give them and mort.

2. We will nerve ourselves to do all the work we have in hand here in America. An advance step in Asia and Africa means a forward step in America. The proofs of this are overwhelming.

3. We will demonstrate to the world and to our own hearts anew that we do believe the gospel which we preach is the power of God unto salvation to the last lost man of earth.

4. We will deepen and widen the streams of blessings which we have started in all the arid regions of the non-Christian world. These gracious streams have blessed hundreds of thousands who thirst for the waters of life.

5. We will hasten the day when every heathen temple shall be deserted and all idols shall be destroyed, when our risen Lord shall reign supreme in every land. Let us pray that the day may not be far hence.

6. We will gladen the hearts of all our brethren of all tongues and all colors and in all climes. These infant churches and new-born babes in Christ long for fellowship and the leadership we can give them. They are the foundation of a new civilization and the evidence of a new life. Their existence and growth registers expansion of the Kingdom of God in the earth. They are tasting for the first time of the waters of salvafore us.

Our opportunities are overwhelming. Shall we not measure up to them? If we do, God will shower upon us blessings of which we have never dreamed. Let every Christian man prepare for a forward step March 2. F. M. RAINS, Sec.

Church Extension News

From Oct. 1, 1912 to Feb. 1, 1913, the folfowing churches have lansingburgh, N. Y.; Lampassas, Texas; Helena, Ark.; Greenwood, Township Wexford Co., Mich.; Rifle, Colo.; Bluefield, W. Va.; Valley Junction, Ia.; Carl Junction, Mo.; Teague, Texas; Hood River, Ore.; Luther, Mich.; Sault Ste.Marie, Mich.; Quinlan, Okla.; Ocean Park, Calif.; Walter, Okla.; Fargo, Okla.; Pawnee, Okla.; Chillicothe, O,; Randall St. Church, Baltimore, Md.; East Aurora, N. Y.; Whitesboro, Texas; Aaza, Ia.; Nickerson, Kan., and Boardway Church, Pueblo, Colo. These twenty-four churches by having paid off their loans promptly have greatly advanced the cause of missions, sinco the returned loans from these churches will soon make possible twenty-four new church buildings in that number of new mission fields. Let this be an incentive and example to other churches now using Church Extension money to promptly return their loans .

At the meeting of our Board on Feb. 4, the following churches were granted loans: Roanake, Va., 9th Ave. Ch. (colored), $600; Sentinel, Okla., 1st Ch., $300; Washington, D. C., 3rd Ch., $4;000; Moore, Okla., 1st Ch., $400; Edgewater, N. J., $600; Brooklyn, N. Y., Ridgewood Heights Ch., $3,000; Silsbee, Tex., $700; Greentown, Ind., $2,000; Sturgis, Ky., $5,000, and Austin Park Church, El Paso, Texas, $2,000.

The following loans were closed: aggregating $47,850 to sixteen churches to aid them in paying their last debts on completed buildings:

Middletown, Ky., $600; Hartford, Ks., $1,500; Covington, Va., $1,000; Huntington, W. Va., 6th Ave., $5.000; Madras, Ore., $500; Auburn, Neb., $5,000; Beloit, Wis., $750; Fowler, Colo., $2,500; Wichita, Ks., (West Wichita Ch.), $2,000; Rosalia, Wash., $1,500; Pittsburg, Pa., Sheraden Ch., $4,000; Portland, Ore., Central Ch., $15,000; Edmond, Okla., $500; Cohassett, Minn., $500; Murfreesboro, Tenn., $5,000; Lebanon, Ore., $2,500.

This was the largest month for the closing of loans in our history.

At a meeting on Feb. 4, a new Name Fund was established by the Christian Board of Publication of St. Louis. This fund will be known hereafter as "The Christian Board of Publication" Fund. Whatever money is sent from the publishing house will go to the building up of this Name Fund and the Board will show from year to year the number of churches that this fund has has built, as it does in the case of every other Name Fund.

Recently an annuity of $250 was received from a friend in Indiana, and a bequest of $2,500 from the estate of Albert Buchanan, of Auburn, Ind.

Foreign Mission News

Some years ago L. B. Haskins, minister of the church at Palestine, Tex., took the confession and baptized Mrs. J. E. Moody, recently appointed missionary to the Foreign Society. Now the church in Palestine will support her in India as their living-link is another new Living-link.

A friend in Missouri sends $500 to the Foreign Society on the Annuity Plan. A number of Annuity gifts have recently been received and we will welcome others.

Mrs. C. E. Robinson, Sendai, Japan, reports that there have been four baptisms in the Sendai District since the last report. C. E. Robinson goes to Fukushima every Sunday morning to teach an English Bible class. This class is made up of normal school students. It is many miles away.

All the Christian workers of Sendai, Japan, are holding an "early dawn" prayer-meeting every morning. They meet at 5:30. They hope to keep this up for a month. They feel that their work has not been prospering as it should and they are calling upon God for a revival in their hearts and a new consecration in their lives.

Frank Garrett, Nankin, China, reports 22 students and 5 others baptized recently, and some 10 more who are asking for baptism. The missionary's heart is encouraged and we all certainly rejoice with him.

Miss Kate V. Johnson, Tokyo, Japan, says that she was a victim of influenza during the Christmas season, but that the Christians had the best Christmas in the history of the school. The native Christians paid all the expenses. Besides this, the native Christians helped a number of the sick. The beloved pastor, Mr. Woskida, has been ill for some months, but is now recovering.

E. R. Moon and wife of Oregon are on their way back to the Congo. They have had a restful furlough, although Brother Moon has been kept busy making addresses. They leave their little child with relatives. This is a trying test. They sail from New York, February 20 on the S. S. Baltic, White Star Line. They are much needed in Africa.

We are enabled to report more than 200 additions on the foreign field each month by our missionaries. This is no mean result, but it is only a tithe of all that is being done in 99 schools, 24 hospitals, 273 Sunday-schools, 155 churches, 5 Bible Colleges, besides four printing presses and an evangelistic and teaching force numbering more than one thousand. We have great reason for rejoicing over the far-reaching work that is being done.

S. M. Bernard, San Dimas, Cal., says, "Our oranges and lemons are frozen, but our zeal in missions is not." This is a fine saying, and it is a true one. Southern California never showed more zeal and interest in Foreign Missions than she is revealing today.

The students of Eureka College have become a Living-link in the Foreign Society. They have signed in pledges $787 for the first year. These pledges are to run over a five-year period. We doubt if any student body among us has ever undertaken a more heroic thing than this. The pledges are in addition to the gifts of the Eureka Church to the Foreign Society. This great advance movement was inspired through a recent visit of A. E. Cory, Dr. Dye, D. O. Cunningham and J. C. Ogden of the Million Dollar team.

At the last meeting of the Executive Committee, A. G. Saunders was appointed a missionary of the Foreign Society. He is a graduate of Bethany College.

Miss Mary Rioch, of Tokyo, will return to America this year on her regular furlough.

M. B. Madden, Osaka, Japan, reports as follows: "Seven baptisms in Osaka District, four young men and three women. One-tenth of the money raised at Christmas was given to a Christian Orphanage. Also in December the church here raised the largest amount on preacher's salary of any month since I have been here. A young banker and a medical student have volunteered to teach in the Sunday-school."

A New Way to Make Money

I am making a fortune selling Pure Fruit Candy. Any brainy person can do likewise; so if you want to make more money than you ever possessed, write me and I will start you in business. I am glad to help others, who, like myself, need money. People say "the candy is the best they ever tasted"—therein lies the beauty of the business—the candy is eaten immediately and more ordered. You don't have to canvass; you sell right from your own home. I made $12 the first day. So can you. Isabel Inez, Block 141 East Liberty, Pittsburgh, Pa.

Three Occidental Visitors in India

India has had a large number of visitors this winter. Perhaps the first to be mentioned, from the standpoints of both time and general interest, is that of John R. Mott. Doctor Mott is the chairman of the continuation committee appointed at the Edinburgh conference. The committee has been planning many things for the good of missions, among them the methods of how missions may so co-operate as largely to increase their efficiency. Last year Doctor Hodgkin came out from England in the interest of Union Language schools. Partly through his visit a language school for missionaries has been established in Lucknow. Three of our own missionaries are in attendance, studying Hindi. The principal wrote me a few days ago that they are all doing very good work.

Dr. Mott's Conferences.

But to return to Doctor Mott's visit, a carefully planned series of conferences was held in the chief mission areas of India. There were eight such conferences. In each of them a carefully prepared agenda was discussed, bearing on such matters as co-operation and unity, Christian education, evangelism, Christian literature, the Indian church and others. One of the eight conferences was held in Jubbulpore, which is the chief mission center in Mid India. About fifty missionaries and leading Indian Christians were present. The Disciples of Christ were well-represented, and their influence was quite important in the conference. Plans and methods of more effective co-operation were discussed in the most brotherly fashion. At the close of this conference five delegates, representing five of the chief missions in the area, were appointed to the National Conference in Calcutta.

At the National Conference about sixty leading missionaries and Indian Christians, representing as far as possible all the mission interests in India were present. Large matters were discussed. It was decided to form federal mission councils in each of the eight chief mission areas in India. These councils will have on them representatives of each mission at work in the area. Then there is to be a national council, representing these eight areas, and composed of twenty members. In this way it is believed that joint action can be taken by the missions on many matters affecting their common interests. One matter in which the writer feels much interest is the formation of a special committee to promote the development of Christian literature. A committee of eight or ten, including the writer, has been appointed to make a survey of the literature needed and available, and to make plans for the provision of what is still lacking.

Along with Doctor Mott there were several young men connected with the Y. M. C A., who held special meetings in the different towns through which they passed. Doctor Mott and several of these people held the most interesting meeting in Jubbulpore From five to seven hundred educated Indians and students attended the meeting. Much interest was manifested.

Dr. Willett at Jubbulpore.

Another visitor in whom the Disciples of Christ, both in India and America, have a most special interest is Dr. H. L. Willett. Doctor Willett and a party from Chicago University have been visiting many missions as all readers of this paper are well aware. Doctor and Mrs. Willett and two members of the party, visited Jubbulpore on January 11 and 12. Doctor Willett gave two addresses in English while here—one of them to educated Indians in the C. M. S. High School—and preached a morning sermon on Sunday, January 12. This, of course, had to be interpreted. Miss Parker, one of the membmers of the party gave a very interesting address on 'Religious Education' to the students of the Bible College. Dr. and Mrs. Willett left us to visit Bilaspore and Damoh. The other members of the party remained with us two days longer. The visit of Doctor Willett was a very great pleasure to us and not only to the missionaries of our own mission but to many others in Jubbulpore as well. Doctor Willett gave a most direct address and made the most urgent appeal, coupled with the strongest gospel sermon which I have ever heard delivered before an educated Indian audience and it was well received. We hope that it may bear much fruit. On Sunday morning when he preached in our church the Methodists adjourned their meeting and brought up their congregation to hear the message of the day. This was a very strong address based on Luther's "Little Bible" John 3-16. We regretted to see them go but we were glad that they might have the opportunity of seeing even a litle of our work in some of the other stations. Friends in Bilaspore and Damoh tell us that the genial personalities of Doctor and Mrs. Willett made their visit most welcome while the message which Doctor Willett gave was one which was a benefit to all who heard.

Dr. Horton's Tour.

About the time Doctor Mott was in India Dr. R. H. Horton, one of the best known ministers of Great Britain, was also here and went about throughout the chief cities of India visiting many stations and also holding meetings with educated Indians. Doctor Horton did not visit Jubbulpore but spent most of his time in university centers. His meetings too were fruitful.

Ten Big Reasons Why

BETHANY GRADED LESSONS are being adopted by so many of the best schools among Disciples

1. There is more to them—at least a third more—than is contained in any other series.
2. They are rich, vital and full of suggestion to teacher and pupil.
3. They are free from the sectarian spirit.
4. They are soundly and fervently evangelical.
5. They are truly artistic in all their illustrations.
6. They are printed on better paper with better binding and in better taste than any other series.
7. Every lesson writer is an expert of interdenominational reputation.
8. They are a monument to the modern spirit of unity—a dozen leading denominations have co-operated to produce them and are now using them.
9. The Disciples possess full editorial rights, through the editor. Charles Clayton Morrison.
10. Every Disciple school that uses them participates in and promotes a great Christian union enterprise.

EVERY QUARTER ADDS TO THE NUMBER OF SCHOOLS INTRODUCING THESE LESSONS.

A VICTORY FOR HUMANITY

CHICAGO

Disciples Publication Society

THE DISCIPLES PUBLICATION SOCIETY is a corporation chartered under the laws of Illinois. It is organized for the purpose of publishing books, Sunday School literature and a weekly religious newspaper. It has no capital stock. Its profits are not to go to individuals but to be appropriated to advance the cause of religious education, especially the higher education of the Christian ministry. The term "religious education" is regarded as an ideal common to Sunday Schools, missionary societies, colleges, seminaries and universities, and other organizations that promote Christian progress through Christian education. The Society through its trustees has purchased the entire assets and good will of the New Christian Century Company (including the subscription list and good will of The Christian Century; a contract of participation in the interdenominational syndicate for publishing the Bethany Graded Lessons; a contract of membership in the United Religious Press; all books, Sunday School supplies and other stock on hand; all accounts and bills receivable; besides assuming liability for all accounts and bills payable), for $16,000 and has executed its notes to that amount which have been accepted by the stock-holders of the New Christian Century Company in payment for their property. To provide capital for enlarging the business the trustees are issuing 5 per cent bonds in the amount of $50,000, retirable after five years, to be sold to persons interested in the ideals of The Christian Century. It is believed at the present time that not more than $25,000 of these bonds need be sold in order to put the Society on a sound profit earning basis. Subscriptions for the purchase of these bonds are now being solicited by C. C. Morrison and H. L. Willett, editors of The Christian Century. During Dr. Willett's absence in the Orient correspondence may be addressed exclusively to Mr. Morrison. Full information as to all details will be given upon inquiry. The essential purpose of the transaction and proposals herein described is to provide a way for the general brotherhood of the Disciples of Christ to buy The Christian Century and its publishing house and to pay for them by patronizing them. The bonds and notes are to be retired out of the profits earned by the Society. The purchasers of bonds, therefore, will stand, with the holders of notes, in the position of sustainers or supporters of the enterprise while the brotherhood's patronage is paying for it and increasing its value. The question of defining the membership of the Disciples Publication Society is still open, and upon it the organizers will be glad to receive suggestions. It is the purpose to make it thoroughly democratic and representative. The five trustees named by the charter will act for the Society until the basis of membership has been determined and the members elected.

THE LIGHT IS BREAKING

President F. D. Kershner's department in last week's Christian Standard strikes a note altogether new among Disciples, outside the readers of The Christian Century. That a statement so directly contradictory of Alexander Campbell's teaching on baptism should now appear in our most reactionary newspaper marks the beginning of the end of the immersion dogma. President Kershner calls attention to the new "Baptist Bible," a version which sets the word "immerse" in parenthesis following each instance in which the word "baptize" occurs. He comments on this rendering as follows:

> "It may be well to note here that the charge so frequently brought against the translations of the Bible, both in the days of King James and of Victoria, that theological bias interfered to prevent the rendering of baptizo as "immerse," is a very mistaken and fallacious one. Baptizo means "immerse," it is true, but it also means a great deal more. It is altogether easy to immerse people without baptizing them. Every time a diver plunges under he is immersed, but he is not baptized. Baptism means immersion as a physical action, but as a religious rite it carries a far deeper significance. Had the translators not faced this difficulty I have no doubt but that they would have substituted the word "immersion" for "baptism." The situation being as it is, however, they were fully justified in translating the word as they did. To render the New Testament baptizo into English as "immerse," with the implication that the last-named word is a complete equivalent, is a very decided error."

This almost startling utterance was preceded the week before by the emphatic admission by the same writer that it was "most certainly and infallibly true" that Christian unity demands our recognition of the "validity of other churches' membership." If these words mean, as they must mean, that an unimmersed Presbyterian, for example, is "certainly and infallibly" a member of the Church of Christ, Mr. Kershner has in these two weeks sown two seeds in the minds of the Standard's readers which, if allowed to grow, will call for a complete reconstruction of their theory of baptism and the adoption of the practice of Christian union with Presbyterian members of the Church of Christ whether immersed or unimmersed.

For it is pretty hard for a Disciple of Christ to give a good reason for not receiving a member of the Church of Christ into his and his congregation's full fellowship.

When Brevity Is the Soul of Wit

Hetty is 8, and has learned some of the simple rules of grammar. However, they seem to have very little meaning to her.

Hetty's uncle, who is a schoolteacher, met her on the street one beautiful May day and asked her if she was going out with the Maying party.

"No, I ain't going."

"Oh, my dear!" said her uncle, "you must not say 'I ain't going.' You must say, 'I am not going.'" And he proceeded to give her a little lesson in grammar: "You are not going. He is not going. We are not going. You are not going. They are not going. Now can you say all that, Hetty?"

"Of course I can," she replied, making a courtesy. "There ain't nobody going."

The following letters have been received:

By J. P. MYERS, Marion, Ind.

I am charmed with the prospect of the new "Century." The unselfish way you approach this task is admirable. The good Lord greatly bless and prosper the launching of your new plans.

By L. F. WATSON, Petersburg, Ill.

Am in perfect sympathy with you, and your paper is a real help to me every week. It is not the largest, but it is the best read paper that comes into my house, with the exception, of course, of The Observer,—I read proof on that. [Mr. Watson is editor of the Petersburg Observer.—Editors.]

By L. B. PICKERELL, Deland, Ill.

I congratulate you on the re-organization of the Christian Century and earnestly hope for you the realization of your expectations.

By CLOYD GOODNIGHT, Shelbyville, Ind.

Tone is better than mere pages. Am glad to note your continued unwillingness to get size at the expense of vitality.

[But we'll have size, too, if our friends will furnish us the capital, and with more size more vitality. Try us and see!—Editors.]

By M. B. AINSWORTH, Georgetown, Ky.

First of all I want to express my appreciation of your editorial on the Lord's Supper It was the clearest and most accurate statement of the spiritual significance of the Lord's Supper that I have ever read in a religious paper.

By E. W. ELLIOTT, Tampa, Fla.

I love the "Century" for its freshness and originality and independence. I have been amused at some of your readers writing to the effect that they did not agree with you—as if any sane editor expected full agreement from all, or many, of his readers. What you write stimulates thought and that is more important than agreement.

CHARLES CLAYTON MORRISON,
700 E. 40th Street, Chicago.

I am interested in doing what I can to aid you and Dr. Willett in your plan for firmly establishing The Christian Century in the ownership and control of the Disciples. Kindly send me additional information. How long do the bonds extend? In what financial condition does the new Society begin business? Can you accept payment for bonds on the installment plan or must you have immediate cash for entire amount subscribed?

A Victory for Humanity

What is the real value of the discovery of either pole? Merely this: The human mind having set itself to the task of conquering the globe will stop at nothing short of the full achievement of that perilous ambition. It is matching man's will and fortitude against storm, cold and hunger. The flags of the civilized nations float now over both the poles. The real value of the discovery is its moral value. Let us be thankful that this second achievement is not to be lost out of the list of moral victories by bitter personalities. Unless the discovery of the poles records something of moral value, and is a real spiritual achievement, they are not worth discovering.

The quest of the poles has been terribly costly. Civilization has given of its bravest and best in almost hopeless battle with eternal winter. Humanity has conquered. That is to say, it has conquered its own undertaking. It has not subdued winter; the poles are still the dreariest, most uninteresting, least worth-discovering, of any two spots on the whole surface of the earth; and winter howls undisputed as in all past ages there. But the will of man has attained its determined goal. It has met its own challenge. The real conquest has been within the soul of civilization. Men have felt that it was unworthy for mankind to set a task and fail before its accomplishment. This is what has spurred them on. This, and not the supposed practical or scientific value, of their discovery, has nerved them to pull their frozen feet, one after the other, till they reached a spot where the sun rode visibly all around the horizon, and every point of the compass was north. The real value of the discovery is the proclamation of the might of the human will; the domination of man's unconquerable spirit. And now that we have seen it, at both ends of the earth, let us rejoice that this latter triumph is not to be followed by pitiful and despisable controversy.

The discovery of the North Pole was announced to the world by two different men, whose discoveries, if they had both been genuine, would have been practically simultaneous. Truth is stranger than fiction. The discovery of the South Pole is proclaimed to the world as the practically simultaneous discovery of two different expeditions. A novelist would hardly have dared to conceive of two such amazing improbabilities.

There will be no South Pole controversy. For this let us be thankful. Better that Captain Scott and the four brave men with him should die amid the snow than that they should come back to bitter wrangling and recrimination such as occurred between Peary and Cook. For after all what is the value of the discovery of either one of the poles? It is certain that no manifest practical benefit is to be derived therefrom. The South Pole is located, so it appears, on solid earth, but it is earth permanently uninhabitable. No life of any kind has been found there, either animal or vegetable. No deposits of metal or of any precious substance are indicated by any geological outcrop. If coal is there it cannot be mined by any present methods, for no company of miners could subsist there, nor can any present methods of transportation avail to bring the product to market. It is barren, dreary, and so far as we can see, an entirely worthless discovery, so far as any practical results are concerned. If any large scientific benefit is to accrue to humanity it has not yet been announced.

The explorers died bravely. They have added a new laurel to the wreath that crowns the world's heroism. The men of the British Navy who wrote their dying message with numb fingers and stout hearts have preserved the high traditions of Anglo-Saxon fortitude. The lesson will not be lost on the world. Whether the expedition was worth while or not depends not on the material reward or the scientific value of what has been found in the frigid South. The perpetual snows of the antartic glow with a new radiance because men have met death there unterrified and in pursuit of duty as they understood it. They did not boast. They did not pose. They made no weak appeal for sympathy. They met death unconquered. So far as we can discover, this is the chief value of polar exploration. All values are to be determined finally in terms of character. The real worth of the South Pole to the world is the new example which it has given to mankind of fortitude and faithfulness.

The Veto of the Immigration Act

President Taft, at the eleventh hour, vetoed the recently-enacted immigration act, principally upon the ground of his disapproval of the literacy test which it contained. The Senate would have passed the act over the President's veto, had the House concurred. The measure as a revision and codification of present rather loose laws of the subject of immigration is praiseworthy. The literacy test, for which New England, under the leadership of Senator Lodge, has been contending for years, has been opposed on several grounds. It is argued that it does not exclude the "Black Hand" and anarchistic elements, which are the chief menace to our American civilization. Moreover, by this test many fields are deprived of labor which is urgently needed and which is of such a character that native Americans will not perform. Perhaps the chief objection is the obvious unfairness of this test. For example, a father unable to read would bring about the exclusion of his entire family, every one of whom might be able to read and write. The determining test of exclusion should be moral, not educational. This is the second time that a literacy test for immigrants has been vetoed by a president, Grover Cleveland in 1897 likewise having refused to approve a bill barring aliens who could not read or write. Secretary Nagel has strongly opposed this test, and in a letter to the president points out, among other things, the rapid strides the foreign-born citizen is making in acquiring farm lands.

English Educational Reform

According to Lord Haldane, in a recent speech at the Manchester Reform Club, the next and most urgent social problem to be taken up by the Liberal government is that of educational reform, which, as is well known, has been for years in a most chaotic state. The scheme as proposed by Lord Haldane includes the following points: Education to begin earlier than at five years; an extension of medical treatment, and probably of school meals, to secure the fitness of the children; recognition of three types of pupils, those whose education ends with the elementary school, those who go on to the secondary school, and those who pass on to the university; a large increase of provincial universities; higher status for both elementary and secondary teachers; the cost to be met from taxes and not from the rates. Whatever plan the government may propose for educational reform, it will have to reckon with the desire of the Church of England to fasten upon the state system the right of the Church of England to enter the schools, for the purpose of giving religious instruction. The Archbishop of Canterbury has already voiced his disapproval of the proposed scheme unless it shall provide directly for religious instruction. It is generally felt that England has not been upon an equality with other nations which are her commercial competitors, in providing educational opportunities for the children of the nation, and it is evident that this is due in large measure to the obstructionist policy of the Church of England. Were the Church of England given the "right of entry" to the council schools, there would be no further opposition from that quarter. It is to be hoped that the present Liberal government may have a lease of life long enough at least to inaugurate this much needed reform.

Is Friedmann a Doctor Cook or a Judas?

Why is Dr. Friedrich Franz Friedmann withholding his discovery of a cure for tuberculosis from the world? Is his alleged discovery a fake? Or is he waiting until he can get his price? If the former, he would seem to be the Doctor Cook of medical science; if the latter, he has gone Judas one better. Some days ago Doctor Friedmann announced that he would give his live "culture" to the government for examination and testing. A statement has just been issued by Professor Kirchner, the head of the Prussian department of health, in which it is declared not only that Doctor Friedmann has not done this but that he has actually refused to submit the same to the government's usual scientific tests at the government experimental bacteriological institute at Frankfort-on-the-Main. The impression of the majority of the newspaper men who have talked with Doctor Friedmann has been that the commercial instinct is predominant with him. He is said to have estimated that the commercial rights to his culture over the world ought to be worth $5,000,000 to him. He has already engaged passage for the United States, which he doubtless regards as a rich field. The American patients admit that the treatment seems to be doing them good, but there is a disposition to criticize the doctor on account of his unprofessional methods. The official investigation carried on by the state department into the merits of this new cure at the request of congress will soon be printed, and then we shall know the facts.

An American Lloyd-George?

The sixteenth amendment to the constitution of the United States, providing congress with the "power to lay and collect taxes on incomes, from whatever sources derived, without apportionment among the several states and without regard to any census enumeration," has at last been ratified by the requisite number of states. Heretofore the burden of taxation has rested upon the consumer. Because the tax is indirect no one sees it and therefore it has not been felt to be a burden, although no one can buy a pair of shoes or a suit of clothes or a pound of sugar without making a contribution to the support of the government. Under the new amendment, the accumulated wealth of the nation, as represented by the private fortunes of its people, heretofore an untapped source of revenue, will bear its share of the burden. The Democratic party in its return to power has before it the greatest opportunity it has had for more than two generations to carry out a series of fiscal reforms, of which it has long been dreaming, and for which the public has been clamoring insistently for many years. Without placing any unjust burden upon the rich it will now be possible to lighten the burden of the poor by shifting the cost of government to the shoulders best able to bear it. Will Mr. Wilson prove to be another Lloyd-George in leading out his party upon a course of fiscal and social reform for the benefit of the entire people? There are some things which point in this direction. Whether he can get his party to follow him remains to be seen.

—The Standard Oil Company has been declaring dividends again and the "Standard Oil Company" is about $10,000,000 richer today than he was on Feb. 1. Of a special dividend declared Fef. 3 by the Standard Oil Company of New Jersey this amount approximately represents Mr. Rockefeller's share of a total distribution of $39,332,000 of the company's capital stock at the rate of $40 a share. The huge "melon" comes as a result, it was indicated in a statement given out by the company, of the Supreme court dissolution decree. This necessitated the payment to the parent company of vast sums owed to it by former subsidiaries. The Standard Oil Company of New Jersey divested itself of thirty-four subsidiary companies on Dec. 1, 1911. Under the old regime this company acted in the nature of a banker to its subsidiaries. The balance sheet of 1906 showed "accounts receivable" of $56,487,328, which was mostly represented by loans to the smaller companies. At the time of the dissolution such advances and other loans were calculated to reach $100,000,000, or just about equal to the entire capital stock of the New Jersey corporation. Since the dissolution there has been a considerable liquidation of these obligations between the different companies. The result has been the placing of Standard Oil of New Jersey in an extremely strong position.

—Illinois is going to take care of her crippled children. Difficulties in the erection and maintenance of schools for crippled children, for sub-normal children, for incipient invalid children, and for epileptic children will be overcome if bills to be introduced at the present session of the state legislature are passed. The form of the bill was approved by the board of education and the legislative committee will have the bills introduced. The first bill gives boards of education in cities of more than 100,000 population power to establish and maintain classes and schools for the instruction of crippled children and provides for the payment from the state treasury of the excess cost of operating the schools over the cost of operating elementary schools for normal children. It fixes the maximum of excess cost as $150 per pupil. The other bill is similar except that it provides for the operation of schools for the subnormal, the incipient invalid, and the epileptic. The maximum excess cost per pupil is $60 for subnormal, $110 for incipient invalid, and $75 for epileptic.

—There are 13,000,000 cases of sickness among workers in this country each year which could be ascribed to occupational diseases and a money loss of almost three-quarters of a billion dollars annually thereby, according to papers read before the women's department of the National Civic federation in New York. There is an arsenic poison menace in twenty-seven different trades, declared Dr. John Andrews, secretary of the American Association for Labor Legislation, and in 138 trades workers are in constant danger of lead poisoning. "Only three states have efficient protective occupational laws," he declared.

A PAGE FOR INTERDENOMINATIONAL ACQUAINTANCE

Innocence Sacrificed to Dogma

The Rev. H. Percy Silver, an innocent man in a successful divorce proceeding he instituted some years ago, cannot be the bishop coadjutor of the diocese of Kansas, to which he was elected by that diocese last fall, because a majority of the bishops of the Protestant Episcopal Church failed to give their necessary consent to his ordination and consecration. Bishop Daniel S. Tuttle of Missouri, in his capacity of Presiding Bishop of the Church, has notified Kansas of this failure, which ended forever the hope of that diocese that Doctor Silver would receive the constitutional majority.

Doctor Silver is a national figure in the Episcopal Church. His aggressive and strategic work as the general secretary of one of the missionary departments of that church, has made him so. An earned promotion at last came to him when Kansas elected him its bishop coadjutor. Kansas knew that Doctor Silver unfortunately was a divorced man. He was a chaplain in the United States Army stationed for several years in the Philippines. When he returned home from his labors, it became necessary for him to institute divorce proceedings against his wife in a civil court. He won his suit easily.

That was several years ago. The Protestant Episcopal Church is committed to the dogma of the indissolubility of marriage. It is extremely doubtful if a single clergyman in that church would remarry divorcees even according to the present canons, which permit the re-marriage of the innocent party after a lapse of one year. The Episcopal Church reasons with the Roman Catholic Church that if marriage is indissoluble, divorce is impossible, and re-marriage particularly is sinful because it is polygamous. Doctor Silver, a divorced man, has never re-married, and in all probability has never even thought of it. But, it might possibly enter into his head, while a duly consecrated Bishop, to marry again!

It was this remote possibility that inhibited many a bishop's vote. It never occurred to these venerable brethren that their own episcopal fortunes might have turned against them, if the bishops voting on their consecration had reasoned that they might have turned horse-thieves after their consecration! Those bishops with whom this remote possibility did not act as an influence in their adverse votes, had both an abstract dogma to maintain and a church opinion to fear. A dogma was at stake. There was a "Catholic Party" to appease. But in the last analysis, an innocent man was sacrificed to a dogma. This is not the first time in religious history that an innocent man has been so sacrificed.

Should the Churches Be Closed?

Professor Willard O. Fisher of Wesleyan University, at Middletown, Conn., remarked the other day, according to newspaper report, that he believed religion might benefit very materially by a closing down of all the churches for several years. Whereupon President William A. Shanklin, D. D., came to the rescue of the churches by inviting Professor Fisher to starve himself to death so far as the Wesleyan University is concerned. Professor Fisher was told indignantly that he was out of place even in a non-sectarian institution. Professor Fisher resigned, of course. Apparently, it did not occur to the Rev. Dr. Shanklin that there might be a grain of wisdom in the professor's words. Col. George Harvey, of Harper's Weekly, pertinently remarks: "It is a fact that many people whose disposition is entirely favorable to the churches ask themselves whether the churches nowadays fulfill their function as well as they should and whether they could be bettered. If that is what is going on in the mind of Professor Fisher, what is the harm? It is as though a mill inspector should be asked to resign for saying that the machinery in a certain mill seemed to him out of date and the mill might better shut down for a time. It might be a sound opinion. The operatives in the mill probably would not like it, and perhaps they would do what President Shanklin has done."

Canadian Skies Clearing

Presbyterian anti-unionism in Canada is probably at an end, according to The Continent (Presbyterian), which gives the following bit of news:

> "The Canadian General Assembly's committee on church union had a meeting not long since in Toronto, and for three days discussion ranged back and forth between the advocates of two opposing resolutions. Of these one recommended that the committee should break off all negotiations for organic consolidation with the Congregational and Methodist denominations, and proposed instead a scheme by which these denominations should co-operate in federation. The other resolution, proposed by Doctor Herridge of Ottawa and Principal McKay of Vancouver, provided that the committee would proceed with negotiations aiming to consummate union as soon as practicable. Advocates of federation declared that at least one-third of the church was set against any merger and that an attempt to proceed in that direction would simply bring into Presbyterian ranks vitally serious dissension. Through nine successive sessions, as the committee sat morning, afternoon and evening, the conflict between these antagonistic ideas went on, and at the ninth session the Herridge-McKay resolution was supported by thirty-eight votes, while the opposition could muster but six.
> "It seems probable that this is practically the end of Presbyterian anti-unionism in Canada. That this long debate was conducted in the very best temper was manifest by the fact that the six minority members issued a public statement, in which they thanked the majority for the courteous and kindly treatment they had received."

Professor Francis G. Peabody

Dr. Francis G. Peabody, the noted professor of Christian Morals at Harvard University, has retired after thirty years of faculty service at Harvard, was made professor emeritus, and will sail for Japan May 1 to deliver lectures at five universities.

On January 30, Professor Peabody was tendered a banquet in Boston by 100 laymen and clergymen. Dr. Charles W. Eliot, president emeritus of Harvard, presided. Around the banquet table were such notables as Bishop William Lawrence, Dr. George A. Gordon, Dr. Samuel M. Crothers, President Hyde of Bowdoin College, Bishop Boyd-Carpenter. Doctor Eliot in a speech credited Professor Peabody with being a pioneer in social reform. President Hyde remarked that before Professor Peabody went to Harvard thirty years ago to look after its religious activities, not more than one-tenth of the students were earnest Christians, whereas now, thanks to Professor Peabody's work and influence, "the world looks to Harvard for religious leadership."

Professor Peabody in responding to the various speeches, struck a high key-note, when he said: "The heart of the time is thirsty for the living God; and if God's truth is not poured down from above, it will be pumped up from the brackish waters of social revolution." The name of Professor Peabody is familiar to all who have been stirred by those two great books of his: "Jesus Christ and the Social Question" and "Jesus Christ and Christian Character." The former of these two works antedates most, if not all, of the present bibliography on social reform and service.

Dr. McArthur Quits Atlanta.

Dr. R. S. McArthur has succeeded at last in resigning the pastorate of Len G. Broughton's famous Baptist Church in Atlanta. It may be recalled that Dr. McArthur attempted to resign the same charge a few months ago, after having scarcely more than settled down. The resignation then, however, failed to work. But this time, if the press advices are reliable, the resignation sticks. Just what is the matter, we do not know. It would seem that a president of the World's Baptist Alliance ought to be big enough for the Atlanta brethren, not to mention Dr. McArthur's New York City celebrity. But then, you know, the Atlanta brethren might not be big enough for Dr. McArthur. It is a poor rule that may not work both ways.

Presbyterian Labor Temple.

It is reported by the Presbyterian Banner that a great Labor Temple, planned by Rev. Charles Stelzle a short while ago, will be built in New York City to cost between $350,000 and $500,000. The money will be raised by popular subscription. It is rumored that the "temple" will take the form of a sky-scraper, where the laboring organizations of New York City can make their various headquarters. It is estimated that some 4,000 men use the present Labor Temple, the plot of which has already been purchased for $200,000. The old Fourteenth Street Presbyterian Church is the present Labor Temple.

John D. Rockefeller and Missions.

John D. Rockefeller, whose missionary money was questioned by the Congregationalists, some years ago, has offered to give $100,000 if there is raised from other sources as much as $250,000 on or before April 1, 1913. Apparently, the Baptist brethren are not excited about "tainted money," for they seem to be going ahead to get the Rockefeller money. The Baptists this year have set out to increase their annual contributions to missions to $3,000,000.

New Education Secretary for Baptists.

Rev. Frank W. Padelford has been elected as secretary of the Board of Education of the Northern Baptist Convention. His principal labor for that board will be largely that of investigation, which will be done principally by correspondence. Doctor Padelford will continue his present relation with the Massachusetts Baptist Missionary Society.

Gideon: The Honest Doubter

"If Jehovah is with us, why then is all this befallen us?" The doubt of Gideon was reasonable. He had heard of the ancient doings of Jehovah, how Israel had been saved by the power of her God. To him the presence of Jehovah meant help, deliverance from enemies. But at that time it could be written that the enemies of the people of Israel "came up against them; and they encamped against them, and destroyed the increase of the earth * * * and left no sustenance in Israel, neither sheep, nor ox, nor ass. * * * And Israel was brought very low." It was natural that a patriotic heart should ask for the evidence of the presence of the God of Israel.

There is nobility in honest doubt. Much that is called doubt is unworthy of the name. Men without ideals are not doubters, they are simply without character, and character of a worthy sort is expressed in doubt. Had Gideon been unpatriotic he would have been indifferent to the presence of Jehovah. He could have joined the enemy and given information against his brethren. It was his sense of oneness with his people and his sharing of their wretchedness that drew from Gideon the question, "Why then is all this befallen us?" The swinish man is not a doubter. He simply has no appreciation of the finer things of life, and the splendid enthusiasms of the heroes of the race are utterly incomprehensible to him. He calls them moonshine.

In his commentary on Habakkuk, George Adam Smith speaks thus of the doubt that arises from faith: "Habakkuk's is the burden of the finest faith. He illustrates the great commonplace of religious doubt, that problems arise and become rigorous in proportion to the purity and tenderness of a man's conception of God. It is not the coarsest but the finest temperaments which are exposed to scepticism. Every advance in assurance of God or in appreciation of His character develops new perplexities in face of the facts of experience, and faith becomes her own most cruel troubler. Habakkuk's questions are not due to any cooling of the religious temper of Israel, but are begotten of the very heat and ardor of prophecy in its encounter with experience. His tremulousness, for instance, is impossible without the high knowledge of God's purity and faithfulness, which the older prophets had achieved in Israel."

Doubt, then, is an incident in the life of faith. It is a sign of growth. The doubter is unwilling to let the world go on as it always has done. He thinks some changes should be made. And he will ultimately go to work to bring about these changes. The unbeliever expects nothing good. He is willing to leave the world as it is, lest in attempting to get a more comfortable place he lose the one he has. The faith of the doubter will force him into action. It tells him if there is wrong being done, he must do something about it. His part may not be very great but it is important enough to command all his energies. Elijah may lie down and ask that his life be taken away, after defeat has come to him, but he is soon selecting a successor and defending with his former vigor the faith of Israel. The man without faith quits work. The obstacles he meets are insuperable.

Not only does faith send us to our tasks, it is increased by honest work. The idler cannot believe that anything worth while is being done and that there is any sufficient reward for labor. The worker knows what it is to secure results. The greater the results, the more certain he becomes that the world is made on the right plan. Of course, we must do the right kind of work and get the right kind of results in order to have our faith grow. If we are engaged in a business that requires us to deceive and rob the helpless and we prosper by it, our faith in the devil will grow rather than our faith in God. Lack of confidence in men is removed by wisely seeking their coöperation in good works. Those who minister to the most wretched and sinful find nobility of character that renews their confidence in the human race.

Weak faith may demand superficial results. There were men in Jesus' day who were disappointed in him because he emphasized the spirituality of religion more than he did signs and wonders. Weak faith becomes strong when the better result is accepted and understood. Experience will teach us finally to look for the rewards of effort in disciplined character and in delight in God as truth, goodness, and love. Of course, faith looks for present satisfactions. We live for this world as well as for the world that is to come. Its beauty and its delights are for the faithful. But we may often be perplexed before we know how to use the world so that it will minister to the best in us. [Midweek Service, March 5. Judges 6:11-17, 36-40.] S. J.

The Holy Catholic Church

"I believe in the Holy Catholic Church."

Those who thus affirm put themselves on the side of those verities which can never be shaken. They are members of a body whose representatives are in many lands, whose cohorts are on many fields, whose scholars are in many halls, whose heralds are in many pulpits, whose saints are at many shrines. They are the immortal host living and dead whose influence has been the glory of the world. It is that Church which steadies the race in its ascent.

It is well for us at times to take a wide outlook and see the Church as a whole. The congregation frets us oftentimes with its pettiness. But the catholic view fills the mind with a sense of nobility, and its effect upon us is that of light breaking through clouds when storms have racked the heavens. It is an every day duty to forget the parish and behold the vast Church. The field is the world. It is a tonic for the soul to forget the denomination and recount the triumphs of the Church universal, to remember that all churches add their mite to its greatness as rivers add their freshness to the sea.

Well indeed is it for us to have our eyes unsealed that we may look beyond the cloud that rims our dwelling to the unfolding horizons wherein God is attempting to reveal to saint and prophet and seer the messages which the Amoses and Hoseas of today are striving to record. Well is it to have our ears set free from the bondage of petty controversies that we may hear the utterances of those great souls who are speaking to us in language like cathedral music. It is as though we had passed out of the marsh and the shallows to the fulness of the unfathomed deep.

The greatness of the Church universal is an inspiration in itself. To meditate upon it may easily lead our thoughts to mount up into worship. Beginning in a land that was already under subjection to legions whose eagles had been seen in every clime, committed to men who had never been far from their own firesides, the Church soon overleaped barriers which exclusiveness, luxury, licentiousness, hatred, persecution, had raised against it, and from a mountain in Galilee swept through empires until men confessed that there was no way to account for its progress save by the mighty power of God. It seems a veritable miracle of history that the provincialism of Judea should have been expanded to the confines of the globe, and that from a subject people an everlasting kingdom should be established. The very stones that told of the greatness of antiquity have crumbled into dust; the centuries have swallowed up the nations that boasted foundations so secure that they could not be shaken until the mountains were cast into the sea. But the stone cut out of the mountain without hands is filling the whole earth, the rejected stone has become the head of the corner.

To the Church universal all men belong who love the Lord Jesus in sincerity. The great saints, the heroes, the martyrs do not ask us to honor them by such an enrollment; we honor ourselves by enrolling them. Of course, the pigmy souls in all communions will deny such fellowship; moral greatness makes no such appeal to them as skill in accenting party shibboleths. But the Church knows no party lines; it overleaps or breaks these boundaries, and uses denominational scaffolding only to enlarge the enduring edifice.

Livingstone and Carey and Judson and Duff, Xavier and Damien and Martyn and Brainerd, Edwards and Spurgeon and Beecher and Storrs and Broadus belong to a congregation which no man can number. Their service to mankind secured for them a place in the Church universal. Their praise is in all the churches, and on every church their influence falls as falls the sun on every soil. No denomination can say these names are exclusively "ours" any more than it can say the harmonies of sound belong to them. The inspiration of the struggling congregation is the fact that it is part of this triumphant host.

It is well often to think of the greatness of the Church. Her children have compelled the altering of many maps of the world; they have broken the idol in its temple; they have secured the banishment of many Baals. Their names on the page of history overshadow many other names that in life were more conspicuous than were these toilers in obscure places. But in their appointed places they were dynamiting ancient errors, exploding degrading superstitions, and adding much to the comfort and the length and the richness of life. They were sowing hoary soils with Christian manhood and the harvest has been beyond computation. A new race produced a new order in many lands, and because of them we read daily of "empires in convulsion." The glory of the universal Church is its uniformity of noble living and unparalleled daring. Its sons believe that "he is both heretic and schismatic who by word or action breaks the law of love." E. Editorial Table Talk

Babism Again

According to the British Weekly, Abdul Baha has bobbed up in Edinburg. The "enormous meeting" he addressed in that ancient citadel of orthodoxy must have been quite comforting to a prophet who has fallen into the "seer and yellow leaf" at home. He is an old story in Syria and a not altogether interesting one to either English consuls or American missionaries. The latter have had to bury as paupers some of the Bab's perverts who were well enough off in America till they followed his will-o'-the-wisp star, and the "imprisonment" which Abdul Baha suffered seems to have been quite as much for his protection as for his suppression. The fact is, Abdul Baha is a "picturesque figure" and nothing more. He is not even that at home where every man wears "flowing robes and a beautiful turban." But as to his religious teaching, it may be summed up in a word that "nothing matters." Of course that is rank heresy among the Moslems who think the Koran matters enough to justify drawing the sword in its defense, and missionaries who have left all to preach the gospel in other lands are not ready to accept so dulcet a substitute for their message.

Education as Related to Virtue

A very prominent member of the Board of Education in Chicago is quoted as saying that "Vice is the product of ignorance. Show the difference between right and wrong and we can wipe out all the viciousness of the city." We doubt whether he ever said it, because such "invincible ignorance" of the real nature of vice seems hardly credible. Some of the foulest crimes in this country and in England are committed by the "upper classes," as was shown by the Thaw trial in New York and Stead trial in London. No rotten resort in any city slum contains more of the essential vice of the segregated district than one of the royal palaces in Europe whose unsavory repute is known to the world. Education may make the criminal more cautious but it is quite as likely to make him more cunning, as the careers of men recently sent to San Quentin and Fort Leavenworth for graft and arson and murder proves. A Baptist minister writing of a late work upon theology said the author never knew much about sin because he "always had lived among the virtuous and had no children to study." But any one who has ever been to school from the "little red school house" in the country, to the big university in the city, must be blind if he has not found the evidences of sin, conscious and cunning, secret and secretive, everywhere. A purely secular education, such as Chicago schools now give, has no more relation to vice or virtue than the weather reports.

The Fight to a Finish

A hundred years ago it was not uncommon for skeptics to prophesy that within a generation or two Christianity would be an outgrown and discarded faith. It would be difficult to conjecture where one could go at the present time to find a scholar of note who would sign his name to such a prophecy. A hundred years ago Christians quite commonly believed, as in considerable numbers they had been believing almost from the beginning, that within a short time the world was to end. This, too, is an error of the past. The most hostile of Christianity's critics must count on it as one and probably the foremost, of the world's persistent faiths. And our better knowledge of the processes by which the world, and other worlds of our system, have been built up, and a better knowledge too of the programme of Jesus as revealed in the gospels, dispels any reasonable expectation that the consummation of Christianity will be through the collapse of the physical globe. The world is reliable and Christianity is here to stay.

We may thus almost say that for the first time in the history of the world Christianity and its enemies are ready to face the future on the expectation that we are here to fight the battle through. This is the plan of God, and has been his plan in all ages, that this was the programme for which the mission of Jesus prepared the church. This is a new discovery to us and to those who oppose us, but it is no new thing to God. The plan hid with God from the foundation of the world is to endure so long as the world stands. The church is facing this new, yet eternal issue, with hope and courage.

Sulzer, of New York, who announced he had appointed Mr. Astor to head the delegation which will represent New York State at the meeting of the general assembly of the International Institute of Agriculture, to be held in Rome, Italy, next May. Gov. Sulzer said Mr. Astor recently asked him for his advice on how to be a useful man. Various plans were discussed, including the naval militia, but the young man selected agriculture. He told the governor he would use the Astor farm at Rhinecliff for scientific and experimental purposes with a view to benefiting the farmers of the country. Political Conditions in Japan

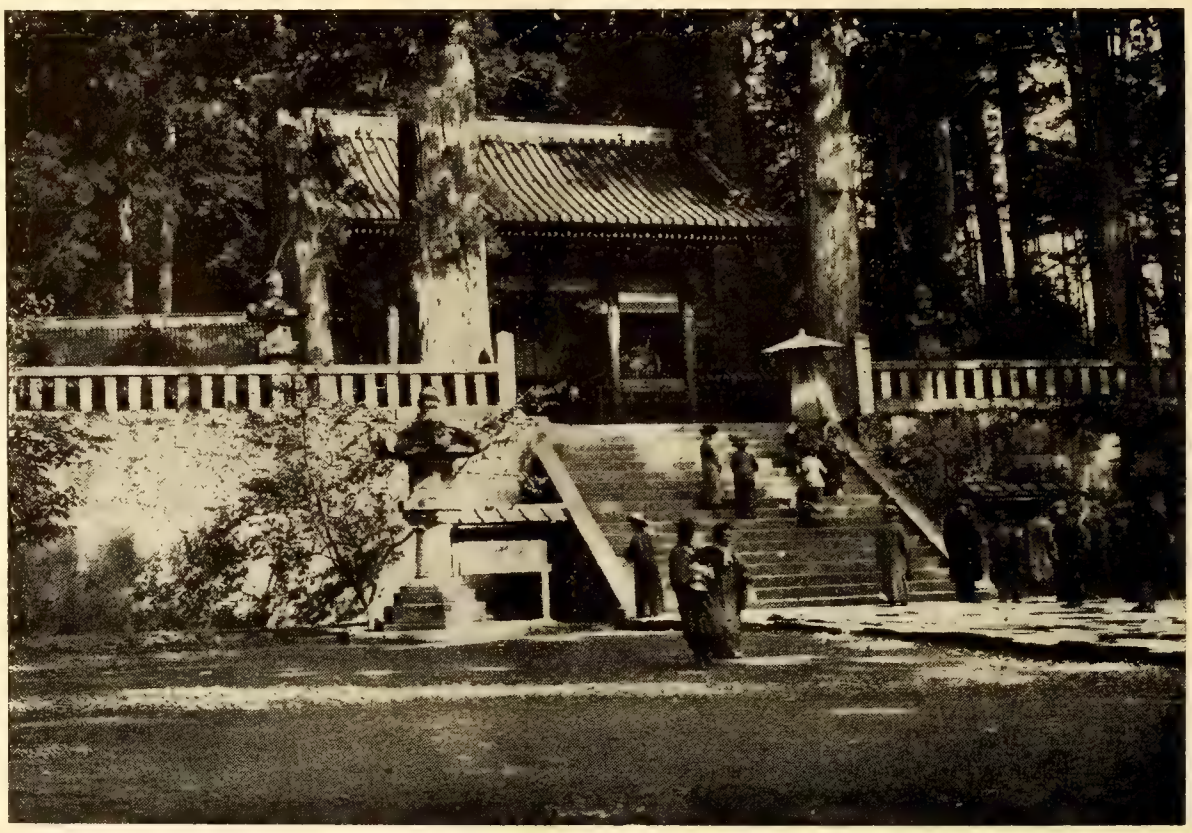
It could be said without exaggeration that the Japanese are the most patriotic people in the world. To be sure there is no definite standard of comparison. Every nation is devoted to its land and political interest in its own fashion. And perhaps few peoples have had the strong tests which Japan has faced in recent years, and to which she has responded so nobly. But judged by all the criteria by which national devotion may be measured, Japan is worthy of a very high place.

By masterful leadership and the quick and eager response of her people she has within a generation emerged from a comparatively obscure position to be one of the foremost powers of the East, and even asks for a place in the front rank of modern world politics. In that short space of time she has traversed much of the distance covered by England from the days of the Stuarts to those of Edward, or of France from Napoleon to Faure.

The Rule of the Shoguns.

As late as the close of our Civil War Japan was still a hermit nation. Nominally the land was ruled by the emperors or mikados, who lived in seclusion at Kyoto, and were believed to be descended from the gods. But in reality for hundreds of years the power was in the hands of a line of shoguns, who exercised the power of state in the name of the mikado, but under the pretence that he was too sacred a being to have a hand in the material concerns of state, they kept him shut away, and ruled the land, first from Kamakura and latter from Tokyo.

Many of these shoguns were men of great ability. There are no more illustrious names in Japanese chronicles than those of Yoritomo, the founder of the shogunate in the twelfth century, Taiko Hidiyoshi, the invader of Korea, or Ieyasu, the first of the Tokagawa shoguns and the most venerated of the national heroes. Around the shogun were the daimyos or great nobles, who in turn had their retainers and vassals in true feudal style.



Entrance to Mausoleum of Ieyasu.

This was the situation in 1863 when Commodore Perry anchored United States ships in the harbor of Yokohama and insisted upon the opening of the door of Japan to the commerce and fellowship of the world. All the traditions and instincts of the people and the court were against it. But there was no alternative. The West had broken in upon the slumber and seclusion of the East. The air was full of the voices of morning, and Japan had to arise and meet the day.

Then came the rush of the new times. Democracy was in the air. The old tyranny of the shoguns was challenged. Civil war broke out. The nation was divided. The loyal subjects of the mikado rose in power to restore his rights and put down the long usurpation of the shoguns. In the end the mikado triumphed, and the last of the shoguns is now living in Tokyo, an old man, almost in obscurity.

Reconstruction of the Nation on Modern Lines.

The late emperor, Mutsi-hito, came to the throne in 1867. Few rulers have accomplished so much for a people. From the first he set himself to the reconstruction of Japan upon modern lines. He removed his capital from the seclusion of the old palace at Kyoto to the citadel at Tokyo, where he could be in the midst of the nation's most aggressive life. He gathered about him a group of the wisest men in the land, who are even yet honored as the "senior statesmen." The emperor was both a wise administrator and a loving father to his people. He gave himself with unsleeping watchfulness to their advancement in all the pathways of progress, and he gave of his own time and treasure to provide relief for them in times of famine or plague.

In the order of his succession he was the one-hundred and twenty-first mikado of Japan. He gathered in himself all the sanctions of the past. In him the people beheld the embodiment of their heaven descended rulers. All their sentiments inclined them to reverence for the past, and for the ruler, as the divine Lord. To this was added the sentiment of personal affection for the emperor. On these sure foundations the wise ruler built the fine structure of national devotion and patriotism which has been the wonder and admiration of the world.

Popular Affection for the Emperor.

The affection of the people showed itself all through the later years of the emperor's life. They knew the struggles, hardships and disappointments of his earlier years. When he appeared in public, as he often did in true democratic spirit, they welcomed him. When he lay stricken in his last illness, they gathered in such throngs outside the palace walls as to quite fill the immense open parade ground. He was borne to his burial with marks of profound sorrow on the part of the entire nation and the accredited representatives of all the nations of the world. And now his sepulchre at Momoyama, a few miles from Kyoto, is the shrine to which vast throngs of loving and sorrowful people journey, as if on a religious pilgrimage.

The Meiji era, as the reign of the late emperor was called, has been one of great progress and success for Japan. It has produced some very notable men. Few nations could boast abler leaders than Admiral Togo, Count Kamura and Marquis Ito. Many others of less note, but no less devotion, have risen. General Nogi was one of these, a true Japanese of the old school, devoted to the emperor, and in certain ways an embodiment of modern military methods, but still so far imbued with the ancient feudal spirit that the most effective manner in which he could testify his devotion to his dead master was by committing hara-kiri. It is of interest to notice that the younger Japanese regret this act. While they admire the affection that prompted it, they are sensitive to the opinion the outer world may form of their customs.

It need hardly be said that the most important item in the national budget is the sum devoted to the army and navy. Above every other interest, agriculture, commerce, education or even pleasure, it takes the foremost place, with a long interval between. The stimulus to this condition has been given by the success of the nation in the two wars with China and Russia, and the feeling constantly kept alive in popular speech and in the press that Japan has still more to accomplish in the same direction.

Of course careful students of the military history of Japan find far less to wonder at in the overthrow of the Chinese and Russian forces than do the superficial reviewers of those events. China was fast asleep at the time. Her equipment was that of the middle ages, and hardly that. There really was never a war at all. It was only a military manoeuvre. The contest with Russia was different, and if it had been continued would perhaps have had a different ending. The Russian soldiers were brave, but ill-officered. Moreover, they were fighting in a cause in which they had no heart. The Japanese were well equipped, eager, working under the best climatic conditions, on a soil which they were hopeful of making their own. Even so, the war might have had a disastrous ending for them through mere force of opposing numbers and inability to meet the heavy expense in men and money. The end of the war came not a moment too soon.

Disappointed at Peace Terms.

Yet Japan was bitterly disappointed. She hoped for a large money indemnity from Russia to recoup her losses. The people of Japan were confident of it. When the peace terms were made known in Tokyo and other cities, the people rose up in wrath and rioted in the streets. What she did get out of that war, however, was Korea. And that should have been some satisfaction, considering Japan's great need of new room for her overflowing population. Formosa and Korea she has. But she wants more, and she is confident that she is able to get it.

So one sees in Japan the paradox of a nation that has been successful in two recent wars, has increased its possessions to no small degree, yet is staggering under an enormous load of taxation. This load is slowly chafing the shoulders of the people who carry it, and who are conscious that a very large proportion of the burden is due to the spirit of militarism. As in France a generation ago, thoughtful men in Japan know that practically every farmer and artisan goes to his work with a soldier on his back. How long will this last? Already socialistic agitation is heard on the streets and in the parks of the larger cities. The preachers of socialistic doctrines go at their work with the earnestness and the constancy of ministers of the gospel.

Does Japan Wish War With United States?

The question is often asked in America, "Is there danger of war with Japan?" No off-hand answer is worth anything. Facts could be marshaled on either side. But the sentiment which one meets in Japan among men of all classes is as cordial toward the United States as in England. More than this, Japan wants the good opinion of the western nations, most of all of America and England. She will be slow to endanger her vital interests in the East by any show of hostility toward a people so powerful and so quick to act as are the Americans.

But most convincing of all is Japan's financial condition. Where would she find financial backing for so dangerous an enterprise as a war with the West? Her own treasury is empty. And though her credit is good in the bourses of Europe, it is only because, and so long as, her political policy is approved. She could not borrow a pound to finance an American war. The alarmists who have tried to stir up our people to the fear and hatred of Japan may well give their time to more profitable and more pacific concerns.

China and Japan.

If Japan is brooding war plans, China is the objective point. She knows that China is awakening from the sleep of centuries. She knows that China, stripped and plundered as she has been, has still a basis of empire and a material wealth with which it will be impossible to compete. More than this, she knows that once China has come to herself, with the realization of her power, the only hope Japan can cherish of saving herself from conquest or absorption lies in such an alliance, either with China or some equally strong power, as shall insure her a separate existence. Under all the pride, patriotism and disdain of the other nations of the East, Japan in her thoughtful moments knows that the arrival of China at the hour of real national life marks the moment of crisis for Japan and all the other nations of the far Orient. Shall Japan be able to find room for her people where she may expand to dimensions which shall enable her to hold her own in that time? Or ought she to strike China now, on some pretext, valid or otherwise, and achieve the double purpose of wounding her great neighbor and of securing for herself a substantial indemnity—and perhaps Manchuria beside? In that event she would be ready, after a time of recovery, to deal with Russia. And she is thinking in her heart that the next time she will be better prepared than in the lucky but most disastrous days of Port Arthur.

Meantime Japan pushes on her enterprises, with enormous confidence, eagerness and a pushful cleverness which makes her the dread of the other nations. The subdued Koreans detest the name of Japan. The Chinese into whose cities the Japanese are pouring all along the northern frontiers, hate and fear them. Are these the sentiments which less resourceful peoples always feel toward those who succeed, or are they the natural resentment of the average spirit of humanity against the unscrupulous? The one who finds himself in the attitude of a friend to all and a sympathetic observer of the movements of the age can only say he does not know, and wait for further light.

Testimony of Toa Wen Tsuing

The author of the following testimony is looked upon, says Prof. A. E. Cory, of Nanking, as "the strongest student in the Mniversity of Nanking." He had been a vigorous opponent of Christianity.

"For about four years my heart has been a battlefield. Jesus Christ and Satan have been struggling for possession of it, and Jesus has won the victory. From this time forth I am a follower of Jesus Christ.

"I have not come to him because of some improper benefit which I expect to get from him. If there is anything that I despise, it is the man who is always asking 'What can I get out of it?' I have come to believe in Jesus largely through a study of a book by Professor Jenks, of Cornell University, entitled the 'Social Principles of Jesus.' I cannot go into detail as to what part of Christ's teaching is important, but I must say that that which has made me want to be a follower of Jesus is his teaching that 'we should love all men as ourselves.' This principle is clearly brought out and illustrated in the book I have just mentioned.

"In addition to this in my study of history I have taken notice of the great leaders, and of their relation to Jesus Christ, and I have found that a large proportion of all the philosophers and scientists are firm believers in and followers of Jesus Christ, and that those who were not owed their knowledge of philosophy and science directly to Jesus Christ, his teaching and his church.

"Again what country today is the greatest republic on the face of the earth? You say, of course, the United States. Where did the United States come from? I see Washington as its founder; I see Lincoln as its savior. What kind of men were these? Both men, who gave themselves and all they had to their country, in the name of Jesus Christ. They loved their country and their fellow men as Jesus Christ did, because they were close followers of him.

"Where did the Chinese Republic come from? You say from the reformers and the revolutionists. You don't go back far enough. Doctor Sun Wen was in a large measure responsible for it all, but where did he come from? Where did he get his principles of freedom and equality? Those were instilled into his heart years ago by James Cantile—and who was he? He was a follower of Jesus Christ, and in China for the direct purpose of teaching how Jesus came to save the world.

"You take the system of education in China today. Where are the centers? At Canton Christian College, St. John's University, the University of Nankin, Boone University, Tientsin University, Peking University, the Tsing Hwa College in Peking and other similar institutions in China that are the direct outcome of the spirit and church of Jesus Christ. Blot out of China today the education which owes its origin to Jesus Christ and where will China be? In the depth of deepest ignorance.

"Fellow students, I most heartily commend you to Jesus Christ."

What the Modern Artists are Doing

By William E. Barton

One of the first places to which a visitor to any European city makes his way is the art gallery. Why the art gallery should be almost the last place which is discerned by a visitor to any American city is not easy to explain, for many American cities now have art galleries which need not be ashamed, even with Europe just across an ever-narrowing ocean. The paintings which the visitor sees in the European galleries contain an overwhelmingly disproportion of paintings that are old. It is hardly too much to say that painting in Europe must reach a certain age before it has attained celebrity. Even in this country few artists begin to prosper till after they are dead.

There is a good deal of affectation about the love of art. A great many people skating over the slippery floors of the Louvre now gaze with tear-filled eyes at the blank space on the walls where "Mona Lisa" formerly hung, who would have looked at Mona Lisa with more than a curious and possibly half-contemptuous glance were that self-satisfied lady with her quizzical smirk hanging on the wall.

The newer artists are not idle though few of them are well fed, and many of them are doing exceedingly creditable work. He who wanders on through the great galleries, or through the annual salons of Europe finds there some inconceivably hideous nightmares. Impressionism has gone not merely stark-naked, but stark-mad. Yet alongside the horrible eye-scratching products of the ultra-impressionistic brush are many sweet and wholesome paintings, which, if they are not destined to immortality, still tell their pleasing story to the eye and heart.

LITTLE RED RIDING HOOD.—Mme. C. Molliet.

Should one wish to see what modern German art is doing in tender, sympathetic and domestic scenes, he could find a sweet and satisfying example in "The First Snowfall" by Bischoff. On one side of the door is the little maiden, emerging, her hands covered with her ample apron; and on the other side is the white rabbit approaching for its expected morsel, but in the doorway stands the grandfather with the baby in his arms. His hair is white with many snows and may be covered by next winter's snow, but this is the first snow the baby has seen and it looks out with round-eyed uncomprehending wonder.

Should you go to the Netherlands you may find "The Team" by Réné Choquet. The patient towhorse and the little donkey tug hard at their canal boat. The traces are adjusted to the unequal strain. It seems an ill-attached couple, yet there is a sense of comradeship in their plodding, and a suggestion of adequacy in the strength which they bring to their daily toil. Nor is their toil all monotony. New vistas open before them. The canal winds through fertile meadows, and the rest at night is sweet.

There are pathetic scenes in these recent paintings. "The House of the Widow," by P. L. Delance, is one of these. The widow's house is a vine-covered cottage. She has time enough to bestow upon it, and it is comfortable and not lacking in attractiveness. She sits on the bench in the sunset watching a young couple go by, he returning from his toil, she with a baby in her arms. The widow remembers the days when she, too, watched for some one's coming; she, too, held her baby in her arms. Joys like this lie behind her, but they are present in the life of these young people passing her door.

Not altogether unlike this in the sentiment of its restfulness at the close of the day is "The Calm Hour" by E. Debat-Ponson, who has given us some religious paintings of merit. The cows are coming home along the river side, but the eye does not rest upon them. Quickly it finds the central point of interest near the margin of the painting where the laborer returns from the field, his young wife by his side, the pitchfork over his right shoulder, she balancing the baby on her left arm, and their faces both intent upon their child.

In the Paris Salon of 1909 was "The Fisherman Mending His Net" by Réné Margueritat. It is a strong, virile and skilful old man, whose face one discovers here. Every line in it has been furrowed there by his facing of the storms, by matching his wits against the wind, by earning his daily bread in peril of the great deep. Intelligence, resolute will, and a certain kindness of heart are here, in the face of the fine old fisherman.

In the old days the triptych was an altar piece, with two folding doors that swung in and covered a central painting, each having painted inside of it a related theme. Madame Molliet has utilized the triptych in a recent interpretation of "Little Red Ridinghood" and she has done it very charmingly.

ON THE ROAD TO MARKET.—Theodore Mayan.

"The Fishers of Lilies" is a picture by Paul Legrand. The last half of the title ought to be a parenthesis, for this expedition did not start out after lilies, but after fish. This boy and girl began their day's outing with the resolute intention of discovering what virtue there might be in the angleworms by way of luring little fishes into close relationship with the fish-hook. And the boy is not caring so much for lilies now, but he cares for the little girl and she cares for lilies, so this fishing trip, somewhat modified from its original intent, still gives promise of being a satisfactory holiday. There is a good deal of the philosophy of life in this little picture. It tells the whole story of human society in the foundation of its permanent institutions. Adam started fishing—or was it pruning trees?—but Eve discovered lilies, (or may be it was an apple) and things like that have been happening ever since, considerably modifying what might have been.

"On the Road to Market in the Springtime" by Theodore Mayan, is redolent of the odor of the new grass and the first flowers. Everybody is on the road to market—sheep, cattle and country yokels—and the maiden on the donkey is thither bound, carrying her load of cauliflower. But do not let yourself suppose for a moment that cauliflower is all she is taking to market. That cap of hers is set with firm intent to discover what this day's marketing may mean to her. It would not be polite to say or hint that she herself is offered with her produce, or to be had for the asking. But there she is, and if she returns from her marketing alone, it will be small credit to the enterprise of the young men at the fair.

The sweetest face that has appeared in the Paris Salon for many a day is that of "The Flower Girl" by Mme. Saizede. The girl herself is fairer than anything she carries in her basket. Her eyes, her face, her figure are the perfection of girlish beauty.

"The Breakfast" by A. Robaudi is a charming little bit of genre painting. Note the brotherly care of the boy, careful to convey the full contents of the spoon into the little round mouth and not to spill it on her clothing; and behold the eagerness, confidence and docility of the little girl, expressing itself to her very finger tips. Even the expectant cat, who looks forward to the licking of the dish, is not without its element of interest in the painting.

It would be easy to prove that these are not specimens of very high art, and probably they will not live forever, but they are pleasing examples of what artists in different foreign countries have been doing in the last few years, and are doing there and in America today.

THE TEAM.—Réné Choquet.

MODERN WOMANHOOD

Mrs. Harrison will be glad to receive communications from any of her readers offering suggestions concerning woman's welfare, criticisms of articles or inquiries concerning any matters relevant to her department. She should be addressed directly at 530 Elm Tree Lane, Lexington, Ky.

A GARDEN OF LONG AGO.

This is the thirteenth day of February, with the mercury hovering around zero, and gardening time seems farther off than it did in January when the thermometer reached as high as seventy degrees, and birds were singing and sap was rising. But in spite of wintry chills and snows, one's thoughts will tend gardenward; so when I found an old manuscript in our public library telling of a Lexington garden planted in March, 1824, nearly ninety years ago, it seemed a realization of my dreams and gave me so much pleasure that I want to share it with others.

A Leading City.

Lexington, Kentucky, in the beginning of the past century, seemed to have taken the lead in everything that happened west of the Alleghanies.

It was the leading commercial center in the West, and people came from far and near to buy. Here John Bradford set up the first printing press, and started the first newspaper west of the mountains. Western literature had its birth here, for John Filson wrote his History of Kentucky while a school master in Lexington, and also wrote down, from Daniel Boone's dictation, the only narrative of his life, with the old pioneer's sanction. The first public library (established in 1796), the first lunatic asylum, and the first college in the West were in this old town—and that college grew into the first university beyond the mountains—Transylvania University, which is now owned by the Disciples of Christ.

Transylvania was at the summit of its old time glory in the twenties of the past century. In addition to its literary and classical departments, it had its medical college, and its law school, with Henry Clay as one of its professors.

A Chair of Botany.

In 1819, Constantine Samuel Rafinesque, an eccentric naturalist who had lived in many foreign lands, drifted to this far western town and offered to establish a chair of botany and natural history in the academic department of the university. This seems very simple now, but it was a most progressive step for those early days when his offer was accepted. That was the time of classical education only, and there was little interest in any other roots than those of Greek and Latin origin. From a child, Rafinesque had been a devoted student of outdoor life and growing plants; before settling in Lexington, where he spent seven full and busy years, he had tramped over all accessible parts of Kentucky, studying the fauna and flora of the new region.

The Transylvania Botanic Garden.

After he had been here about five years, he inaugurated a project to start a Botanic Garden in connection with the university, the money to be raised by a joint stock company, with shares at fifty dollars each. The old manuscript that I mentioned as having found in the public library are the records in connection with that enterprise. They consist of a book of shareholders, a book of minutes, and a journal, kept by Rafinesque, and all written in his clear and beautiful handwriting. Among the shareholders are the names of Nicholas Longworth of Cincinnati, Henry Clay, John J. Crittenden, Robert Wickliffe, David Meade, and other names distinguished in Kentucky annals.

By March, 1824, one thousand dollars of the stock seems to have been paid up, and with it was bought a tract of ten acres in Lexington. Rafinesque was made superintendent, and his journal pictures to us one happy spring month of planning and working in the Transylvania Botanic Garden. I will give a few of the entries, which will be found interesting by every garden lover.

From the Old Journal.

March 15. Engaged James Stewart as gardener for $20 per month. David Meade sent Billy, an able black man, for labor. I set them to work to pull corn stalks.

March 16. Bought two spades, two hoes, two rakes, two lines for the gardeners. I try in vain to get a plough to plough three acres of the garden, and to send to the woods for 1,000 young trees. We clear the ground in front of the garden, mend fences, etc.

March 17. We dig holes for locust trees. We trace the main walk and the serpentine walk.

March 18. We plant cherry trees, raspberries, weeping willows, cotton trees, wahoos, and several wild plants.

March 19. Sent Billy to Mr. Meade's to bring cart load of trees, cuttings and seeds from his pleasure grounds.

March 21. Billy does not return. I hire a black man, William, for a week at $4.

March 22. Billy comes back with cart load of slips and cuttings from David Meade's. We begin to plant them.

March 23. We plant and plough. I make a bargain with Wasson to bring trees and roots from the knobs, at one to three dollars per 100 trees or roots.

March 24. Mr. Ficklin buys 100 trees of Wasson for $13 which I had refused to take. We plant the main alley and serpentine walks. We discover two springs in the garden.

March 25. We pull corn, grub, plant trees, begin to harrow. Martin brings 850 young locust trees and other trees at $1.50 per 100. We plant ash trees.

March 26. Having so many trees to plant, I engage William for another week.

March 28. I lay out the meridian line and alley.

The rest of the month is spent in plowing, planting, and bargaining. He mentions an order for silk worm eggs.

April 1. Locusts planted all around. We begin to graft.

April 2. Lay out garden, and begin to plant 100 kinds of seeds.

April 4—Easter Monday. Billy is sick. I lay out the central circle.

April 5. Received many presents of seeds and plants from Messrs. Clay, Ward, Fowler and Megowan.

April 6. Billy is better and works. We go in the kitchen garden. First load of plants comes.

April 7. We sow beans, pulse, and early corn. I pay William by the job—25 cents for 100 yards of spading.

April 8. Finished digging for the present; paid $18 to Solomon. We spade and sow. Bought shoes for Billy.

April 9. Wasson brings 1,500 trees, shrubs, and roots from the knobs. I pay him for 1,300—only $20. Stewart is drunk.

April 11. Planted trees, etc., brought by Wasson. Stewart is again drunk, and is to be dismissed at the end of his month.

April 12. Stewart wants his money, saying his month is out—which happens only the 14th. He has had $12 on account, and is in debt for the remaining $8, which I keep. He does mischief in the garden, steals shrubs, keeps seeds, and threatens me—being drunk all the while. I am compelled to get a warrant against him.

April 13. Stewart leaves town and clears off. Five dollars is due him, claimed by several. We plant and sow.

April 14. Planted an acre in castor oil bean. Finished the meridian walk.

April 15. Laid off level plat in front. Made a hot bed.

April 16. Sowed marsh mallows in all the borders of the level plat. Sowed medical plants.

April 18. Laid off the base of the hill. Sow camomile, aniseed, etc.

April 19. Spaded borders. Received 200 valuable fruit trees and shrubs, and 27 pots from Mr. Nicholas Longworth of Cincinnati.

April 20. Planted all Mr. Longworth's trees. Hired a man, Isaac, to help. Almost all growing, but with etiolated sprouts. One pot broken. Sent Mr. Leavy two gardenias, one rose, and to Mr. Holly two roses, one geranium, and two jasmines in pots.

The journal ends here, and I found no further record of the garden, until the following June, when Rafinesque went to Washington and wrote a letter to the president of his board before he left. There is a spice of sarcasm in this sentence in the letter:

"The managers can attend to my garden during by absence, by walking there occasionally in the cool of the mornings and evenings."

Its Shoft Life Ended.

Rafinesque appears to have been absent the rest of the summer, and in the meantime the garden seems to have fallen into financial difficulties. A final entry in the minutes, more than a year later, has this resolution:

"That it is expedient to suspend further proceedings toward establishing the Transylvania Botanic Garden, and that the property be sold and the proceeds divided proportionately among such shareholders as have paid their instalments."

Rafinesque left Lexington shortly, and doubtless his departure contributed to the speedy termination of a movement so far in advance of the spirit of the times.

Anyhow, we are glad that this brief page from its brief life has drifted down to us, and preserved to us a picture of an old time garden in a spring of long ago. I. W. H —Sylvia Pankhurst, the militant suffragette leader, was sentenced to two weeks' imprisonment or a fine of $10 by the magistrate sitting at Bow Street Police Court, London, last week. The same punishment was meted out to nineteen other women who took part in the raid on the House of Commons under the leadership of "General" Mrs. Flora Drummond, January 28. On that occasion the women tried to force their way into Parliament to obtain an interview with David Lloyd George. They were arrested and charged with resisting the police. As Miss Pankhurst was leaving the police court for the cells, she shouted: "I shall not accept either the sentence or the fine. I shall go on a hunger strike when I am locked up."

Church Life

E. L. Powell at Valparaiso.

E. L. Powell's series of meetings at Valparaiso, Ind., closed last Thursday evening. Claude E. Hill, the Valparaiso pastor, supplied Dr. Powell's Louisville pulpit on the one Sunday of the latter's absence. There were nine accessions in the nine days at Valparaiso. Added interest was given the meeting by the presence on one evening of J. H. O. Smith, a former pastor, now of Oklahoma City, and, on another evening, of a dozen or so of the Chicago ministers who were amply repaid for the trip to Valparaiso by hearing a masterly sermon on the plea and program of the Disciples. The degree of Pastor Hill's autocratic control over his congregation was indicated by his stubborn insistence upon hearing from every visiting minister after Doctor Powell had talked an hour and twenty minutes! It was after eleven o'clock before the last remnant of the congregation was formally dismissed. The people bore substantial and sincere testimony to the permanent good wrought by Doctor Powell's messages. On his way through Chicago, returning home, the faculty of the Disciples Divinity House gave a luncheon for Doctor Powell who is one of the trustees of the House, and invited a number of the graduate students to be present. Memorial Church, which extended the Louisville pastor an invitation to hold an evangelistic meeting, is hoping that the invitation will be accepted for next fall.

Proposal to Reconstruct House and Service.

A proposal to rebuild the edifice and reorganize the activities of First Church, Kansas City was made by Frank L. Bowen, city missionary, at the annual banquet of the joint official boards of Kansas City recently held in Independence Boulevard Church. The proposal was heartily applauded by those present. W. F. Richardson is pastor of First Church which is one of the oldest in the city. The proposal involved transformation into an institutional church to render a type of social service for the downtown community in which it is located.

Most of the old down town congregations have moved farther out, leaving First Church in the midst of a large opportunity which it seems difficult for a work conducted on conventional lines to embrace. It is believed that the more transient population of the section could be helpfully ministered to by an institutional plant. The joint boards further discussed the raising of a fund of $300,000 with which to complete the present unfinished church buildings of Greater Kansas City, and to pay the debts on others. Mr. Bowen reported a total Disciple membership of 11,000 in the city, against 5,000 sixteen years ago. L. J. Marshall, pastor Wabash Avenue Church, advocated the commission form of government for the churches.

Another Makeshift for Bible Practice.

And still the brethren keep on devising make-shifts and substitutes for the New Testament basis of membership in the Church of Christ. Once it was "fraternal associate" and "associate membership" and "membership in the congregation." Now it is "Album Membership." Will F. Shaw, pastor Sheffield Avenue Church, Chicago, has introduced this new form of membership which he regards as greatly superior to any form of "associate membership." Against Mr. Shaw's orthodoxy no whisper has ever been heard. Among Chicago pastors he has always been a stout defender of established procedure. It made something of a sensation, therefore, when he announced to the Chicago Ministers' Association the adoption by his flock of the "Album Membership," and gave his reasons for it, and advanced the claim for its superiority over anything that had yet been invented. Mr. Shaw explained that his church keeps an "Album" in which are carefully recorded the names of those who though not members of the "church" attend its services, and pray and otherwise support the cause of Christ. The Sheffield Avenue pastor is one of our most catholic-spirited leaders in Chicago, in spite, as some think, of his strict constructionist theology. He works with almost apostolic zeal in co-operation with people of all Christian denominations, including Lutherans and even Roman Catholics. He is a great lover of people, and is much beloved in his community for his work's sake. He could not endure, it would seem, to have no common status with these Christians whose lives were touching his own and his church's life in such manifest Christian fashion; hence the "Album Membership" as a common bond between them until they would accept the test of membership customary in his church. The Christian Century does not give its approval to the "Album Membership." We prefer to follow the New Testament strictly, and see no need for these human devices. There is need of but one class of membership, as we see it, and that is membership in the Church of Christ. If a man is a member of the Church of Christ he should be received into the membership of any congregation of Christians without any test whatever. If he is not a member he should be made one. Whom Christ has received, his disciples cannot, without sin, reject. Nevertheless Sheffield Avenue's invention is encouraging as an indicator of the disquiet with which our present sectarian practice is regarded.

Reserved Pastor Speaks Unreservedly.

One could hardly ask for a more valuable word of appreciation than that from the discriminating pastor of Charleston, Ill., church, J. McD. Horne, concerning F. B. Thomas, the evangelist who recently held a meeting there. The meeting resulted in 161 accessions to the church. But more reassuring as to the substantial good lying back of these figures is this word of the pastor: "Our church and community have been blessed by the presence and preaching of this splendid man. He is a disciple and a herald of a new evangelism. He preaches a gospel of righteousness and redemption with passionate urgency and insistent appeal. Believing in the gospel with his whole heart he relies upon the love of God in Christ to win men for the kingdom and does not exploit the agonies of death and hell to frighten folks into the church. He is a hard worker and is especially effective among men. A clear head is Thomas's and big is he in stature, strength and sympathy. To get right and to keep right constitute the burden of this teacher's message. The plain man is pleased with the lucidity of his speech and the wayfarer is given heart to take the way again. The home honors his recognition in the new motto on an old time ideal—'Every family united in Christ.' Everybody delights in his exaltation of Jesus."

Congress Offers Attractive Program.

The annual Congress of Disciples of Christ will be held in Union Avenue Church, St. Louis, beginning on Tuesday evening, April 1 and closing Thursday afternoon, April 3. The program committee, of which B. A. Abbott is chairman and Prof. A. W. Taylor, secretary, presents an intellectual menu of vital constructive and interesting character. Themes and readers of papers are as follows:

Tuesday Evening—The New Co-operative Ideals of the Disciples, W. F. Richardson; Are the Colleges Training a Ministry for the Practical Work of the Church, O. F. Jordan.

Wednesday Morning—Sane Evangelism and the Modern Revival: Their Use of Scripture and Their Theology, W. J. Wright; Their Psychological Aspects and Social Results, H. O. Pritchard; Their Effectiveness in the Practical Work of the Church, M. A. Hart.

Wednesday Afternoon—The Influence of the Modern Social Movement: On Religious Thinking, Silas Jones; On Religious Activities, F. E. Lumley.—Christianity and Socialism: Points of Sympathy, Frank W. Allen; Points of Antagonism, A. G. Gray.

Wednesday Evening—Pagan Tendencies in our Present Civilization, Dr. C. A. Elwood; A City in the Life Saving Business, Hon. Harris E. Cooley.

Thursday Morning—The Influence upon Modern Thought: Of the Most Modern Psychology, H. D. C. Maclachlan; Of the Most Modern Science, Dr. James S. Lee; Possible Relations of Comity between Baptists and Disciples, Dr. W. J. Williamson.

Thursday Morning—The Union Movement: Bearing of Some Problems in Modern Thought upon It, F. D. Kershner; What Policy shall the Disciples Pursue in Planting New Churches, Finis Idleman; The Social Service Movement and Christian Union, Ira Boswell.

Schools of Methods.

The Sunday-school Department of the American Christian Missionary Society is planning for a number of Schools of Methods in the early spring. These are to be up to the International standard and all students taking work in them will receive International certificates. A faculty of some four or five experts will be in attendance upon each of the Schools of Methods and the meetings are to have more than local significance. In fact they are intended for the workers from all over the states in which they are held. Among a number definitely planned may be mentioned the following: Ionia, Mich., February 17-21; Toronto, Ont., March 24-28; Atlanta, Ga., March 31-April 4; Memphis, Tenn., April 7-11; Oklahoma City, Okla., April 14-18. Additional schools will also in all probability be held at Little Rock, Ark., and Shreveport, La. The Memphis School will include Eastern Arkansas and Northern Mississippi as well as West Tennessee. It is to be hoped that every Sunday-school in reach of these meetings will plan to send as many of the teachers and officers as possible. These Schools of Methods will greatly stimulate the work among the Sunday-schools that send their workers to it. They constitute a very practical form of Teacher Training. Secretary Robert M. Hopkins will have the direction of the schools.

A Demonstration to Those Who Need It.

No doubt the members of Berkeley, Calif., church find great satisfaction in its numerical and material progress during the past five months, knowing as they do that a considerable body of opinion in the brotherhood with reference to their practice of Christian union is determined by the practical progress or retrogression of the congregation. Judged by practical results the ministry of Pastor H. J. Loken seems to have been blessed with multiplied fruitage since he and his church determined to conform to the teaching of the New Testament. Since Sept. 1, sixty-three new members have been received. The house of worship has been repaired at a cost of $500, a "living-link" missionary is supported in India through the C. W. B. M. at a cost of $600, through individual members the sum of $2,000 has been contributed to Prof. Guy's salary in Pacific Union Seminary, and not least important the pastor's salary has been increased $100 for the coming year. A balance remains in the treasury after all bills are paid. No really discerning observer of the factors that enter into a church's success would think of deciding the right or wrong of practicing Christian union by specific instances of a church's success or failure. All kinds of churches succeed. All kinds fail. But since some undiscerning observers do so judge, it is occasion for general satisfaction to know that the blessing of God rests so obviously upon this sacrificing congregation that determined its duty by the will of Christ rather than the counsel of men.

Ministers of the South San Joachin Valley district of California met at Fresno, Feb. 10. An address by Dr. H. O. Breeden on "The Minister and this Age" which was on the program as the chief event was displaced at the request of all present for a paper on the divorce question which Doctor Breeden had delivered on another occasion and which had caused considerable stir in the press. The ministers were stirred by it too, and carried on a vigorous discussion after hearing it. A committee was appointed to investigate as to the practicability of employing an evangelist to work among the churches of the district.

The ladies of Central Church, Peoria, Ill., planned and carried out a great dinner function on the evening of Lincoln's birthday. They rented the Coliseum for their purpose and provided for a lecture by their pastor, M. L. Pontius, to follow the dinner. Seven hundred guests sat at the tables. The ministers of various churches in the city were present and the affair took on a semi-civic aspect in its representativeness of the citizenship of Peoria. Mr. Pontius' lecture on Lincoln was pronounced by the local press a splendid interpretation.

The Ohio State Missionary Society rejoices in the reports from certain heavy mission tasks undertaken within the past year. The importance of the fields and the urgency of the call induced the society to enter Sidney, Tiffin and Marion. Later missions were opened in Cadiz and Middletown. I. J. Cahill, state secretary, writes that in four of these five cities there are now "four determined, aggressive congregations of Disciples and a total Sunday-school enrollment of 800."

An Indiana layman recently wrote to a number of the annuitants of the National Benevolent Association asking as to their satisfaction with their annuities from the Association. The replies received were of such character that the Association received, at its St. Louis office, a check last week for $2,000 from this same Indiana man on the annuity plan.

The churches of Shelbyville, Ind., united in a simultaneous "revival" during the month of January. Each pastor preached in his own pulpit. As a result the ten participating congregations received nearly 200 accessions to their membership. The Disciples Church, of which Cloyd Goodnight is minister, received thirty-two new members.

Central Kentucky's ministerial association met at the Phoenix Hotel, Lexington, Feb. 10. W. E. Ellis of Paris presided. The chief feature of interest was a paper read by E. B. Barnes, of Richmond, on systematic study for the minister. Mr. Barnes had obtained much information by a questionnaire which he had previously circulated among a large number of ministers asking concerning their habits of reading and study.

W. J. Wright is utilizing Sunday evening services at Franklin, Ind., in a discussion of "Our Religion" with the following special themes: "What is Christianity?" "Christianity as an Individual Religion," "Christianity as a Social Religion," "Christianity as the Ultimate and Universal Religion."

Twelve converts in an evangelistic meeting held by George E. Lyons at Merriam, Kans., were taken in a special car to Kansas City for the baptismal ceremony which was performed in Independence Boulevard Church. These conversions will form the nucleus of a new congregation at Merriam.

M. L. Pontius, of Peoria, Ill., has been preaching in an Opera House to very large congregations since the burning of Central Church building a few months ago. The local newspapers are being used as an advertising medium by this church to good advantage.

The College of Missions, Indianapolis, will entertain the second annual missionary conference of Indiana students February 28 to March 2. Bishop McDowell of the Methodist church and Secretary Stephen J. Corey are among the speakers.

After talking for a number of years the Downey Avenue Church, Irvington, Indianapolis, is now taking active steps in the direction of a new and adequate church building for that college community. A committee has been appointed and some pledges have been already received. Pastor C. H. Winders will be happy to see the results of his notable pastorate there gathered up and symbolized by the kind of a building which his people will no doubt wish to erect.

Sedgwick, Kan., church set out to raise $6,500 on the morning of their dedication day and could not stop until $11,000 had been given. A parsonage will be built with the surplus. Geo. L. Snively was master of the day.

Greeley, Colo., Sunday-school and church heard John L. Alexander, the boy specialist at the Christian Church, Sunday morning, Feb. 16. The attendance at the Sunday-school runs above 500 regularly. J. L. Thompson is pastor.

The King's Daughters of the church in Paris, Ill., is the largest local organization of the King's Daughters in Illinois—membership 128. They raised $400 for local benevolence last year.

M. B. Ainsworth, minister at Georgetown, Ky., who has been called by the church for an indefinite period, began his second year on February 9, with an increase of $500 in salary.

H. E. Stafford has been preaching a series of sermons at Massillon, Ohio, on the "Kingdom of God" which has brought many men to church who rarely go.

L. C. Howe, of Noblesville, and G. I. Hoover, of Tipton, Ind., exchanged pulpits recently to their own and their congregations' pleasure.

Moberly, Mo., church held a memorial service in remembrance of T. P. Haley, who died recently in Kansas City. Dr. Haley was reared in that community.

Fire damaged the building of First Church, Pittsburgh, Feb. 9. The loss is about $4,000.

EVANGELISTIC MEETINGS.

Akron, O., Lloyd Miller, the pastor, preaching; Wm. Leigh, singer; 102; continuing.

Dallas City, Ill., Orville Hawkins, pastor; F. O. Fannon, evangelist; 29; closed.

Table Grove, Ill., E. S. Cary, pastor; Geo. B. McKee, pastor Vermont, Ill., evangelist; 16; closed.

Columbus, O., South Side, R. F. Stickler, pastor; C. E. McVay, singer; 21 first night; following W. A. Sunday union revival.

Markle, Ind., Claris Yeuell, the pastor, preaching; 10 in one week; closed.

Havana, Ill., R. V. Callaway, pastor; R. E. Henry, pastor Niantic, Ill., evangelist; continuing.

Foreign Mission News

Mrs. Jaggard, writing from Monieka, Africa, December 20, says, "We have more of all kinds of vegetables than we can possibly use and supply our neighbors and passing steamers. Corn, cabbage, beans, tomatoes, cucumbers, lettuce, carrots, onions, squash, all do fine here and we think our potatoes will do well. Our garden certainly has saved us several tins (cans) and has been better for us. The soil is very rich. I have had fine success with flowers also.

Last week the Foreign Society received $651.60 from the estate of the late Miss Mary Hardin, Harrodsburg, Ky. This amount will more than provide the salary of a missionary for a whole year.

P. A. Sherman is quite busy with the school work at Bilaspur. He is working away on the new school building also. This is his first experience in building in that land.

Dr. Jaggard reports ninety-four baptized at Monieka, Congo, Africa, December 22, 1912. He baptized the ninety-four himself in forty minutes.

James Ware reports twenty-seven baptisms at Shanghai, China. He has come to be a veteran in the service. His letters are always full of cheer.

Frank Garrett reports forty-nine young men in the Univesity of Nankin taking a stand for Christ.

CHURCH BELLS SCHOOL
Ask for Catalogue and Special Donation Plan No. 27
ESTABLISHED 1858
THE C. S. BELL CO. HILLSBORO, OHIO

Unless all signs fail, the churches will make an advance step in the March offering. Cheering reports come from every quarter.

Garabed Kevorkian reports six baptisms at Tokat, Turkey, since his last report. He asks the prayers of the people for the work of the Lord in Turkey.

A. F. Hensey, Bolenge, Africa, writing December 29, says, "Our evangelists have just gone out again after the Christmas convocation. We had a reunion of the church on Christmas day and there were sixty-three baptisms and a thank-offering of about 660 francs. Of those baptized, nineteen were from the Ubangi River district which is now the great untouched field of the Congo." Mr. Hensey further says, "H. C. Hobgood and W. R. Holder came down from Lotumbe for Christmas. We are leaving with the 'Oregon' for the Lomela River, the 31st, then expect to go to the Ubangi. Our eyes had grown weary with watching for reinforcements."

Mrs. James Lediard, mother of our missionary to Japan, Miss Mary F. Lediard, died suddenly at her home, Owen Sound, Ont., February 14. She was a devoted woman and her life was full of good deeds.

The number of new Living-link churches continues to grow. The March offering will insure still more. We are coming to be a better missionary people year by year. Men are now giving hundreds where before they gave $5 and $10. The interest is pitched on a higher plane. This marks growth in the hearts of the people.

Dr. Jaggard and wife moved into their new home at Monieka, Africa, December 5, their fifth wedding anniversary. They say they are very happy to have a clean house to live in. The little mud house was crowded and dirty.

Last week a friend in Ohio sent $1,000, a direct gift for the work of Foreign Missions.

Please send the March offering promptly to F. M. Rains, Sec., Cincinnati, Ohio. The money is needed to meet present obligations. If all the offering is not gathered in, be kind enough to send all on hand and forward the balance when collected. If friends will give local name of the church when different from the post office, they will greatly oblige,

Church Extension News

A statement of comparative receipts from October 1, 1912, to February 15, 1913, with the corresponding period last year shows a gain for this year of $10,375.83. The total receipts for this year are $39,525.13.

On February 1 the permanent Church Extension Fund amounted to $1,021,264.28. We thus far have over $21,000 on the second million.

For the first four months twenty-nine loans have been paid out aggregating $74,700. This is the greatest amount of money we have ever paid out in loans in any four months of our history. The board is now answering about one-third of the appeals.

The Board has recently received a gift of $50 from a brother in Oregon who is tithing. He sent $10 last year and in sending $50 this year he called this Church Extension's portion of the Lord's money.

We have recently received $500 on Annuity Plan from a friend who has given money before and have received a bequest of $500 from the estate of Mary Mercer of Liberty, Ill., and $74 from the estate of Miss E. V. Willis, of Eureka, Ill., and $100 from the estate of Mary V. White, Whitesboro, Texas.

In last week's report of loans closed the North Middleton, Ky., church referred to is the colored congregation there.

Conference of Church Workers in State Universities

The Sixth Annual Conference of Church Workers in State Universities was held at Lawrence, Kansas, seat of the Kansas State University, February 4 to 6, 1913. There was an attendance of about ninety, very representative, both in the territory covered and in the character of the workers. Eighteen states sent delegates, from Utah on the West to Massachusetts on the East, and from North Dakota to Texas. They came from twenty-three institutions of learning.

The communions represented were the Presbyterian, Disciples, Methodist Episcopal, Congregational, Baptist, Dutch Reformed, Lutheran, Unitarian, Protestant Episcopal, together with the Y. M. C. A. and Y. W. C. A.

The thought of the program sums itself up in the statement: A fuller co-operation of forces is desirable that there may be brought about economy of men and means, and a higher efficiency in service. The note of the messages was: "The Kingdom first; the denomination for the Kingdom."

Chancellor Frank Strong of the University of Kansas, pointed out the duty of the church in relation to our great educational system, especially in the State University centers thronged with increasing numbers of the best young men and women of the commonwealth. Church workers in State Universities must address themselves to this duty. But this duty is to be performed best when there is sympathetic co-operation on the part of the university authorities. This is being increasingly given.

Reports from the field showed marked progress in the interest taken in their own students by the various communions.

The Presbyterian church is handling the opportunity in the most statesmanlike manner. They have established student pastorates in twenty-four State Universities in the last seven years. In those universities are ten thousand Presbyterian students, while in the Presbyterian colleges in the same states there are but eight thousand students.

The commission of the Baptist church is working on the problem.

Bishop F. S. Spalding, of the Protestant Episcopal church of Utah, one of the speakers of the conference, recently has had placed in his hands $25,000 for the opening of a work in connection with the University of Utah.

The General Educational Boards of the churches are recognizing that there is no necessary conflict between the student pastorate efforts and the denominational college activities; but that a wise co-operation will conduce to the advantage of both. This was emphasized by Bishop Francis J. McConnell of the Methodist Episcopal church.

There was a strong sentiment in favor of a place for Bible teaching in the curriculum, but the emphasis fell upon the importance of positive religious instruction and of the personal relation between Bible teacher and student. Professor F. L. Jewett of the Bible Chair, University of Texas, is working on all three through the curriculum courses.

The faculty man looms up as a strong possible factor in the solution of the students' life problems. As Dr. Holmes, vice-president of Pennsylvania State College, put it: "A faculty man bigger than his subject, acquainted with the student and alive to his need, would make a new atmosphere in the university and give true direction to the student life."

This neglected field of the State University is receiving some of the attention it deserves, and the results thus far convince one that it is an unusually great opportunity not alone for service to the student and to the state through the student, but as a place for the enlistment and training of men for Christian service in the missionary, pastoral and social ministries.

Among the speakers were Mrs. Anna R. Atwater, President Christian Woman's Board of Missions, Indianapolis, Ind.; Chancellor Frank Strong, University of Kansas; Henry F. Cope, secretary Religious Education Association; Richard C. Hughes, University secretary, Presbyterian Board of Publication; Bishop F. S. Spalding, Protestant Episcopal Church, Salt Lake City; Dr. Arthur Holmes, vice-president Pennsylvania State College; Thomas Nicholson, secretary Educational Board, Methodist Episcopal Church; H. H. Sweets, secretary Educational Board, Methodist Episcopal Church, South; President E. P. Robertson, Wesley Affiliate College, North Dakota; Frank W. Padelford, secretary Baptist Board of Publication; John Powell, Religious work director, Y. M. C. A.; C. D. Hurrey, executive secretary, International Committee, Y. M. C. A.; F. L. Jewett, Texas Bible Chair, University of Texas; A. W. Taylor, Bible College of Missouri, University of Missouri; H. R. Gold, Lutheran University pastor, University of Wisconsin.

"NEVER GIVE UP"

Charlotte M. Donaldson, Pianist for Gipsy Smith Meetings, 1909, 3700 Bartmer Ave., St. Louis, Mo., says: "I have played sacred music all my life and I can conscientiously say I have never enjoyed using a collection of songs more than Hallowed Hymns. Those who heard the songs during the Gipsy Smith Meetings will never forget them. It was wonderful. "Never Give Up" was called for continually."

J. S. Noah, East Liverpool, Ohio, says: "I have been directing choirs for nearly twenty years and in that time have used nearly all books that have been put on the market, and I want to say right here that Hallowed Hymns, New and Old, is the best yet. They have the two most essential points, that is simplicity any rhythm."

Hallowed Hymns will create new life in your church.

National Benevolent Association

These babies and 425 other children await your answer to the Easter call.

What It Is

The authorized and accredited agency of the Christian Churches in their fellowship with Christ in his compassion on the poor.

What It Has Done

Established one Hospital and raised over $435,000 toward the establishment of another; four Homes for the Aged and six Homes for Orphan and other unfortunate Children. Cared for more than 10,000. Placed about 4,000 children in Christian families.

What It Is Doing

Caring for 75 indigent aged brethren and sisters, 30 dependent widows, 450 homeless orphan children, besides the destitute sick under its care.

What It Needs

Its immediate need is an Easter offering of $35,000. Send all offerings to The National Benevolent Association, 2955 N. Euclid Ave., St. Louis, Mo.

Ten Big Reasons Why

BETHANY GRADED LESSONS are being adopted by so many of the best schools among Disciples

1. There is more to them—at least a third more—than is contained in any other series.
2. They are rich, vital and full of suggestion to teacher and pupil.
3. They are free from the sectarian spirit.
4. They are soundly and fervently evangelical.
5. They are truly artistic in all their illustrations.
6. They are printed on better paper with better binding and in better taste than any other series.
7. Every lesson writer is an expert of interdenominational reputation.
8. They are a monumen. to the modern spirit of unity—a dozen leading denominations have co-operated to produce them and are now using them.
9. The Disciples possess full editorial rights, through the editor, Charles Clayton Morrison.
10. Every Disciple school that uses them participates in and promotes a great Christian union enterprise.

EVERY QUARTER ADDS TO THE NUMBER OF SCHOOLS INTRODUCING THESE LESSONS.

Disciples Publication Society

THE DISCIPLES PUBLICATION SOCIETY is a corporation chartered under the laws of Illinois. It is organized for the purpose of publishing books, Sunday School literature and a weekly religious newspaper. It has no capital stock. Its profits are not to go to individuals but to be appropriated to advance the cause of religious education, especially the higher education of the Christian ministry. The term "religious education" is regarded as an ideal common to Sunday Schools, missionary societies, colleges, seminaries and universities, and other organizations that promote Christian progress through Christian education. The Society through its trustees has purchased the entire assets and good will of the New Christian Century Company (including the subscription list and good will of The Christian Century; a contract of participation in the interdenominational syndicate for publishing the Bethany Graded Lessons; a contract of membership in the United Religious Press; all books, Sunday School supplies and other stock on hand; all accounts and bills receivable; besides assuming liability for all accounts and bills payable), for $16,000 and has executed its notes to that amount which have been accepted by the stock-holders of the New Christian Century Company in payment for their property. To provide capital for enlarging the business the trustees are issuing 5 per cent bonds in the amount of $50,000, retirable after five years, to be sold to persons interested in the ideals of The Christian Century. It is believed at the present time that not more than $25,000 of these bonds need be sold in order to put the Society on a sound profit earning basis. Subscriptions for the purchase of these bonds are now being solicited by C. C. Morrison and H. L. Willett, editors of The Christian Century. During Dr. Willett's absence in the Orient correspondence may be addressed exclusively to Mr. Morrison. Full information as to all details will be given upon inquiry. The essential purpose of the transaction and proposals herein described is to provide a way for the general brotherhood of the Disciples of Christ to buy The Christian Century and its publishing house and to pay for them by patronizing them. The bonds and notes are to be retired out of the profits earned by the Society. The purchasers of bonds, therefore, will stand, with the holders of notes, in the position of sustainers or supporters of the enterprise while the brotherhood's patronage is paying for it and increasing its value. The question of defining the membership of the Disciples Publication Society is still open, and upon it the organizers will be glad to receive suggestions. It is the purpose to make it thoroughly democratic and representative. The five trustees named by the charter will act for the Society until the basis of membership has been determined and the members elected.

CHRISTIAN UNITY IN THE SUNDAY SCHOOL

Following is letter that deals with so important a point that we use it as a text for saying something about the Bethany Graded Lessons:

"Editors The Christian Century: I have been very much interested in your emphasis upon the "practice of Christian unity." Allow me to suggest that this reform like most other reforms should begin with the children. Children are early taught to think in denominational terms, and the establishment of a denominational conscience in the minds of the young is deemed an extraordinary mark of spiritual discernment. However the normal child gives little heed to sectarian superfluities, and left to grow up under unsectarian influence would be content with an order simply Christian. I suggest that a series of leaflets or supplemental studies be prepared for use in Bible-schools. The unification of the Protestant churches means as much for the Kingdom of God as the overthrow of the liquor traffic, or the prosecution of missionary work in foreign countries.

Both these great reforms are being pressed in the Bible-schools.

Enlist the young in the effort to answer our Lord's prayer for unity and the work will be done.

I earnestly hope that you will continue to advocate practicing unity, until our brethren, with affections enlarged, shall receive into formal fellowship, all whom they concede Christ has received to himself.

R. L. BESHERS."

To meet this very vital need the Bethany Graded Lessons for Sunday-schools are published. They are not sectarian. They are the product of co-operative effort on the part of a number of the leading religious bodies in America.

They approach the pupil and the lesson not from the standpoint of a denomination but from the standpoint of truth and the child's nature. The pedagogical principle upon which they are constructed entirely obliterates the denominational point of view. In selecting a lesson writer the question asked is not, To what denomination does he belong? but, Is he skilled in his understanding of child-life at this particular age, and is he skilled in presenting the Gospel materials suitable to the needs of such pupils?

The most reactionary sentiment among Disciples today is expressed in the bid for business by a denominational publishing house based upon the fact that its supplies are all written by Disciples, and that they are therefore true to "our" doctrines!

This kind of talk is a mischievous survival from a day that is dead. We are in a new day, and such publishers do not know it. We have come into a day when every informed religious teacher knows that the artificial distinctions among denominations have no place in training child life for Christ. This is especially true of the graded system where the materials selected and the treatment given are determined by the child and his needs. The scientific point of view has entirely superseded the sectarian point of view in the graded lessons.

And God be thanked that it has! No more remarkable demonstration of the degree of Christian unity already attained can be found than the fact that nearly a dozen Christian bodies—among them the official houses of the Presbyterians, Methodists and Congregationalists, with the Disciples represented through the New Christian Century Company—have actually been able to produce and to use for three years the same literature for graded Sunday-schools.

Which sentiment answers best to the Disciples' history and purposes?—to say, We must keep our schools to themselves; they must not be allowed to share in this union movement. Or, we must take our place with these Presbyterians and Methodists and cooperate with them to produce a truly union literature, untainted by sectarianism.

It seems to us to be manifest that Disciples must answer: We cannot afford to be left out of such an enterprise as this; it is more truly "ours" than an enterprise conducted solely by "our own people."

The Disciples have received nothing but the most generous consideration in this cooperative enterprise and have, in their turn, made positive contribution to the lesson teachings.

With the increase of our patronage our influence in this interdenominational work will be greatly increased.

We have space for the following letter the publishing of which is accompanied by our grateful appreciation:

By GRANVILLE SNELL.
Evangelist Seventh District, Missouri.

Enclosed you will find my renewal for your excellent paper. I hardly see how a young minister can do without it. While I do not confine my reading to the papers of our movement, I enjoy the "Century" more than any other one paper. In my evangelistic work I find that other Christians are as willing to put up with me as I with them, and sometimes more so. We must practice union where we can. At times I find the preacher more ready than his church, both with us and the others. I think the "Century" has a mission both to ministers and to our leaders. It is true that some will not understand you for awhile, but that is a small matter. "I have many things to say but you cannot bear them now" is the teaching of the Master. We can safely follow Him. I should like to see your latest plan succeed.

CHARLES CLAYTON MORRISON,
700 E. 40th Street, Chicago.

I am interested in doing what I can to aid you and Dr. Willett in your plan for firmly establishing The Christian Century in the ownership and control of the Disciples. Kindly send me additional information. How long do the bonds extend? In what financial condition does the new Society begin business? Can you accept payment for bonds on the installment plan or must you have immediate cash for entire amount subscribed?

How Big a Universe Do You Live In?

We live in an elastic Universe.

It is of many sizes, and adjustable.

It is cut and fitted to each man. He himself does the fitting and part of the cutting.

Some men live in a universe, the limit of whose outermost confines they can touch with their own finger-tips. It is their one end and aim in life to change their finger-tip touch into a good, fast clutch. If their arms were only a little longer and their grip a little stronger they would be able to hold in hand or mouth what is virtually their whole universe. They are as the beasts that perish.

From this lowest stage of human apprehension on and up the Universe expands. From the man who is his own world on to the man whose world is his home and whose concern for humanity is bounded by the four walls within which he dwells, the ascent and widening area are progressive and continuous. There are men whose universe is as big as their own country, their own church, their own profession.

The man with only his naked eye and a small imagination lives in a universe bounded by the horizon. To him even the stars are virtually only a mile high. The man with the telescope adds celestial diameters to the measure of his universe, and the man with the microscope does the same in the other direction, and the man with the X-ray machine sees still farther. But the man with the imagination, the man of spiritual vision, sees farthest of all. He can discover what eye hath not seen nor ear heard. He can see beyond the stars. He can possess for his own the regions from whose bourne no traveler has returned. God and the landscape are his; for his eyes see the King in his beauty, and he beholds the land that is very far off.

No man can measure out a universe and deed it in fee simple to another man. Discovery is creative. The universe shrinks and expands with the mind and purpose of man. It fits every man like a garment without seam. Each man grows his universe. He makes it big or little. He makes it glorious or contemptible. He fashions it according to the bulk and quality of his own soul.

There are rare souls whose horizon is expanded beyond narrow limitations. Partly because of their vision and partly because of their elevation they see things afar and count great interests their own. There are men who possess their possessions and men who are possessed by them. There are men whose life is the present only, and there are men who live also in the rich experiences of the past, and the great hopes and visions of the future. There are men who pray "Thy kingdom come" with one hand on their pocketbook, and the other reaching restlessly out for something more for self. There are others who utter the same prayer with the map of the world outspread before them.

There are men who contend that one world at a time is enough and who assume that the doing of present duty and for duty's sake is all there is of life. There are others whose vision widens till backward in the past it discerns a rocky hill surmounted by a cross, and forward until it discovers a glory "which eye hath not seen, nor ear heard, neither hath entered into the heart of man."

It belongs to the true interpretation of life to lay less and less stress upon mere means of getting a living, and more upon the contemplation and possession of those things which make it worth while to live.

Expressed in terms of time, no man's life is very large. Each man lives in the universe whose outer probable dimensions are three score years and ten; yet there are men who live not more than one-half that number of years who live them so wisely and so well that they possess the ages. There are men who live in this present world and live so greatly that already they are heirs of the kingdom of God.

The potential universe is vastly big, inconceivably big, bewilderingly big. It belongs to each one of us to discover and measure his universe, to pre-empt it and occupy it and make it his own.

Past, present and future; himself, my neighbor, God; faith, hope and love; joy, holiness and life everlasting—all these are possible measurements of each man's universe, and each dimension grows great with his apprehension and occupation.

In how big a universe are you living?

The Public Communion Cup

The Board of Health of the city of Colorado Springs has issued an order to the clergy of that city, forbidding them to "administer Holy Communion from a common chalice (cup)." It must be noted that a large part of the Colorado Springs community is formed by consumptives. To those religious communions that tolerate or encourage the use of individual communion cups, the order of the Board of Health presents no difficulty whatever. But a most serious and a most awkward religious question and situation are presented by the order to the Episcopalians who feel that the individual cup robs the sacrament of its religious symbolism or who think that the "one cup" is too Scriptural and historical to be tampered with by modern, commercial or even hygienic considerations. Individual communion cups are out of the question in these two religious bodies, and yet the order of the Board of Health seems to be positive and final. If the public drinking cup is a nuisance and a peril, so is the communion cup for identically the same reason. In the Episcopal Church, the priest who administers the rite, is obliged by his faith and by the rubrics of his ceremonials, reverently to consume all the wine not consumed by the communicants. The Living Church (Episcopal, Milwaukee), argues that if the chalice is a peril at all, it is a peril most to the priest in charge. But the longevity of Episcopalian priests prove the direct opposite. The Living Church claims that twenty-seven is the average age of ordination in the Episcopal Church. According to mortality tables, the average man of twenty-seven lives to be sixty-three years of age, but in the necrology tables of the Episcopal Living Church Annual (corresponding to a year book of that church), the average age of sixty-eight clergymen who died was sixty-seven and three-fourths years.

The same paper suggests the possibility of a new system for the administration of the sacrament in order to meet the present emergency: "The priest, carrying the chalice, a server attending him with the wafers, could take the latter, one by one for each communicant, dip the lower half into the chalice, protect it carefully from dripping, and so convey it to the mouth of the communicant" —a modification of the modus operandi of the Greek Orthodox form. It will be interesting to observe, however, just what the Episcopalians of Colorado Springs actually do under the circumstances.

Is Pastor Russell Untruthful?

The Continent (Presbyterian, Chicago) suggests that Pastor Russell is a plain, unvarnished liar. We had heard something of his domestic difficulties. We had heard something of his questionable business connections. We had heard that a libel suit against the Brooklyn Eagle, in which he figured as the injured "allegator," had fallen down completely. But The Continent of Feb. 13 does not mince words in saying that Pastor Russell is a common falsifier in addition to his other accomplishments and achievements. It says:

> "Pastor Russell of Brooklyn, if he has any accomplishment in the line of song, might appropriately devote his voice to the old tune, "I Am Something of a Liar Myself." At least, he might claim that distinction by responsible proxy. During the past fall his press bureau sent out for country papers that take his "boiler plate" what purported to be a quotation from 'Great Britain's foremost family paper,' stating that Pastor Russell had been 'inducted to the charge of the London Tabernacle, known all over the united kingdom and thousands of miles beyond as the pulpit of the revered Spurgeon.' In Brooklyn Russell calls his church 'Brooklyn Tabernacle' in the evident hope of making people suppose that he had succeeded Talmage, but he has never had the nerve to say that his church actually is the Talmage church. In regard to London he feels a little more reckless, and is willing to print in uninformed rural regions at least the black-and-white falsehood of a claim that he has preached in Spurgeon's old pulpit."

Methodist Protestants and United Brethren

A few years ago there seemed to be a strong probability of the Congregational, United Brethren and Methodist Protestant churches uniting, but at the last moment negotiations ended after some difficulties arose. In 1909, the last General Conference of the United Brethren Church, appointed a commission to approach the Methodist Protestant Church on the subject of union. The Methodist Protestants last May met the advance of the United Brethren most favorably, by naming a corresponding commission. These two committees have now met, and apparently it is a case of love at first sight. Both commissions have unanimously voted a resolution that, so far as they could see, the way was now open to proceed toward union. The name proposed is "The United Protestant Church." The banns of marriage may be announced this year, as the two committees adjourned to meet again in March.

According to the United States (1906) Census of Religious Bodies, published in 1910, the Methodist Protestant Church has 2,843 organizations with a reported total membership of 178,544. The value of 2,442 church edifices is reported at $6,053,048. Its greatest strength is in the South Atlantic Division of States. The number of ministers then reported was 1,852. The United Brethren Church appears to be the stronger of the two bodies, with a total number of 3,732 organizations having an aggregate membership of 274,649, ministered to by 1,935 preachers. A total of 3,356 organizations reported a church property value of $8,401, 539 besides having 1,004 parsonages valued at $1,423,282. Its greatest strength is in the North Central Division of States.

Another Canadian Move

The fact that the Disciples of Christ hold their first international convention on Canadian soil this coming fall lends exceptional interest to religious news from across the line. A considerable number of the clergy of the Church of England in Canada, recently signed a circular letter "on behalf of Christian unity," causing said letter to be widely distributed. The proposition of this circular is simply to promote Christian unity, from an Anglican viewpoint at any rate, by opening up both pulpit and pew to others not members of the Church of England. Christian unity would be promoted, according to these Anglican petitioners—

"(a) By the admission of ministers of other churches, under certain restrictions and by rightful authority, to the pulpits of our churches.

"(b) By permission being given to members of other communions —being members in good standing in their communion—on occasion and with consent of the ordinary, to communicate in our churches."

One synod, that of the diocese of Ottawa, held on last January 14, under the presidency of the Archbishop, however, has memorialized the General Synod of the Church of England in Canada that no such change shall be introduced into the Revised Prayer Book or the canons of the General Synod. The Bishop of Algona, while expressing sympathy with the desire for unity fears "division, if not actual disruption, within our own ranks; and it would postpone indefinitely our reunion with the ancient communions of the East."

It is plain that the Canadian Church will in all probability not open either its pulpits or its pews, but is it not clear that what is going on among the Presbyterians, the Methodists and the Congregationalists of Canada, must influence the Establishment more or less? The great forces for unity in these various bodies are whirling around the Establishment and already affecting some of its clergy.

Episcopalians in the Southwest

A missionary council of the Protestant Episcopal Church in the Southwest was held the latter part of January at Austin, Texas. The presiding bishop of the church, Bishop Tuttle, of Missouri, and the Bishops of Texas, West Texas, Oklahoma, North Texas, Arkansas, Eastern Oklahoma and Salina, with many clergy and laymen were in attendance. The Episcopalians are carefully planning to intensify and extensify their growth in this new country by and through an arrangement to be known as a Board of Strategy, something that might well be patterned after by all religious bodies. Among other things that this unique board will plan for is "popular evangelism and church extension lectures in the centres of higher education where practicable." It will be a matter of interest to note how the Episcopalians adapt themselves to "popular evangelism," something not generally associated with that conservative church.

Bishop Vincent's Eighty-One Years

Bishop John H. Vincent, originator of the Chautauqua, was eighty-one years old on February 23. The bare statement no doubt is sufficient to thrill countless multitudes who owe much of their cultural life and much of their spiritual life to this man. He was born in Tuscaloosa, Ala., in 1832. Circumstances denied him a college education. He entered the Methodist ministry at the age of eighteen. It was while circuit-riding that he educated himself. In all probability, this personal fact proved the soil out of which grew the Chautauqua in 1874. Today the Chautauqua is one of the most potent influences in our democracy. National figures are made and unmade by it. It is wonderful to think of this octogenarian still busy at work in the Master's service. No doubt much of the mutual acquaintanceship now enjoyed among Christians of all names is due to this great bishop's work.

Miriam: The Ugliness of Envy

What is envy? Unfortunately it is unnecessary to attempt a definition. Those who need to be informed of this sin are so few that they may be ignored. It is found wherever man is found. It is partial to no rank and to no stage of culture. To be free from envy, however, may not be a mark of virtue. The envious person has some desire for self-advancement. To be free from envious feeling because we have no pride in what we are and what we can do is to fall below the level of normal humanity. The ambition that makes possible the sin we call envy is needed.

"Envy always implies conscious inferiority, wherever it resides." In this saying Pliny gives the experience of the Roman world. Were he living today, he would not have to make a different statement. The envious person is unwilling that his inferiority should be known, hence he would bring others down to his level or put them below him. "Man that hath no virtue in himself," says Bacon, "ever envieth virtue in others; for men's minds will either feed upon their own good, or upon others' evil; and who wanteth the one will prey upon the other; and whoso is out of hope to attain another's virtue, will seek to come at even hand by depressing another's fortune."

Much of the lying with which the world is disgraced is due to envy. If we are pained at the ability and success of others, we are tempted to deny or to minimize the ability and to declare that the success is wholly due to fortunate circumstances. One sees this ugly sin in physicians, in preachers, in lawyers, in teachers, in housewives. The physician hints that the new doctor knows nothing of the science of medicine, the preacher discovers that his popular brother in the ministry is a charlatan, the lawyer denounces his fellow practitioner as a pettifogger, the teacher announces that his predecessor whom the pupils greatly honor is without scholarship and entirely innocent of pedagogical skill, and even the housewife has been known to magnify the faults of her neighbor housekeeper.

Envy is an enemy of efficiency. The time spent in contemplating with pain the influence and the happiness of others is worse than wasted. The remarks we make with the purpose of injuring another destroy our own influence with those whom we most need as friends and co-laborers. To be envious is to be wretched, and no one can do his best when he is in misery. Energy is consumed rapidly by bad feelings. Experts are called in by managers of factories to teach employes how to work most advantageously. These experts point out the way to avoid useless movements, the number of pounds that can be lifted most economically and in other ways add to the saving of the worker's energy. The moral and religious teacher is a great factor in the movement to increase efficiency. He calls the attention of men to the necessity of having the right attitude toward each other in order that they may secure the largest results. Miriam was hindered in her ministry to Israel when she allowed herself to become envious of Moses.

Happiness of the best sort is impossible where envy dwells. Happiness depends upon virtue. Every lapse from virtue decreases happiness. Pleasure may be the portion of the immoral; happiness they do not know. Envy is one of the most successful, if not the most successful, destroyer of happiness. The very things that should bring happiness are turned into instruments of racking torture.

Envy is like all sin in that it is against love. Love delights in goodness wherever it appears. It pools its interests. One who loves his neighbor feels that his neighbor's success is his success. Ability excites his admiration. He may regret that he cannot do some things that others do with ease but he does not become malicious toward any that excel him in work. "The benevolent man is the better able to bear his own calamities unruffled, from the complacency and security he has secured from contemplating the prosperity all around him." The rights of reason are respected by love. Only the fool will see any advantage in envy. The wise man asks for himself the joy in others that love supplies. [Midweek Service, March 12. Num. 12:1-15.]

President Kershner on Baptism*

A humble-minded book on baptism—who would have predicted such a phenomenon? But here it is, fragrant with Christian charity, a token of the near approach of the millenium! It was written for an irenic purpose, not for debate. Its chapters were read by its Disciple author to the Episcopalian Commission on Christian Unity which was sitting in joint conference with the Disciples Commission on Christian Unity. The argument was prepared at the invitation of the Episcopalian Commission and is now published in book form at their request.

But it is not less impressive as a statement of the author's convictions than of his tolerance. In fact it is an illustration of how much weight one's convictions actually gain when expressed humble-mindedly. The author has drawn the thing as he sees it, plainly, but in lines softened by the feeling that others are not only entitled to their point of view but may indeed possess a truth which he has overlooked.

This tolerant attitude appears in his studied purpose to avoid pressing a specific argument to a dogmatic conclusion. Instead of that he says the argument creates a strong "presumption," and then he confirms this presumption by other arguments which he holds presumptively each by itself but which, taken together, give body and foundation to his conviction. This temper of open-mindedness in the author creates, too, in the reader a favorable presumption that the author's position is right, and that is more than half winning his battle at the start.

In the chapter on infant baptism the remissness of baptist bodies toward little children is frankly acknowledged. "Some rite analogous to Christening would seem to be a very desirable thing for Christianity," says the author. But he urges his objection to "extending the sacrament of baptism to infants" on the ground that to do so is "an essential contradiction of the character of the ordinance."

The two strongest chapters in the book, in our judgment, are the first, on "The Christ Life," and the sixth, on "Objections." In the sixth chapter Mr. Kershner weighs fairly but decisively three or four of the most common objections to the practice of immersion. With no show of dialectic he easily turns the edge of every one of them. Here for example is the way he meets the objection that immersion is sometimes physically impossible and that there should therefore be some convenient substitute:

> "Assuredly a repentence which is genuine and sincere, and a real and unfeigned bowing of the spirit to the commands of our Lord, from a moral point of view, carries with it quite as much significance as any sort of substitution for the external act of baptism. In other words the man who, spiritually, is prepared for baptism and desires it, but for physical reasons cannot receive it externally has, from the moral viewpoint, as effectually received it as though the external rite had been administered, especially in a substitute form." "To change the entire character of the ordinance, however, in order to enable all to yield a formal obedience to it, . . . comes dangerously near the substitution of external rites and ceremonies for moral worth and values."

To the objection that immersion is unfit for cold countries Mr. Kershner points out that the general use of affusion began in warm countries—Italy, Spain and France—long before it was discontinued in England. Russia, the coldest coutry in Europe, always practiced immersion and does so at the present time.

So much for the replies to objections. In the opening chapter on "The Christ Life" the author sets himself squarely on the side of ethical Christianity as contrasted with legalism. The Christian character is fundamental, he affirms, and whatever place may be allowed to rites and forms is conditioned upon their being helps to the great ends of personal goodness and the kingdom of God.

> "The ultimate test of a Christian remains, therefore, the Pauline test, the presence of the Spirit of Christ; and the presence of the Spirit is determined ultimately in the Pauline way, by its fruits, the triple trinity of the fifth chapter of Galatians."

Church rites and forms take a very subsidiary place in Paul's writings, says the author, and adds that what is true of Paul is even more true of the Gospels themselves. The Christ life is the goal of the Christian religion, "the life which realizes most nearly the ideals of Christ, the life which strives to embody him as he embodied the Father in all he did while he was upon the earth."

*CHRISTIAN BAPTISM, by Frederick D. Kershner, President Texas Christian University. Published by Commission on Christian Union of the Disciples of Christ. Pp. 116. Price 50 cents. Orders will be filled by New Christian Century Company, Chicago.

This out and out ethical conception of religion is a reassuring note to sound at the very opening of an argument on baptism! Whether President Kershner's subsequent chapters hold consistently with his emphatic disavowal of legalism will, so far as this review is concerned, be left to the reader to judge. His emphasis upon character is not, however, mere ethical individualism. "Men need," says the author, "nay must have the Church in order to develop the Christ life." The Church is a means to an end. "It does not lessen the value of the Church to give it its proper place. On the contrary, it may do great harm to assign it a place foreign to its true function."

Baptism comes in with the Church. "The Church with its ordinances, its regular appointments for worship, its significant and impressive symbolism, affords the only possible means for the preservation and extension of vital Christianity." What the author—infelicitously, we think—calls "formal religiou" has therefore "a place in the divine economy, even though that place can never become a substitute for the life of service and love."

These are all good words and are backed by sound psychology and the common experience of mankind. Mr. Kershner is opening here a door which will admit him and his readers into a rational and scriptural conception of baptism if they but keep their bearings. But, as we view him, the author does not keep his bearings. Once inside the door the bearings determined in his approach to the Church are upset by the sense of familiarity, and the author falls into talking of baptism in the fashion to which he has previously been accustomed.

Most people have had the experience of being "turned around" in a certain city and entering it again and again with the resolution to make its houses and streets stand true with the rest of the world, only to find to their chagrin that the power of habit and association invariably overcame them and the false bearings were reinstated against their better knowledge.

Something like this, we beg to suggest, happened to President Kershner in writing this fine tempered brochure. He starts in with the determination to treat of baptism as the "initiatory rite" of the Church but falls into the traditional immersionist error of treating it as a physical act. To be sure he speaks at times of immersion as the "form" of baptism; he even refers to it as the "original mode of baptism," adopting thus the nomenclature of pedobaptists which Alexander Campbell strongly, and from his point of view, logically, repudiated. But Mr. Kershner does not seem to be aware of the implications of this distinction between baptism and the particular physical act by which it is administered. This pedobaptist nomenclature creeps into his speech surreptitiously, while the conscious purpose of his argument is to prove that immersion itself is baptism.

Illustrating directly this confusion of terms note the author's use of the familiar linguistic argument. The excellent quotation which we made last week from a very recent paragraph written by President Kershner in the Christian Standard is in such direct contradiction of certain statements in his book that we venture to place them here side by side.

In the Christian Standard.	In the Book.
"It may be well to note here that the charge so frequently brought against the translations of the Bible, both in the days of King James and of Victoria, that theological bias interfered to prevent the rendering of baptizo as "immerse," is a very mistaken and fallacious one. Baptizo means "immerse," it is true, but it also means a great deal more. It is altogether easy to immerse people without baptizing them. Every time a diver plunges under he is immersed, but he is not baptized. Baptism means immersion as a physical action, but as a religious rite it carries a far deeper significance. Had the translators not faced this difficulty I have no doubt but that they would have substituted the word "immersion" for "baptism." The situation being as it is, however, they were fully justified in translating the word as they did. To render the New Testament baptizo into English as "immerse," with the implication that the last-named word is a complete equivalent, is a very decided error."	The word "baptism" or in the original baptisma, occurs twenty-two times in the New Testament. The other related words occur a little over one hundred times. In no case will it do violence to the context to interpret the word given in the text with the idea involved in "submerge" or "immerse." "The Greek baptizo, as we have noted is not translated in our English Bibles, but simply transferred. In many other languages, however, it is translated. In substantially all cases where this is done, the word used is one which signifies to immerse or plunge, in the language in question. An exception to this rule is that of the Slavonic dialects where the word krestitl, meaning to make the sign of the cross, or to cross, is used." "The word as used in the New Testament is strictly in harmony with its context when rendered "submerge," and at no time does the meaning appear strained or forced. "Baptism can always be translated "submerge" without doing violence to the context.

Thus we are happy to find in President Kershner's later words a sufficient corrective for his own "very decided error." Had he, when he wrote the book, plainly discerned the point he now makes in the newspaper he would have devoted himself in his address before the Episcopalians to two questions: What is this "great deal more" that baptism is? And, what is the relation of the physical act to this "great deal more?" The answer to these questions would have been a rich contribution to the subject, rewarding to both Episcopalians and Disciples.

And the pity of it is that Mr. Kershner's own definition of baptism as the Church's initiatory rite, if he had clung to it from the time he entered the door of his argument until he came out, would have saved him. An initiatory rite is not a physical act. No rite, at least among civilized men, is a physical act. Neither is a particular physical act the essence or core of a rite, no matter how deeply embedded in custom or in law it may be. In rites that effect some change of status, like inauguration, or marriage, or ordination, or baptism, the particular physical act involved is the means of carrying out the meaning of the rite. The meaning of baptism is initiation into the Church, and President Kershner's unaware references to immersion as its "form" or "mode" of administration make much the most illuminating portion of his argument.

That our criticism is well taken is evident from the fact that Mr. Kershner gladly concedes that the unimmersed Episcopalians to whom he was addressing his argument are not without baptism. They are members of the Church of Christ—of both the invisible and the visible Church of Christ, an unscriptural and misleading distinction which the author allows to creep into his text at one point. They became members of the Church of Christ by submitting to the initiatory rite, that is, baptism. They were buried with their Lord by initiation into his Church. They arose as members of his Body to walk the new life. No doubt to Mr. Kershner's mind they were irregularly initiated, but he heartily concedes that their initiation was not invalid.

But if these unimmersed persons may be said to have been baptized, even though irregularly, our author's opportunity before a Christian Union Commission lay in the direction of defining the element common both to immersion-baptism and affusion-baptism; anl upon that basis making his plea for regularity in the mode of administering the rite.

It is in no other than the same gracious spirit of Mr. Kershner's book that we make these comments upon it. We would have greatly preferred to offer only words of praise. We earnestly desire that the little volume may be read widely. It marks, not only in its temper but in many of its ideas, a new approach to the baptism question from the immersionist side. It may fairly be called a work of pronounced progressive, even liberal, tendency. It is one of those many harbingers of a new day among the Disciples of Christ.

"A New Danger"

An editorial in a recent issue of the Youth's Companion calls the attention of parents to a new danger threatening their homes in the lowered standards of many of the periodicals of today. The editorial says in part: "Not long ago there was a time when parents could leave any American periodical upon the sitting-room table without misgiving. That time has passed. The periodicals that you do not need to examine with some care before you put them where your girls may see them are now few. Under one specious pretext or another those who control them are printing stories and articles that are far from paying that deference to modesty and decency upon which our literature used justly to pride itself. This is a matter for very great regret. Periodicals intended for general reading seek to enter the home—on the plea always that they bring wholesome recreation if not more solid benefits. Thus they rest under a peculiar obligation to be careful what they print. That obligation they are now disregarding to the injury of our youth."

This is a timely warning, and one which parents should heed. Parents may well guard with more care the tasks and habits of their children in the choice of books and periodicals, and why should they not teach the young people to love and read their own church papers?

An Adequate Return on the Investment

Our churches cost more than they did. They ought to cost more. A Puritan church was comparatively economical to operate. There was no expense for fuel, for the meeting-house was unheated. If there was any fire, people brought it in their own footstoves. There was no expense for church music. There was little expenditure for repairs, and the whole scale of life made small salaries and small expenses reasonable. We demand more in our church life. We demand a comfortable house and comfortable seats. We want carpets on our floors and cushions in the pews, and all these things have to be paid for, and ought to be paid for, and we pay for them more or less willingly. Ministers require higher salaries. It costs them more to live and to rear and educate their families. It costs just as much to keep tiles upon the roof of a large church as it would if it were an opera house. It costs as much to heat it and to insure it as to heat and insure a music hall. It costs as much to keep a church organ in repair as it would if the same organ were in a theater.

Our Puritan fathers were right in their declaration that God can be worshiped acceptably in a barn. So He can by people who themselves are living in barn-like homes, but God cannot be worshiped acceptably by a congregation whose members live in comfortable and beautiful homes, and who provide a poor and cheap place for the worship of God. A modern church, if it has paid music at all, ought to have music as good as that to which the people accustom themselves in the secular concerts which they attend. It ought to provide a house of worship as dignified and as beautiful as any of the other public buildings of the town. Its decorations and its comforts, which should never be lavish, which should always be simple and dignified, should nevertheless find their standard of beauty and expense in their relation to the better homes in the community. A church should represent a high ideal of beauty and make its constant appeal to sacrifice.

Our churches do not cost too much. They do not make too heavy demands upon their members. The buildings are not too beautiful. The music is not too good. The sermons are not too eloquent. None of these things cost more than we ought gladly to provide and do provide for them. But the vital question is, whether we are getting out an adequate return on our investment.

Better preaching we may have; better music we certainly do have; more physical comfort is ours. But it belongs to each member of the church to secure for himself, and to see that he helps give to others, a spiritual return proportionate to the larger investment.

Is Mexican Revolution Due to Romanism?

Since the downfall of the Diaz administration, Mexico has been rent more or less continuously by anarchy, civil war, and brigandage. We have always been in the habit of looking upon Mexico as different from the republics of Central and South America, for under the benevolent dictatorship of Porfirio Diaz the nation was held in restraint, and while it was a republic only in name, yet order and happiness, as a rule, were maintained among the people in the provinces as well as in the capital city. If the future means only a kaleidoscopic succession of military dictatorships, it is but a question of time when the United States will be compelled to intervene for the protection of her own interests and those of other nations as well. The present social and political situation is an indictment of the Roman Catholic Church, or at least of that portion of it which has been supreme in that country since the days of Cortes and Hernando, and which until 1857 was the only religion tolerated. In few countries has any religion had such an opportunity as Roman Catholicism in Mexico. Until the days of the republic it owned one-third of the soil, with convents and churches innumerable. But the people as a whole have been left in the crassest ignorance and superstition. Economic oppression has been almost universal. There is not the slightest evidence that this church has ever lifted a finger to protect or to uplift the ignorant Indians and mestizos who have been its protégés for generations, and who are still often in worse than Egyptian bondage. We are not among those who are never able to see any good in the Roman Church, but it is equally impossible for us to be blind to the fact that in those countries where it has had the fullest opportunity for self-expression, Romanism seems not only to have been bankrupt in moral and social and religious uplift, but even to have been an active agency, in the very opposite direction, as the corrupt national church in Mexico well illustrates.

The Day of Judgment

We have been entirely correct in our interpretation of the principle under-lying the words of Jesus, "Inasmuch as ye have done it unto one of these my brethren, even these least, ye have done it unto me." But we have been sadly wrong in our application. We have assumed that it meant principally that we ought to be good to tramps. This is a mere fraction of its meaning. The principle is easier to apply at a distance, but it is more important that it be applied close at hand.

If you pass your neighbor, who is trying hard to save his business from wreck, and is bearing his burden alone, and you do not say a "Good morning" that makes him feel the warmth of your companionship in his struggle, you place yourself for that day on the left hand of Jesus. If you shout angrily at the telephone girl, or address her in tone or language other than a gentleman should use to a lady sitting across the table from him, you have doomed yourself, for that hour, to outer darkness. If your office boy needed a reproof, but you gave him a berating such as you would not have thought of giving him had he been as tall and as strong as you, you belong, for that day, among the goats. If you scolded at breakfast because the coffee was bad, and if your wife's breakfast was spoiled by your bad temper, then one of the Lord's children was hungry, and you took away not only the food but the appetite. If you have kept the end seat in church, and compelled people to climb over your knees, and you sat there resenting the fact that they rubbed the blacking off your boots or trod on your corns, your sufferings were only a part of that weeping and gnashing of teeth which the Lord promised to people who do such things. If you played a practical joke upon a sensitive man, and left him, trying to smile, but with his soul bleeding from a cruel wound behind the armor of that smile, you departed from Christ into the great gulf where live the inconsiderate and the wanton. If you have so lived, for a single day, that any living man, knowing you to be a Christian, thinks less of religion on your account, provided always that you have given him just cause for his feeling, you have arrayed yourself with those who wound and imprison and starve the Christ. If you have acted in an unbrotherly manner toward any child of God, in your own home or elsewhere, you have instituted a day of judgment, and have pleaded guilty to inflicting humiliation and wrong upon your Saviour.

But if you have acted kindly, gently, and in unselfish love, then you have uttered a creed. You have confessed that the Christ spirit is the spirit in which men ought to live. You have confessed your faith. And you have only to keep on loving and doing good, and in the great day of the Lord you shall not find yourself among those who neglected or misunderstood, but with those who already have the joy of their Lord.

Undermining War?

The Illinois state miners' convention went on record last week as favoring a general strike whenever war is declared either by or against the United States. This organization represents 82,000 miners in the state of Illinois. The resolution provides that the International Mine Workers' convention be asked to concur in this action so that in case of war being declared between any nations a universal strike of coal miners shall be called. This action—which to many will seem radical and under some circumstances almost within the bounds of treason, but which apart from its particular application as a general principle has much to commend it—is in line with what European workingmen have done in recent years, and is one of the beneficent results wrought by socialism. In the past, war has too often been a matter of determination by a comparatively small group of men. The next hundred years are bound to see a great change in this respect. The diplomatists and financiers will no longer be able alone to unleash the dogs of war. The people who do the fighting will have to be reckoned with. The chancelleries of Europe have in the past made too many human shambles. They will not do so much longer. The peasants crushed under the armaments of peace are beginning to see the economic and social folly of war. This new attitude is in large measure due to the growth of socialism. If a new era of universal peace is about to dawn upon the world, it will be due in no small measure to the rapidly spreading consciousness among the toilers of all nations of their common interests and responsibilities.

The Benedictine Bible.

The Holy Father at Rome is letting a fine chance to demonstrate his infallibility go by the board. The Order of Benedictines is now engaged, according to Harper's Weekly, on a complete revision of the Latin Scriptures of St. Jerome, which is the basis of the famous Douay Version. The Benedictines, who have yet five or six years before them to finish the work, are attempting to reproduce the exact version of Jerome, the Dalmatian. Benedictine scholars are ransacking every important library in the world, making technical comparisons of the different versions, thus deciding which reading must be the work of Saint Jerome. The Latin Bible now in use by the Roman Church was published in 1593 by Clement VIII after a commission had labored on it for forty years. According to Harper's, the method of the Benedictine scholars is something like this: When an ancient manuscript is found, it is compared with the Clementine Bible, and the annotated sheets of the field scholars are then sent to Benedictine headquarters at Rome. It is this method of work that is delaying the completion of the new Catholic Bible. Come to think of it, much valuable time might be saved if the infallible pope would just sit down in the quiet of his "prison cell" at the Vatican, and infallibly produce an infallible Bible just like St. Jerome did in the fourth century. What a fine opportunity he is letting slip from his grasp. Surely a Bible comes under "faith and morals" upon which his pronouncements when ex cathedra are taken by the faithful as absolutely inerrant. If the pope tried, he might by sheer inspiration produce a much better Bible than St. Jerome did. What is the use of comparing ancient manuscript with ancient manuscript to get at Jerome's version, which is the official version of the church, when by a piece of papal hocus-pocus he might produce a version himself that will be infallible for all time. The Clementine Commission of 1593 thought they had produced such a version, but a Commission is not a pope, and there you are!

The Livingstone Centenary

The one hundredth anniversary of the birth of David Livingstone occurs March 19, 1913. There will be celebrations all over the world. No attempt is to be made to confine these celebrations to a single day. They are to occur in different countries on different dates, during the next few months. The World in Chicago, to open May 3, will be, in its way, the most important American celebration of the hundredth anniversary of the birth of the great missionary.

The Famous Sacred Bridge at Nikko, Japan.

DR. WILLETT'S MISSION TOUR

The Religions of Japan

Japan is a land of shrines and gods. The symbols of religion of some sort are as common as in Italy. Nearly every hill has a shrine. Multitudes of torii, or gateways to temples and other places of worship, can be seen. In every town worthy of the name there will be one or more sanctuaries. And in most houses of the native kind there are shelves for offerings of rice or flowers, and for the burning of candles.

There are three religions which have a place of importance in the life of Japan—Shinto, Buddhism and Christianity. This order puts them in the successive steps of their appearance in the land, and their relative strength. Then there is the ethical system of Confucius, the Chinese sage, which is revered by a large proportion of the Japanese, but could hardly be called a religion.

The Old Native Religion.

Shinto—the "Way of the Gods"—is the old, native religion of Japan. It is made up of animism, nature worship and the worship of ancestors. It has a multitude of gods, and myths to account for their origin and cultus. Its shrines are the resort of the people of all classes and beliefs, for it has something of the old Greek love of nature, and it is not much concerned with religious rites. It is the state religion, in so far as there can be said to be such a thing, and of late has had fresh proofs of imperial favor in the decree that all the youth of the land, especially the school children, must be taken periodically to the important temples of the Shinto faith, there to do homage.

Buddhism came into Japan from China, and further back, from India, its home. It supplied what Shinto lacked, a more vital sense of religion as a fact of experience, and the necessity of having some religious sanctions in the great crisis of death. Every Japanese child was taken, under the old regime, to some Shinto temple to be registered, or enrolled as a member of the community. But at death it is the Buddhist priests who have charge of the service. Shinto is a sort of national belief by which to live, and Buddhism is a ritual in accordance with which to be buried.

Virtues of Buddhism.

Yet Buddhism is not without its religious activities, many of which are excellent. It maintains schools, gives some attention to the welfare of its people, and makes some serious effort to minister to the religious life of the community. Its priesthood is very numerous, in contrast with the Shinto. At one time, in the earlier days of the Christian propaganda, the priesthood was very corrupt, but of late there has been a considerable reform in this regard. Whether this reform is genuine and vital, or merely imitative, is a question among the missionaries. But the fact seems clear.

The presence of Christianity in Japan is increasingly evident to men of all beliefs. As yet it has only a small place in the national life. This has been a distinct disappointment to the missionary leaders. Ten or fifteen years ago the rapidly changing conditions inspired some of the missionaries with the hope that Christianity would speedily become the national religion. But the first wave of Western enthusiasm passed. A reaction came, in which missionary work became very difficult. The prophecies that in ten years Japan would be a Christian nation were seen to have been premature.

Another Turn of the Tide.

Today the tide has turned again, and Christian agencies are at work with increasing promise of success. Last year representatives of the three faiths—Shinto, Buddhism and Christianity—were invited by a representative of the government to meet in the interest of a larger place for religion in the national life. This act seems to involve the clear recognition of Christianity among the religious forces of the empire.

But to a large extent Japan is a nation without any religion. All the people recognize the propriety of taking their children to the Shinto temple soon after birth. Equally do they think it wise and proper to have a Buddhist priest attend to the offices of burial. But beyond these merely formal rites, religion seems to have little or no place in their lives. Outside the worship of ancestors and of the emperor, especially after he is dead, there is little religious sentiment to be found.

Negative Literature from the West.

And at the same time a large amount of negative and destructive literature is finding its way from the West into Japan. Works of an agnostic and sceptical character, not only in reference to Christianity but to all religion, are finding ready reception among the younger men of the country, some of whom have been to America and Europe, and have become interested in the speculations which they have readily accepted and have not always understood.

Such a moment is an opportunity for Christianity, if it possesses the wisdom and courage to take advantage of it. There is no force either in Shinto or Buddhism to meet the new occasions in Japan. Confucian ethics have only a theoretical value in the lives of the people. Christianity, not as a Western creed, but as a world-faith, has the secret of Japan's moral and spiritual awakening. The nation needs leaders. It has only a few, and they are not men of the highest type. The traditions of feudalism linger in the private lives and conduct of most of those who are counsellors of the young mikado.

Only the Best Men Can Help.

If Christianity can furnish to Japan men of the highest ability, culture and character, both in the missionaries which it sends, and must send for some time to come, and in the young men it trains from the Japanese themselves, then there is promise of impressing the life of this eager and plastic nation with the ideals which are helping everywhere else to make a world-culture and a world-civilization. It is easy to see that only the best, either of foreign race or Japanese, can have influence in a land so well informed regarding the currents of thought in the West, and so sensitive as to the type of teachers at whose feet it is asked to sit. Christianity needs to give to Japan the very finest kind of leadership of which it can make contribution. And only such will the intelligent and proud Japanese be likely to honor with attention.

In a critical moment like the present, when the life of this young and ambitious nation is still malleable, it is a great thing to have part in shaping its ideals, so that they shall not exhaust themselves upon the smaller ambitions of war, commerce and pleasure, but shall take rather the curve of great and statesman-like principles, and shall include some adequate measure of humility, service and universal brotherhood.

Japanese Torii and Temple.

How Rudram Paid the Debt

An Incident of the Sepoy Mutiny

By Harriette Gunn Roberson

The sun beat hotly upon the mission compound; the coolies toiling in the tea-gardens suffered from its intensity; Rudram at work on the lawn felt its heat and though he paused occasionally to rest his eyes upon the majestic Himalayas stretching away in the distance like a bit of silvery ribbon he found there no comfort.

His heart was heavy and well it might be, since his beloved mistress, the mem-sahib, lay ill in the bungalow; that afternoon he had crept quietly near several times and heard the weak, wailing cry of the new babe, and when he had inquired about the mother the ayah Aitie had sadly shaken her head as she replied:

"She is very sick, so sick that she may die."

His master, the sahib, had been called down the river to see another missionary who was seriously ill and had not returned. For one week they had watched; two weeks, three weeks and yet no word; then came the new baby and still no tidings.

Rudram was also uneasy about their safety and well he might be, since all India had been swept by a wave of unrest, and discontent with English rule was everywhere. To all the native postmasters had been sent mysterious bundles containing a dozen circular cakes made of flour and water, and called by the Hindus chipates. Each recipient had in turn made twelve more and sent these to some one else, thus had gone forth the signal for an uprising, and slaughter of all Europeans.

It had been hoped that Assam, being a northeastern province, would escape, and to prevent the insurrection extending there, Major Holoroyd had seized the ex-rajah and taken him to Calcutta, but his efforts had only delayed the outbreak.

At this moment the reverie of Rudram was interrupted by Jimmie boy, who, escaping from the ayah, ran to him crying:

"Jimmie so lonesome. Now nobody plays with Jimmie-boy."

Ceasing from his work Rudram patted the golden ringlets upon the moist little head saying: "I must finish the task the sahib bade me do, but when through I will come and play with you."

And taking the chubby hand in his, he led the unwilling child back to the house, parting with the words, "I will soon return."

But Jimmie-boy of the usual sunny smile answered sulkily: "Jimmie lonesome. Jimmie wants something to do. Jimmie tired being a good boy."

Walking down the garden path Rudram thought he heard a door softly close, but turning and seeing no one, decided that he must have been mistaken. The work was not completed until sunset; then going to the bungalow he asked for Jimmie. The surprised look upon the face of the ayah prepared him for her reply: "Why, he ran to play with you three hours ago."

Rudram, remembering the sound of a softly closed door, shuddered —he knew not why. Turning quickly he searched the compound, but found no Jimmie; he crept along the streets, but still no Jimmie. Fear with iron hand gripped his heart. What if Jimmie, desirous to kill a tiger with his bow and arrow, had gone to the jungle as he had boasted of doing yesterday.

Terrified he made his way to the jungle which surrounded the village like a dense wall. Reaching its outskirts he began to call "Jimmie, Jimmie," but the gentle breeze swaying the leaves of the peepul and seesu trees brought no response. Then he paused, thinking he caught a low murmur of voices, and venturing farther in the dim shadows he saw gathered the head Sepoys of the garrison and heard Sudra, the leader, say:

"At twelve o'clock tonight throughout all Assam, the foreign devils are to die. Here in our village of Nowgong are only a mem-sahib and her two babas. We will first kill the woman and children, then ransack and burn the bungalow. Everything is ready."

Rudram waited to hear no more. The mem-sahib must be saved —but how; and, Oh, God! where was Jimmie-boy? Stealthily he circled the place where the meeting was being held, calling in a whisper "Jimmie, Jimmie" but still no response. Glancing up at the star-lit sky he saw the evening was growing old and realized that but a few hours remained before his beloved mem-sahib was to die.

He knew the search must be abandoned, but where was Jimmie, Jimmie of the tender heart and winsome ways. Then recalling that the sahib had said: "The dear Lord is always near; you need never fear to ask him for help," he knelt down in the jungle path and prayed:

"Oh, God of the white man: Please help me to find Jimmie-boy, and save my beloved mem-sahib. Amen."

Rising again he hurriedly followed the tiny trail as it wound through the tangled undergrowth to the village. The end was nearly reached when he caught sight of a dark object lying beside the path. Something bade him stop, and bending down he saw by the aid of the dim light—Jimmie-boy sound asleep with the tears yet upon his cheeks. Being awakened, Jimmie, still clutching his bow and arrow, began to sob:

"Jimmie sorry he runned away, but he was so lonesome and Jimmie-baba wanted to—to kill—a—a tiger" quavered the voice as the wee lad again fell asleep.

Hastening as fast as possible with Jimmie-boy in his arms Rudram made straight for the bungalow with but one thought in his mind—he must save the mem-sahib and her two babas, but how? The mission boat was gone for his master had taken it on his trip. If he should ask to borrow one of the natives they might grow suspicious and perhaps thwart his scheme of rescue. Nevertheless he decided to go down to the river bank and see if a boat could be found.

Arriving there he saw a number and quickly choosing the best one, unfastened it and rowed to the point where the compound sloped to the river. Going to the bungalow he took provisions and bedding to make the boat habitable, and now came the hardest task of all—breaking the news to his mistress.

Entering the sick room he found the ayah sorrowfully watching beside the mem-sahib; both glanced up surprised by his entrance.

"Do not be frightened," he said, "though the Sepoys have planned to kill us at midnight I have provided a way of escape. It lacks but an hour of the appointed time. Come, get your wraps at once and follow me."

"I have feared this for a long time, but I know we can trust you, Rudram. Get my clothes and the manuscript of Doctor Bronson's partly finished Assamese dictionary. Aitie, wrap up the babas well. We must start at once."

The ayah dressed her quickly, secured the precious manuscript and with Rudram on one side and Aitie upon the other, they half led and half carried her down the steep bank to the waiting boat, while Jimmie, leading his dog, Trusty, followed.

Rudram had prayed that at the time of their departure the heavens might be clouded to better conceal their movements and as they crept to the boat a great cloud overshadowed the sky. After the mem-sahib had been made comfortable he rushed back to the house and barricaded the doors and windows, thus hoping to delay the entrance of the Sepoys and the discovery of their flight. When this was done he returned to the boat, cut it loose from its moorings and they were adrift on the river.

Where should they go? Sudra had said that throughout all Assam foreigners were to be killed. The most feasible place seemed to be Gauhati, a hundred miles down the river. Here the Sepoys had English officers and there were some European residents.

All night the little boat, urged on by the steady strokes of Rudram, sped down the river. At dawn after a consultation it was decided best to pull into a bayou and hide there until darkness again veiled the land.

All day the mem-sahib tossed upon her bed, the ayah tried to soothe the cries of the babe, Jimmie played near, while Rudram sat with a rifle across his knee because that part of the jungle was infested with tigers. Indeed, once during the morning the little dog, Trusty, trudging at Jimmie's heels had bristled up and growled and then, whining piteously, ran cowering to the feet of Rudram. Glancing around Rudram had seen two fiery eye-balls glaring at him from the tangled thicket of the jungle and knew a tiger was near.

At twilight they again set forth, and all night in spite of blistered hands and aching muscles, Rudram rowed swiftly and steadily. As the sun commenced to rise they decided to hide in another bayou. Fastening the boat Rudram started to reconnoiter. Feeling a strange premonition of danger he returned to his mistress and advised journeying onward despite the daylight. Exposure and privation had begun to tell upon the nerves of this brave woman and drawing her little ones close to her she cried:

"I am afraid to go on to Gauhati. What if all the foreigners have been slain and we should fall into the hands of the cruel Sepoys. Oh, Rudram let us stay here."

"It is not safe to stay," he replied. "We must go forward." But whenever he attempted to start it so increased her fever, that Aitie advised delay.

Each moment Rudram grew more uneasy for he feared the noises around them. At last he knew these fears were to be realized as the trees at a short distance commenced to snap and crack and they saw not far away a mad elephant, which is to be dreaded as much as a tiger, descending the sandy banks of the river.

It paused, then catching sight of the small craft plunged into the water and began to swim straight for the boat. Aitie and Rudram seizing the mem-sahib and the two babas gained the shelter of a banyan tree just as the infuriated beast reached the boat and with many stamps of its huge feet demolished the frail bamboo craft. The fugitives concealed in the shadow of the tree waited breathlessly to see what would happen next; but the fury of the mad elephant seemed appeased and not discovering them it swam across the stream and disappeared in the jungle on the opposite shore.

"What shall we do now?" sobbed the mem-sahib. Aitie and Jimmie echoed her question as they looked helplessly at Rudram while the babe continued to cry piteously.

Poor Rudram, what could he do though he felt responsible for their safety? When the sahib was obliged to leave he had clasped his hand warmly saying, "I trust my wife and boy to you. I know you will be faithful even unto death."

And he had made answer, "I can never repay the debt I owe you, sahib. I will be faithful even at the cost of my life."

Gathering up driftwood Rudram built a fire to protect them from wild beasts and making the mem-sahib comfortable sat down to consider what had best be done. Suddenly an idea flashed through his mind; running swiftly to the place where the boat had been tied to the bank, he found the stout rope still dangling in the water. Securing this he looked around and saw several old logs and large branches of trees which had been broken off by the mad elephant.

Dragging these to the shore, he bound them tightly together with the rope; when the rope was all used he searched for heavy jungle grasses, and making thongs of these built a raft and insisted that they trust their lives to this rather than meet certain death from the wild animals in the jungle. Besides, the mad elephant might return.

Tenderly carrying the protesting mem-sahib to the raft they set forth. Soon the waters of the Brahmaputra rippled softly around them as Rudram, with an oar improvised from a branch of a tree, paddled steadily. He knew the mem-sahib would die if assistance were not soon obtained. The pain from his lacerated hands was intense but when about to give up what seemed a hopeless effort, a look at his mistress spurred him onward and recalled the memory of their first meeting.

He was again a lad back in his home among the hills when one of the villagers returning from a trip to the plains told of meeting a white man who taught there was but one God, and a beautiful place called heaven. Rudram greatly feared the many evil spirits his tribe worshiped and resolved to journey down to the plains, seek the white man and learn if this report were true.

So he started on the journey of a hundred miles, at night sleeping in trees because of wild animals; while nuts, roots and berries were his only food. The rocks cut his bare feet and before the goal was reached, he was compelled to crawl upon his hands and knees. Finally nearing the mission compound, he had seen a white woman sitting upon the veranda in the cool of the evening; crawling toward her he asked if she knew of a "beautiful place called heaven."

She had helped him into the bungalow, bathed his bruised feet and given him food and shelter. Returning, he became a member of the family, attended the mission school, and learned the way to the "beautiful heaven." Though but a poor hill-boy he had longed to repay the great debt of gratitude he owed his benefactors.

The long wearisome hours of the night slowly wore away and the distance lessened until there only remained one bend in the river before they could see Gauhati, and ascertain whether the English flag was still flying over the fort. Anxiously they awaited the dawn, knowing that all was lost if the Sepoys were in power. Slowly the stars of the early morning faded, a rosy flush began to glow in the eastern sky, and there were but a few more minutes of suspense before their fate should be known. When lo, upon the first breeze of morning came the soft silvery notes of an English bugle telling them that danger was past for the Sepoys were still held in check.

Although nearly exhausted Rudram rowed straight for the ghat or landing place. An officer on watch saw the queer looking craft with waving white handkerchiefs and hastened down to the shore to meet them. Upon learning the name of the sick woman he said:

"Your husband is here with us. He returned several weeks ago from a trip down the river but was seized with an attack of jungle fever; so we have kept from him all news of the uprising."

Soon the husband and wife were reunited and as the sahib heard the tale of Rudram's bravery and devotion and saw his bleeding hands, tears filled his eyes as he exclaimed:

"My boy, you have nobly kept the promise you made to care for my dear ones."

"Oh, sahib," replied Rudram, "I would gladly have laid down my life to save them from death."

Our Flight From Mexico

By Alden B. Case

There is in Mexico a little city called San Buenaventura, of four thousand population, situated in a beautiful valley fifty miles from the nearest railroad station. Our house is a mile from the plaza of the town and on the opposite bank of the river.

The house is a very large adobe building, erected about seventy-five years ago, but in an excellent state of preservation. From its size and originally well-finished appearance, it is known far and wide as "La Casa Grande."

During the revolution of Madero, strict observance was given to the orders of this leader not to molest foreigners, and our house, with the stars and stripes waving above its front entrance, was a refuge to many frightened Mexican families from the town, who came to us with their own bedding and provisions, begging that they might camp within our walls. Also when the rebels began to take wheat from our neighbors, after the harvest in June, some came asking that they might store their crop in my granary. This, of course, I permitted and for several months I had some $1,000 worth of such property in my keeping.

Largely for the purpose of greater safety, in times of Apache raids, the house had been constructed without windows. Light was admitted through the immense and solidly built doors. On our purchase of the place, however, a number of modern windows had been put in.

During the nearly two years of our revolutionary experience we had never any fear of the Mexicans in our locality. Whether federal or rebel sympathizers, all were alike friendly. But we knew that there was danger of bandits—coming from other parts.

After the defeat of Orozco last summer, his army numbering ten thousand men, broken up into bands of two hundred to five hundred, retreated hastily to our mountainous section of Chihuahua. These men were sore and ill-tempered from defeat, wearied from marching and in desperate need of provisions. Reports of robberies along the highways and at nearby ranches became more and more frequent.

One afternoon in August a boy belonging to a good friend of ours in town came hurrying on his pony to our door. "My papa says to tell you that a lot of men are on their way to sack your house. They will be here this afternoon or evening. Papa says for you to hide your valuable papers, your money and everything else that you can!"

I thanked the boy for this kindness in bringing the information and we immediately set about putting our house in order. The secreting of things in what seemed to us good places was quite exciting. However, the visitors did not appear. They indeed arrived in town—then under the control of the insurgents, but Mexican friends informed them that we were not Mormons, as they had understood, and dissuaded them from their purpose. Two weeks later a similar warning was sent me that a night attack was to be made on a number of houses in town, and that ours was to be included, so again we had the excitement of preparing for bandits, who a second time happily disappointed us.

Between 12:00 and 1:00 o'clock on the morning of November 8, I was awakened by a light tapping at our kitchen door. Supposing that some one of our Mexican servants—in their apartments about 100 feet away—might be ill, I arose, went to the door and asked who was there. The answer came softly, "Soy yo. It is I." Not recognizing the voice, I repeated my question, which brought the same reply, now in a tone sufficiently clear to assure me that a stranger was outside. "Open the door," he said.

"But I cannot open the door until you tell me your name and what you want."

The man now stepped to the adjoining window and said, "Come to the window, I want to talk a little with you."

"I can talk quite well where I am," said I. "Tell me your name and why you are here."

"Give me five hundred dollars, or I will kill you!" came the low, but decidedly menacing reply. Then another voice was heard, "Open the door, or we will throw in a bomb!"

Seeing clearly that we were in for trouble, I returned to the bedroom and proceeded to put on some necessary articles of apparel. My wife did not seem to be awake—there was no light.

I now returned to the other room and found that the robbers were at a window on the other side, and by the clear star-light I could distinguish three rifle barrels pointing in the direction where I was supposed to be advancing. Taking a position hugging the wall, I endeavored to reason with the men,—"I have almost no money at all in the house, nothing like the amount you have spoken of." But they were becoming impatient by the delay, and I offered to get a light.

Going again to the bedroom, I lighted a lamp, and saw that my wife was now awake.

"What is the matter?" she asked.

Speaking quietly, I said, "There are robbers in the house."

"How do you know they are robbers?"

I did not need to reply, for at that instant four ruffians burst into the room and covered me with their guns. This surprise and the menacing attitude of the men at my wife's bedside angered me, and in my excitement I unconsciously addressed them in English, "Get out of here instantly."

Although I was unarmed and in no way able to enforce my command, the men at once obeyed me, and I accompanied them to the room from which they had come.

The chief now ordered me to open the door at which they had at first wished to enter. I did so, and one man was stationed there to guard against assistance which might come to us from outside. Another man was placed at the foot of the bed to see that my wife did not attempt to give the alarm to our friends, or to find arms and attempt to use them. I was now inclined to agree with our callers that it would be prudent for me to find what little money we had and deliver it to them. Leading the way to the sitting-room I unlocked a drawer of my desk and drew out two bills, one of $5 and the other of $20. Pulling out my pocket-book, which contained $2 or $3 in change, I placed all at their disposal saying, "This is all the money I have." They clearly did not believe me, and refused to touch the insignificant amount; upon which I returned the bills to the drawer and the change to my pocket. I opened another drawer, which they inspected and found no cash.

The ruffian now deliberately took aim at me and pulled the trigger, once, twice, three times, but the gun did not speak, nor did I, for there was nothing to be added to the information which I had already given him. Knowing that I believed their performance only an attempt to frighten me into finding what they asked, the bandit now shouted, "But I will kill you if you do not get it at once."

"Then you will have to kill me," I replied, "for I have told you the truth, I have no more money."

So quickly as to take me completely by surprise came a terrific blow in my chest, with the butt of the gun. I should have fallen had I not caught for support at the door, near by. The pain and insult so excited me that I instinctively looked about for something with which to strike back, but soon recovered my composure. "Shall I do it again," the coward shouted, and raised his rifle menacingly. I knew that he was capable of repeating the act, and again endeavored to convince him that I was not deceiving in the matter of the money.

"Open that upper drawer," he commanded, pointing to one which had not been examined. This I willingly did, for I knew that it contained nothing which he would care for. I took out the drawer and showed him its contents. "These are old sermons, see?"

I do not know that he had been aware that I was a minister, but from that moment there was a change in their attitude. The sermons, old and dry as they were, seemed never so effective as now.

"Sir, you will please to hand out again those bills and that change from your pocket."

This I did with a feeling of no little relief. Grasping the money, he said to me, "I understand you have arms."

"I have nothing that you want," I replied, "but come and see."

We returned to the bedroom, where I found a little 22 caliber rifle, used for rabbit hunting. This I handed him. He examined it a moment and returned it to me.

"Where are your pistols?" he asked, inspecting my hip.

"I have none," I answered, "I never carry one."

During all this time my poor wife had been observing, as best she could from her bed, the proceedings. She was more troubled than I, for she feared that at any moment my life might be taken, or if not, that they would carry me away to hold for ransom, as had already been done in the case of many men of our vicinity. As I reappeared in the room with the robbers, she feared that they were now about to take me and began to cry, saying, "Alden, do not leave me." At this the chief, rasing his hand to her, said—not unkindly—"Lady do not cry." He then called his men together and took leave of us, saying as they departed, "Tell the major (the federal commander in town) to look for us at San Lorenzo."

We learned the next morning that these men were part of a larger band which had passed in the night.

For some weeks previous to this experience, conditions had become so serious that Mrs. Case and I had decided it would be prudent for us to go to the states, as had gone already nearly all Americans of our region. Our preparations were now quietly hastened and on Dec. 1 we arrived in El Paso under the protection of the stars and strips.

MODERN WOMANHOOD

Conducted by Mrs. Ida Withers Harrison.

Mrs. Harrison will be glad to receive communications from any of her readers offering suggestions concerning woman's welfare, criticisms of articles or inquiries concerning any matters relevant to her department. She should be addressed directly at 530 Elm Tree Lane, Lexington, Ky.

The Vote Versus the Veil

Mrs. Israel Zangwill, in a recent address, drew a striking equal rights moral from the Balkan War. The Turks outnumbered their adversaries. Why have the Turks been defeated all along the line? Mrs. Zangwill says:

"The explanation is simple. Every Turkish soldier is a single unit. For in Turkey the old-fashioned method of calculation still holds good. Man and wife are one—or, as it is Turkey, we must say, man and two or three wives are one. In the Balkan States man and wife may not yet be two, as they would be in a fully civilized country, but at least they are one and a considerable fraction. Thus, on a division, each married man—each much-married man—in the Turkish army counts only as one. But each married man in the Balkan army counts more or less as two. A Balkan State is in itself a dual alliance. Turkey has not been fighting against four allies but against eight.

"That this is not a fantastical explanation is shown by the actual part played by the Balkan women in this war. In their native towns and villages the women are doing most of the work that is usually performed by men. They are keeping things going while the men are at the front. Every soldier knows the importance of the base in war. The real base of the Balkan armies is formed by the Balkan women at home. Again, the Balkan women are actually employed in carrying provisions and ammunition for the forces. Among the Servians, women form the only Army Service Corps. Women are doing the cooking, the sewing, the washing for the soldiers; women are nursing the wounded; women are dying in the fighting line. And practically all this extra strength and service is on one side only, the side of the allies. What wonder that the Turks have been defeated!

"And so I feel that this war is not, as it has been called, a triumph of Christianity over Mohammedanism. It is rather a triumph of the Christian position of women over the Mohammedan position of woman. It is not a war of the Cross against the Crescent, but of the Vote against the Veil, or rather the forces that make for the vote against the forces that have fixed the veil. It is the victory of the freewomen, or the semi-freewomen of the Balkan States over Turkey's harem slaves."

Mrs. Zangwill tells how she was once on board a steamer that touched at a Moroccan port, and saw a gorgeous Mohammedan magnate come on board, accompanied by a huge packing case. She wondered what sort of baggage or goods he had in it. Later she found it contained his two wives! After drawing a comparison with pungent pen between the Turk and those white men who still want to seclude women behind a veil of disfranchisement, Mrs. Zangwill said in conclusion:

"It is this rending of the veil that we suffragists are busied at today. The work is accompanied by noise and violence. There is a lamentable sound of tearing and shattering. That is unavoidable. But gradually out of the dust and passion a new woman is arising. The 'feme covert' is throwing aside her veil; she is coming out into the light of day. And the Turk is being driven back, back into the past ages, where he belongs. He is an outworn type. He must be scrapped in the upward development of humanity. Yes, the Turk has got to go, bag and baggage. For his baggage contains not mere goods or merchandise; it contains a crushed and degraded womanhood."

Every married couple ought to be a dual alliance; and it is self-evident that the alliance can do more when both parties to it are strong than when one is a weakling.

All great redemptions are akin; and the deliverance of the lands over which Turkish rule has been a nightmare for centuries should be a source of cheer to all the friends of equal rights, and especially to the friends of equal rights for women. For it has been the women upon whom that shadow rested darkest and heaviest.

All Lands Will Be Represented

Delegates from Every Civilized Part of Globe Will Meet in Budapest Conference.

On June 15, 1913, the Seventh Conference of the International Woman Suffrage Alliance will convene in Budapest, Hungary, continuing five days thereafter.

The affiliated National Woman Suffrage Associations of the following twenty-three countries will each be entitled to twelve delegates: Austria, Australia, Belgium, Bohemia, Bulgaria, Canada, Denmark, Finland, France, Germany, Great Britain, Hungary, Iceland, Italy, Netherlands, Norway, Portugal, Russia, Servia, South Africa, Sweden, Switzerland and the United States. Applications for affiliation with the Alliance will be received from National Suffrage Associations in Poland, Roumania, Galicia and China.

All countries where women now vote, including American States, will be invited to send official delegates to the Congress. Many National Associations, of various countries, in sympathy with the woman suffrage movement, will be represented by fraternal delegates to the Congress. Many National Associations, of various countries, in sympathy with the woman suffrage movement, will be represented by fraternal delegates.

Especially invited delegates are expected from Egypt, India, Burmah, China, Japan and the Philippines. For the first time in the woman movement, it is expected that Hindu, Buddhist, Confucian, Mohammedan, Jewish and Christian women will sit together in a Congress, uniting their voices in a common plea for the liberation of their sex from those artificial discriminations which every political and religious system has directed against them.

The rapid strides taken by the woman suffrage movement within the past few years have placed it in the lead of the great reforms of the world. So rapidly has the theory of woman suffrage been transformed into established fact that at each of the previous six International Conferences there have been victories to celebrate. The gain of four American States since the last Congress, and as significant triumphs of the cause in several European countries, will furnish subject for further repoicing at Budapest.

Verily, Justice has listened to the plea of women, and is touching the intelligence of the world with understanding! The Congress at Budapest, linking together the chain of organizations which now encircle the earth, will be a milestone in the progress of the woman movement, pointing to the certain emancipation of the women of the entire world.

Carrie Chapman Catt, U. S. A., president.

Millicent Garrett Fawcett, Great Britain, first vice-president.

Annie Furuhjelm, Finland, second vice-president.

Martina Kramers, The Netherlands, secretary.

Anna Lindemann, Germany, secretary.

Signe Bergman, Sweden, secretary.

Adela Stanton Coit, Great Britain, treasurer.

Moonset and Sunrise

By William Watson.

The forts of midnight fall at last;
The ancient, baleful powers
Yield up, with countenance aghast,
Their dragon-guarded towers.
Henceforth, their might as dust being trod,
'Tis easier to believe in God.

Where were the great ones of the earth,
Kaiser and Czar and King?
Small thanks to them, for this glad birth
Whereat the daystars sing!
The little lands, with hearts of flame,
Have put the mighty thrones to shame.

Three lustrums have in turmoil sped
Since Greece, unfriended, hurled
Her javelin at the python's head,
Before a languid world,
While the great Kings, in far-off tones,
Mumbled upon their frozen thrones.

She dared too much, or dared too soon,
And broke in disarray,
Where, underneath his crescent moon,
The coiled Corruption lay.
Heartened anew, the scaly thing
Returned unto his ravening.

Pity for others had he none;
In storms of blood and fire
He slew the daughter with the son,
The mother with the sire;
And oft, where Earth had felt his tread,
The quick were envious of the dead.

But since his fierceness and his strength,
His faded pomps august,
His courage and his guile, at length
Sink into night and dust,
For him, too, let Compassion plead,
Ev'n as for all of Adam's seed.

For now the hour of dreams is past;
The gibbering ghosts depart;
And Man is unashamed at last
To have a human heart.
And lo, the doors of dawn ajar,
And in the East again a Star!

Loveless and cold was Europe's sin,
Loveless the path she chose,
And self-upbraidings deep within
She strangled as they rose;
But that dark trespass of our own
Forbids that we should cast a stone.

Enough, if hands that heretofore
Labored to bar His road,
Delay henceforward nevermore
The charioteers of God,
Who halt and slumber, but anon,
With burning wheels, drive thundering on.

Church Life

Dr. Haley's Foresight Recalled.

In a memorial resolution passed by the Board of Trustees of the Bible College of Missouri upon the recent death of T. P. Haley, of Kansas City, one of that institution's trustees, it is recalled that Dr. Haley and J. H. Garrison had been for ten years on a committee appointed by ten successive annual conventions of the Disciples in Missouri with instructions to found a university when they could find $250,000 with which to endow it! Failing in this they asked their brethren of the state to endow the Bible College at the seat of the state university, giving its students thus all the advantages of the millions which the commonwealth had lavished upon buildings, equipment and faculty. Dr. Haley had been, through the ten years of his committee service, an ardent advocate of the Bible college idea, but patiently waited until the impracticability of the church university idea should be made manifest. "In T. P. Haley," says the resolution, "the Bible College of Missouri has lost a tried and true friend, one of dignified mold and noble bearing, one in whom was the spirit, insight, and capacity of a statesman."

Affectionate Pastoral Relation Severed.

"Never a citizen, whether minister, other professional man or plain civilian left Danville more honored or more genuinely mourned in his departure," are the words with which a local newspaper commences a long appreciation of William E. Adams and his four years' service at First Church, Danville, Ill. Mr. Adams left last week for Seattle, Wash., where he assumes the pastorate of Queen Ann Church. He leaves his church in the midst of an evangelistic meeting led by F. B. Thomas, in which there have been already over fifty accessions. Mr. Thomas will remain with the church through the summer as stated supply. During Mr. Adams' pastorate 266 persons were received into the church, 116 of whom were by profession of faith, "but they move so rapidly here," says the retiring pastor, "that the loss is about equal to the gain." The missionary offerings have been doubled within the period and the congregation expects soon to become a "living link" in the Foreign Society. And what more discriminating word of appreciation could a minister wish than this paragraph of a "resolution" passed by the board of elders: "He has been a faithful pastor, keeping careful trace of every family in the church. His family has been a credit to him and helpful in the work. His business plans are sane, his missionary spirit intense, his preaching highly instructive and moving, his teaching unusually spiritual, his knowledge of our plea accurate, his loyalty to Christ absolute."

Lauds Slain President.

A sermon prelude by Perry J. Rice in First Church, El Paso, Tex., on the murder of Madero brought the preacher many messages of commendation not alone from those who heard it but from citizens who read it in the paper next morning. Mr. Rice believes that Huerta and Blanquet played the part of Judas and Benedict Arnold to their president, and that they were tools of the old military dictatorship that kept the Mexican people in a state of poverty and peonage. "As for Madero his humanitarian sympathies made it impossible for him to be a dashing and daring warrior. He could not be an implacable enemy even against those who fought him. He believed in his fellow men too profoundly to think that they could not be persuaded to a right and just course of action, and so he pleaded with them and offered them every consideration rather than wage war against them. His lack of political experience made it impossible for him to deal with the difficult and delicate questions which confronted him immediately upon his accession to office.

"But he was, nevertheless, a strong man. He dared when no other man dared to hurl himself against the old regime that everybody knows needed to be overthrown. For nearly two years he has stood like a true patriot and a brave man for the principles of freedom and democracy for which he fought. Repeatedly he said 'I am not afraid to die, but I refuse to resign.' He knew full well the nature of the forces which were seeking to overthrow him and demanding his resignation. History is sure to record the fact that during all this time he stood unflinchingly for constitutional government, for the freedom of the people, for the rights of the masses of enslaved and ignorant Mexicans."

Mr. Rice offered the Christian Church as a place of meeting for a proposed mass meeting of El Paso citizens called to express indignation at the murder of Madero.

Pastor Coming to Believe in the Church!

"We are on something of a high tide in Central Church this year and seemingly getting somewhere," modestly writes Allan B. Philputt, Indianapolis pastor, and specifies two facts: that many accessions are being received to the church membership and that the spirit of the congregation is strongly inclined toward practical Christian work. This church formally opened their reconstructed and redecorated church edifice Sunday, February 2. It was a great day, with large audiences and a Sunday-school of 725. The addition of an extension, 20x65 feet, to the Sunday-school wing, the making of the whole two story with large basement fitted up for use, gives double the capacity they had before and provides for a Sunday-school of one thousand. Arrangements have been made for an up-to-date graded school with all departments separated. A superintendent's office has been provided. A new cement tile-lined baptistry has been put in the auditorium at an expense of over $400. The pastor's study has been refurnished, with roll-topped desk, chairs and Globe-Werneke book cases added. A fine steam heating plant has been installed. The cost of the whole is between fifteen and twenty thousand dollars. Many ministers and Sunday-school men have visited the church and pronounced it one of the most attractive and best arranged to be found anywhere. No wonder the genial pastor writes that he is "almost coming to believe in the church as a useful institution for meeting the many problems incident to a growing democracy!"

Michigan Sunday Schools Benefitted.

Twenty-nine Sunday-schools sent seventy-two representatives to the School of Methods held in Ionia, Mich., Feb. 17 to 21. The school was conducted by Robert M. Hopkins under the auspices of the Sunday-school department of the American Christian Missionary Society. Thirty-eight persons fulfilled the requirements for graduation and received international certificates. One student who realized beforehand what value the course would be to him, walked fifty miles over winter roads to secure the week's instruction. Members of the faculty were V. Hays Miller, Sault Ste. Marie, state superintendent and dean of the school; Garry L. Cook, of Indiana; Marion Stevenson, of St. Louis; Prof. G. P. Coler, of Ann Arbor; Robert M. Hopkins and Miss Hazel A. Lewis, of the American Society. Garry L. Cook discussed organization and religious pedagogy. His ready handling of these themes revealed the secret of his success as state secretary for Indiana. Marion Stevenson lectured daily on the books of the Pentateuch, sketching the background of each book and setting forth the outstanding thought. He addressed himself also to various phases of the grading task. Professor Coler was present during two days to lecture on the New Testament and the home. Robert M. Hopkins helped to bring the school to its climax by his lectures and conferences. The last night he roused the students by an address on "The New Crusade," that of our evangelism. He asked Michigan Disciples to bring 2,500 souls into the church in five years through their Sunday-schools. Miss Mabel Lewis visited Kalamazoo after the school had adjourned. Royal L. Handley, the pastor there, writes thus of her visit: "She brought to us a tremendous lift for this year. As in her Ionia lectures, she was enthusiastic, intelligent and practical. She set the lights for our further progress. She showed us how to help ourselves to better things. She cleared the way and thrust us forth along the path of efficient Sunday-school effort. Her visit will mean help in our graded work during all the year."

Church and State United.

It was something courageous—some one said "nervy"—in these days of Roman Catholic dominance in Illinois politics, for First Church, Springfield, Ill., to plan a reception to the state officers and legislators to be held in the parlors of the new church edifice, but that is what they did, and Gov. Dunne, Lieut. Gov. O'Hara and a goodly number of senators and representatives accepted their invitations. The evening was divided into two parts, one devoted to an organ recital and the other to social fellowship. The superb organ of First Church is being used for the delight of the community in many ways beside the services of worship. On being shown through the church house Gov. Dunne remarked to the pastor, F. W. Burnham, that if he could find a congregation that would build him a house so fine as this, and with such an organ too, he would like to be a minister himself.

Two Practical Church Measures.

Central Church, Des Moines, Iowa, Finis Idleman, pastor, is conducting a church attendance campaign in an endeavor to "fix the habit" of going to church. The special effort includes the seven Sundays preceding Easter. Each member of the church is furnished with a card in the form of a ballot on which he may check himself up for the four stated services of the week. This card is to be kept by each individual member as a souvenir of the campaign. This church on a recent Sunday authorized the official board to apportion the membership for church current expenses on the basis of 2 per cent of the entire income of each member. The principle of giving one-tenth to the Lord was recognized, but the 2 per cent plan for the local church leaves to the individual the distribution of the remaining 8 per cent to other causes of benevolence and missions as he may elect. It is argued that the plan adopted will provide a definite and substantial basis of financial operation. It is fair and just to all. The rich bear their equal proportion with the poor and all have the same honor before the church. If one loses his position and the salary stops, his giving necessarily stops with it, and this will relieve many a burdened life which feels the obligation of a continuous pledge when the income has been shut off.

A Challenge from the Niagara Frontier.

Geroge B. Evans, pastor Central Church, North Tonawanda, N. Y., has been doing some figuring which sets the churches of the Niagara frontier in a most creditable light. He selected the six "living link" churches of that region and found the following facts:

Richmond Avenue Church of Buffalo, R. H. Miller, pastor, with a membership of 458, contributed to missions and to benevolences a total of $1,671.69; Jefferson Street Church of Buffalo, B. S. Ferrall, pastor, with a roll of 799, contributed $1,155.18; Forest Avenue Church of Buffalo, A. E. Sebastian, pastor, with a roll of 295, gave $849.01; Payne Avenue Church of North Tonawanda, V. W. Blair, pastor, with 361 members, contributed $902.55; Central Church of the same city of which Mr. Evans is pastor, with a roll of 300, gave $811.46; Niagara Falls Church, W. C. Brewitt, pastor, with 390 members, contributed $1,123.44.

These six churches, with a total membership of 2,603 are credited in the 1913 Year Book with a total contribution to benevolent and missionary enterprises of $6,513.33, or an average per member of two dollars and a half. Out of thirteen churches in Greater Buffalo six are "living links." Their closest rival is Kansas City, the metropolis of the banner Disciple state; with twenty-seven churches it has five "living links," if Independence and Liberty are included. Then come cities that have three "living links:" Cincinnati with twenty-four churches, Chicago with twenty-one churches, Cleveland with fourteen churches and Louisville with eleven churches. The larger cities that have two "living links" each are Pittsburgh, with twenty-six churches, St. Louis with eighteen churches, Indianapolis with seventeen churches, Des Moines with twelve churches and Baltimore with eight churches.

Why should there be so many more "living link" churches on the Niagara frontier than elsewhere? asks Mr. Evans. Disciples are not stronger nor richer there, but quite the contrary. He does not answer the question but believes there is a moral challenge in it to the churches of the rest of the nation.

Another Building Achievement in Chicago.

Englewood Church, Chicago, dedicated its new Sunday-school annex and gymnasium last Sunday. The total cost of the improvements was $26,000. Ten thousand dollars remained to be raised before the dedicatory exercise. George L. Snively was in charge of the money raising and before the benediction was pronounced $12,000 had been pledged by the congregation. A visitor present at the service could not but be impressed with the large proportion of young men in the congregation. Englewood church is one of the great churches of Chicago. In the more than twelve years of Pastor C. G. Kindred's ministry there he has built a wonderful superstructure upon the substantial foundation laid by his predecessors of whom N. S. Haynes was the most notable. Beside the church auditorium the plant now consists of the new Sunday-school apartments, a large banquet hall, a well equipped gymnasium and a large dwelling adjoining the church which is used as a parish house. A fellowship service was held in the afternoon attended by neighborhood pastors and Disciple pastors from various parts of the city. In the evening Mr. Snively preached on "The Immortality of the Soul."

Dr. Medbury at the Sunday Evening Club.

"Chicago'll get him yet, if Des Moines doesn't watch out," is the way an old time parishioner of Charles S. Medbury's, now residing in Chicago, spoke on his way out of Orchestra Hall last Sunday night. Dr. Medbury had just finished preaching the gospel—the last three words are selected carefully—to a great audience that packed the hall in which the Theodore Thomas Orchestra plays twice every week. It was the regular service of the Sunday Evening Club held every Sunday evening, in the heart of Chicago "for Christian inspiration and fellowship."

Mr. Clifford W. Barnes, the founder of it, has enlisted the city's leading business men in its support. No expense is spared to provide the best. Its music is the finest heard in Chicago. A new speaker occupies the platform each week. Men like Henry van Dyke, W. J. Bryan, Russell H. Conwell, Herbert L. Willett, are typical of the speakers selected by Mr. Barnes. Often hundreds are turned away after the great building has been filled. This overflow was prevented last Sunday night only by the bitter cold. But every seat was taken. And every auditor listened eagerly to the clarion challenge of Christ to men of today. Christ is able to meet modern conditions, said Dr. Medbury. There is nothing essentially new in modern civilization. The Master faced it all when he "flung his disciples against the civilization of the long ago." The sophistication of Greece, the materialism of Corinth, the sense of power of Rome, the acceptance of sensuality everywhere as a matter of course, all justified St. John in locating the very seat of Satan at one of the contemporaneous cities to whose local church he wrote. Dr. Medbury pleaded for strong men, successful men, to recognize the infinite greatness of the task to which Christ called, the task of building the souls of men into the temple of the living God. The sermon was profoundly religious, wonderfully searching, and produced in all who heard it a sense of moral chastening. No better message has been spoken on that platform. When a representative of The Christian Century spoke to Mr. Barnes afterward saying, "We Disciples appreciate your having our men here occasionally," he replied, "Well, I mean to have Dr. Medbury back again." There are many Disciples in Chicago who believe that Dr. Medbury ought to live in this great city, and if these visits, so frequent of late, continue, it need not surprise any one if on one of them the Des Moines pastor is kept here for good.

The Board of Ministerial relief intends to adopt a sort of "living link" plan by providing a way for an individual contributor to pension some particular veteran minister or minister's widow, but without disclosing the name of the pensioner to anyone save the donor or allowing the pensioner himself to know from whom his payments come. According to the varying circumstances of the veterans, pensions will range from $100 to $300. An individual providing any sum above $100 may therefore be assigned the support of some specific person or persons and thus given the satisfaction of doing a definite work. But the Board does not have a name for this new relationship. Obviously "living link" is not appropriate. The first person proposing the term that is finally chosen by the Board, will be given a "token of appreciation that will be cherished as an heirloom."

Consolidation of the Congregational and Christian churches of Toppenish, Wash., under one pastor and one set of officers, though maintaining distinct bodies of membership, has been effected at a meeting of the two congregations. J. A. Lingenfelter of North Yakima, who has been acting as pastor for the Christian church, has been given a call by the joint congregations. The Congregational pastor has accepted a call elsewhere, having encouraged the union idea. Under the plan that has been adopted the title to the church and church property will be left with the Disciples Church, the building fund of the Congregational church will be turned into the joint treasury and a mortgage taken on the building.

Historic First Church, Warren, O., is facing the prospect of a new home of worship. Twelve stirring reasons are given in rapid fire on the front page of the parish paper, one of which is: "Because we have altered, changed, enlarged, improved, ennobled and beautified our private homes, again and again,

The Master of My Boat

By Joseph Addison Richards.

I owned a little boat a while ago
And sailed a morning sea without a fear,
And whither any breeze might fairly blow
I'd steer the little craft afar or near.
Mine was the boat,
And mine the air,
And mine the sea,
Not mine a care.

My boat became my place of nightly toil,
I sailed at sunset to the fishing ground;
At morn the boat was freighted with the spoil
That my all-conquering work and skill had found.
Mine was the boat,
And mine the net,
And mine the skill
And power to get.

One day there passed along the silent shore,
While I my net was casting in the sea,
A man, who spake as never man before;
I followed Him—new life began in me,
Mine was the boat,
But His the voice,
And His the call,
Yet mine the choice.

Ah, 'twas a fearful night out on the lake,
And all my skill availed not at the helm,
Till Him asleep I waken, crying, "Take,
Take Thou command, lest waters overwhelm!"
His was the boat,
And His the sea,
And His the peace
O'er all and me.

Once from His boat he taught the curious throng,
Then bade me let down nets out in the sea;
I murmured, but obeyed, nor was it long
Before the catch amazed and humbled me.
His was the boat
And His the skill,
And His the catch,
And His my will.

in the last thirty years, but the Lord's house where we worship remains as it was in the days of our fathers." E. A. Hibbler, pastor for but a few months, has already wakened this substantial old congregation to its present great opportunities for serving the community.

"Day by Day with Jesus," a book for Holy Week, advertised in another column, deserves to be called special attention to at this season. Ministers who are preparing for Easter services, and for meetings in the week intervening between Palm Sunday and Easter will find this a very valuable book. It is really an Easter encyclopedia, and will be worth its price to any minister or Bible student every year that it is used. Doctor Barton's eminent place in the Congregational denomination and his equally eminent place in the minds of Christian Century readers to whom his messages often come, give this book an especial interest.

Robert Graham Frank, pastor at Liberty, Mo., was recently offered the position of Chancellor of Phillips University at Enid, Okla., but declined the offer. Mr. Frank frankly told his Liberty people that he felt he "had no aptitude for such work." His friends who know his versatility do not accept this, but they are glad he will remain in the pastorate. Mr. Frank is now holding an evangelistic meeting at Paris, Mo., where Frank W. Allen is pastor.

The total receipts for the work of Euclid Avenue Church, Cleveland, Ohio, last year, were over $18,000, of which amount $4,175 was given for missions and benevolences. This church received eighty-eight accessions during the year, twenty-five on confession of faith, and now has a resident membership of 744 and an average Sunday-school attendance of 365. J. H. Goldner's ministry grows richer and more substantial there each year.

The Chicago Union of the C. W. B. M., meets this week, Thursday, at Englewood Church, at 10:30 a. m. Dr. Jennie Crozier of India speaks in the afternoon on "The Call of the East" and Dr. F. E. Lumley of the College of Missions, Indianapolis, also speaks. In the evening Doctor Lumley will speak again. A chicken pie dinner is served at 6:30.

Homer E. Sala, recently doing field work for the American Missionary Society has organized a Sunday-school evangelistic company consisting besides himself of Mrs. Sala, William Leigh and Miss Elizabeth Bailey, to hold meetings in which evangelism and Sunday-school efficiency will be combined. Mr. Sala will leave shortly for a tour in the Orient, taking up his new work after Sept. 1.

J. H. Craig was given a reception by a churchful of his people on the occasion of his completion of nine years of pastoral service at Logansport, Ind., and his departure for Troy, N. Y., where he has assumed the pastorship of River Street Church. A fine purse was presented to him and Mrs. Craig.

Maryville, Mo., church which now supports Dr. C. C. Drummond at Harda, India, is making plans through its Woman's Society to connect with the mission field by yet another "living link." Claude J. Miller is pastor at Maryville.

The tenderest sympathy of a multitude of friends will be extended to Prof. and Mrs. R. E. Hieronymus of Eureka, Ill., in the death of their twelve year old daughter, Grace, which occurred February 12.

Edgar DeWitt Jones, of Bloomington, preached at Hoopeston, Ill., on a recent Thursday evening on "The Inner Circle." The sermon was preceded by a basket dinner at the church.

J. J. Ferry, of Decatur, Mich., and James A. Brown, of Hartford, Mich., held a fine missionary rally at Kalamazoo last week, so reports R. L. Handley, the pastor.

In a two weeks' meeting at Columbiaville, Mich., S. O. Landis organized a church of more than fifty members and raised funds for the erection of a church house.

Mason City, Ill., church observed its golden anniversary last week with a week of special services. C. H. Hands is the pastor. A new house of worship to cost $10,000 is in process of construction.

A new church edifice costing $14,000 was dedicated at Madison, Mo., February 16. A. N. Lindsay of Clinton, Mo., led in the raising of $4,700 to complete the payment for the building.

First Church, Louisville, and Dr. E. L. Powell, its pastor, are uniting with Warren Memorial Presbyterian Church in a union revival meeting. The pastors will divide the preaching.

Foreign Missions

The hospital at Luchowfu, China, Dr. James Butchart in charge is in need of four small detached cottages, two for husband and wife and two for tubercular patients, one for men and one for women. They will cost about $300 each and will be of great assistance in the work. This splendid hospital was built in 1902.

Last week a friend in Indiana sent the Foreign Society $1,000 on the Annuity Plan.

Doctor Drummond writes that the new hospital at Harda, India, will be completed by the end of March. This is good news.

Dr. G. E. Miller, the splendid missionary of the Foreign Society at Mungeli, India, starts on his return trip home for his regular furlough from Calcutta April 3. He will spend seven to ten days in London. He says he is anxious to get home though he has had a pleasant and profitable year and has enjoyed good health.

Reports continue to come from Africa to the office of the Foreign Society announcing large numbers of baptisms and an increase in the contributions from the native churches.

The Foreign Society has sent out about 10,000 volumes of missionary books since the beginning of the current missionary year, October 1.

The Livingstone Centenary is arousing the greatest interest in the churches and Sunday-schools. About 3,000 schools will unveil the portrait of David Livingstone and give a brief program on his life Sunday, March 16. A large number of pastors are planning to preach a Livingstone sermon on that date. The Personal Life of David Livingstone by Blaikie is being placed in many homes. The Endeavor Societies and groups of young people by the scores are taking courses in Africa and Livingstone Mission Study. This is the greatest united missionary educational campaign ever planned.

The printing press at Jubbulpore, India, is being rapidly rebuilt. It was recently burned in an unfortunate fire. This is a very important plant and does a great work in printing Christian literature for Hindi speaking people. STEPHEN J. COREY, Sec.

Ten Big Reasons Why

BETHANY GRADED LESSONS are being adopted by so many of the best schools among Disciples

1. There is more to them—at least a third more—than is contained in any other series.
2. They are rich, vital and full of suggestion to teacher and pupil.
3. They are free from the sectarian spirit.
4. They are soundly and fervently evangelical.
5. They are truly artistic in all their illustrations.
6. They are printed on better paper with better binding and in better taste than any other series.
7. Every lesson writer is an expert of interdenominational reputation.
8. They are a monument to the modern spirit of unity—a dozen leading denominations have co-operated to produce them and are now using them.
9. The Disciples possess full editorial rights, through the editor, Charles Clayton Morrison.
10. Every Disciple school that uses them participates in and promotes a great Christian union enterprise.

EVERY QUARTER ADDS TO THE NUMBER OF SCHOOLS INTRODUCING THESE LESSONS.

Disciples Publication Society

THE DISCIPLES PUBLICATION SOCIETY is a corporation chartered under the laws of Illinois. It is organized for the purpose of publishing books, Sunday School literature and a weekly religious newspaper. It has no capital stock. Its profits are not to go to individuals but to be appropriated to advance the cause of religious education, especially the higher education of the Christian ministry. The term "religious education" is regarded as an ideal common to Sunday Schools, missionary societies, colleges, seminaries and universities, and other organizations that promote Christian progress through Christian education. The Society through its trustees has purchased the entire assets and good will of the New Christian Century Company (including the subscription list and good will of The Christian Century; a contract of participation in the interdenominational syndicate for publishing the Bethany Graded Lessons; a contract of membership in the United Religious Press; all books, Sunday School supplies and other stock on hand; all accounts and bills receivable; besides assuming liability for all accounts and bills payable), for $16,000 and has executed its notes to that amount which have been accepted by the stock-holders of the New Christian Century Company in payment for their property. To provide capital for enlarging the business the trustees are issuing 5 per cent bonds in the amount of $50,000, retirable after five years, to be sold to persons interested in the ideals of The Christian Century. It is believed at the present time that not more than $25,000 of these bonds need be sold in order to put the Society on a sound profit earning basis. Subscriptions for the purchase of these bonds are now being solicited by C. C. Morrison and H. L. Willett, editors of The Christian Century. During Dr. Willett's absence in the Orient correspondence may be addressed exclusively to Mr. Morrison. Full information as to all details will be given upon inquiry. The essential purpose of the transaction and proposals herein described is to provide a way for the general brotherhood of the Disciples of Christ to buy The Christian Century and its publishing house and to pay for them by patronizing them. The bonds and notes are to be retired out of the profits earned by the Society. The purchasers of bonds, therefore, will stand, with the holders of notes, in the position of sustainers or supporters of the enterprise while the brotherhood's patronage is paying for it and increasing its value. The question of defining the membership of the Disciples Publication Society is still open, and upon it the organizers will be glad to receive suggestions. It is the purpose to make it thoroughly democratic and representative. The five trustees named by the charter will act for the Society until the basis of membership has been determined and the members elected.

Deeds and Views of Noted Men

—William T. Stead, British reformer and author during the great World's Fair year of a most sensational book, "If Christ Should Come To Chicago" went down to death on the Titanic, but it is the intention of his British fellow-countrymen that his memory be perpetuated by hotels for poor working women. Dowager Queen Alexandra has donated $500 toward the project and a public appeal for funds is to be issued. The first institution of the kind will be built in London. The purpose of the movement is to meet the needs of women seeking employment in the large towns. The number of such women is rapidly increasing and those in charge of the labor exchanges report that often they do not know of suitable lodgings for women for whom work is waiting. It is hoped to erect a Stead home in every big town in Great Britain. A most worthy project.

—There is less graft, there is less scandal, police protection is better and nature appears more beautiful in Washington than in any city in this country, President Taft declared in his farewell speech to the business and professional men of the capital. "I have been here for the last nine years continuously," said the President. "I believe I have been in such positions as to know if graft or undue gain at the expense of the public were rife or had any substantial existence. I do not mean to say that every man in Washington in business or in banking is as pure and as disinterested as a saint, but I do mean to say that, as cities go, there is no city in the country where there is less graft, where there is less food for scandal, where there is less manipulation, or the private exploitation of individuals at the expense of the public, than in Washington. I don't know of any better policed city than the city of Washington; I don't know any city where the Sunday laws and the liquor laws are better observed than they are here."

—The treasury department's committee on efficiency and economy reported to Franklin MacVeagh that he had saved $8,000,000 for the government during his four year term as secretary of the treasury. The committee in a detailed report of the reforms instituted said: "The report shows the present annual rate of saving to be nearly $3,500,000 and the aggregate saving during your term to be nearly $8,000,000." Mr. MacVeagh prefers the bright lights of the National capitol even as a private citizen and will not return for a time to Chicago's twenty-first ward, where Mr. Taft got so many of his cabinet officers.

—Vice-president Marshall has grown tired of basking in the limelight already. His office was besieged by hundreds of visitors on the day after his inauguration, which put the head of the senate in a mood for retirement. "I don't see that this room differs much from a monkey cage," said the vice-president during a lull in the constant reception, "except that the visitors do not offer me any peanuts." The vice-president managed to maintain his dignity throughout the day, but he confided to friends that he was determined to get a "retiring room," where he could drop his official pose and enjoy a little privacy.

—Prof. Henri Bergson, who, although a Jew, is not a business man but the foremost living philosopher, who has just returned to France after lecturing in this country, does not agree with Dr. Eliot in regard to the "melting pot" theory of American immigration. "I do not believe in permanent special qualities and characteristics of races," he said to a New York Sun reporter. "There are no racial differences, only educational differences. The more elements constitute the population of America the more privileged America will be, the richer and the stronger."

—Pacific Theological Seminary, sharing with Yale, Oberlin and Andover in the movement for larger equipment, has recently, through the efforts of President C. S. Nash and members of the board of trustees, secured an increase in its endowment aggregating $100,000. Plans are forming for enlarged instruction in religious education, Christian sociology and the history and philosophy of religion. The seminary has become undenominational.

—Dr. Charles R. Henderson, the noted Sociologist of the University of Chicago, has arrived in Japan from China. Dr. Henderson was given a banquet by the local University of Chicago club. He will deliver addresses at the Imperial, Kelo and Waseda universities and will also speak before a number of learned societies. In addition to all this he is expected to appear in Japanese, Chinese and Korean Young Men's Christian Associations and churches.

—Impatient to get to his golf sticks, Mr. Taft, who is now an ex-President of the United States, arrived at Augusta, Ga., March 5. He was received by the entire city which stood in one spot—that nearest the depot, when Mr. Taft arrived. One thousand school children, each waving an American flag and cheering, 150 Richmond academy cadets, the mayor and members of the city council extended personal greetings.

—And the next day the new president discovered that he had relatives like the hosts of Xerxes army. They began coming before inauguration day and by noon the "day after" there were more than forty of them at the table for luncheon. Miss Margaret Wilson made her first tour of the historic home of Presidents accompanied by fifteen first cousins. The second cousins were not counted.

—Among the "also rans" at the great inauguration ceremonies in Washington last week was Gen. Castro, who holds Venezuela in the hollow of his hand no longer. The fiery little South American might be able to lend his assistance in straightening out the dreadful tangle in Mexico. He has had plenty of the strenuous in his somewhat eventful career.

—William Loeb, Jr., who made quite a reputation for himself as secretary to President Roosevelt, has resigned as collector of the port of New York. A position as managing director of the Guggenheim companies, with a few of which he is associated already as director, has been created for him.

—Uncle "Joe Cannon," who abiding by the decision of last November has gotten out of the habit of going to Washington, recently sold a farm. It was a 400-acre plot near the ex-speaker's home at Danville, Ill., and brought $100,000. The land cost Cannon $25.00 an acre in 1880.

The Easter Message

"Why seek ye the living among the dead? He is not here, but is risen."

Nature herself proclaims the Easter message. The whole earth, risen from the dead, testifies to the truth of the resurrection. Every song-bird, brought back from the South-land by the soft breezes of spring, sings in harmony with the songs of Easter. Every flower that lifts its head out of an earth that but lately was dead and frozen, proclaims in jubilant ecstasy of color the truth that death is not the goal of life.

We do not know the date of Jesus' birth. A happy conjecture has placed it at the time when winter is coldest and the days are most short; the time when the sun turns northward, and the days begin to lengthen toward spring. But we do know the date of Easter. We know that the earth had wakened from the sleep of winter, that the fig trees were covered with leaves, and that the palms were waving in the spring sunshine. We know that the birds were singing and that the hills of Galilee and Judea were aglow with lilies, poppies and anemones, and that the whole earth echoed the jubilant cry of the disciples, "He is not dead, but is risen."

We need new faith that death does not end all. Human hearts, heavy with grief, dropping bitter tears above the ashes of their love, need the assurance and cheer that belong to the Easter message.

Have you sown your seed, and now are you staring hopelessly into the dark and cheerless earth, mourning because it is lost to you? Look not into the ground, for it is not there. Look at the waving field, now green, that tomorrow will gladden with the burden of its harvest. That which you sowed is not where you buried it. It is risen.

Have you scattered your hopes, and have they seemed to die? Have you buried them one by one, and watered them with your tears? Do they seem to lie so deep that neither sun nor rain can reach them? Does nothing mark their grave but your sad memories? Seek not the living among the dead. No true, unselfish love was ever wasted. New hopes spring confident out of the graves of the past. The present is yours, and the future also, and that which you loved still lives in holy memory, and in sacred hope.

Was faith once yours, and did it pale and die? Did some great shock come to you, or some sore disappointment that weakened your trust in God and man? And did you bear your faith sadly to the tomb and roll a great stone against the door? Your faith is not wholly dead. It cannot utterly die. You must trust some one. You must believe in goodness somewhere. While there is left in you a single spark of trust in any fellow-being, in heaven or on earth, your faith is not wholly dead. The faith that you still hold, small though it seem to you, is the precious seed of a new life, a life more precious and abundant.

Seek not for comfort in the tomb. You shall not find it there. Seek it in the sunlight, for it is there that life lives. Dwell not too much in the past, for the past is dead. The present is yours, and the future. Forget your bitterness, your heartaches, your graves. Do not dim the morning with your complainings. Seek not the living among the dead, but have faith to meet the dawn with radiant faith and thankful heart.

Mary and the Lilies

MARIE COLE HUNTER.

I. Annunciation.

Oh, sweetest, whitest blossom,
  (My heart a-fluttering)
An angel stood beside you,
  He brushed you with his wing!
A moment since he touched you,
  Yet a miracle wrought he,—
This radiant joy, prophetic
  Of Life that is to be!

II. Resurrection.

Oh, purest, holiest blossom,
  (My heart a-sorrowing)
The angel at the tomb-door
  Spoke such a wondrous thing:
"He is not dead, but risen!"
  An emblem, thou, to me,
Oh, resurrection Lily,
  Of endless life to be!

Congregational Church Extension

At the sixtieth annual meeting of the Congregational Church Building Society, held in Central Church, Brooklyn, recently, Secretary Charles H. Richards, D. D., created considerable enthusiasm by presenting his secretarial report to the society, showing that the receipts for 1912 exceeded those of 1911 by $35,000. For the first time in sixty years the Congregationalists went beyond the $300,000 mark, the society receiving $305,000 in regular offerings, in addition to the more than $330,000 received in specially designated contributions. In 1912 no less than twenty-eight states were aided in the erection of 148 churches and parsonages. The society has built 5,529 structures, of which 4,357 have been church edifices, during its sixty years of existence. The receipts during the same period have amounted to more than $7,000,000. In the last ten years alone, the receipts have amounted to $2,678,727. In 1912 there was an increase of thirty-three additional churches on the roll of contributing churches, which now totals no less than 3,091 on the society's books.

Congregationalism, judged by the society's own figures, is growing significantly either in the Mississippi Valley or on the Pacific Coast. No less than 128 of the churches and parsonages built by this organization in 1912, are located in either of these two sections named. In all the rest of the country, only twenty churches and parsonages were assisted by the society. Doctor Richard's report adds interest to the present understanding between Congregationalists and the Disciples of Christ.

Unitarian Communion Service

It may be a matter of news that Unitarian churches have a communion service at all. In The Christian Register (Boston) there is a pathetic letter to the editor, pleading for a more general observance of the Lord's Supper in Unitarian churches. Our hearts grow warm toward these Arian Christian brethren. The letter follows:

> It always makes me sad on communion Sundays to see so many persons (some holding prominent positions in the church) walk out of the church after the regular morning service, as if they had no interest in the service commemorating the Master. Many who have united with the church still do not recognize this service.
> Much is done nowadays to supply the secular wants of the people, but I think our Unitarian young people do not have enough done for their spiritual welfare. Why should not that part of their nature be more cultivated? In the Evangelical churches the church members are supposed to attend the communion service, and why should it not mean as much to Unitarians? I know that many of our young people unite with the church and receive the "right hand of fellowship." It is a beautiful sight to see them publicly acknowledge their loyalty to the Church and what it stands for, but many seem to feel the communion service is not for them. We need all the spiritual help we can get, and I would like to see more of our people remain and join in this service. I trust it may never be abolished in the Unitarian churches.

Are Baptists Going Dry?

"Taking the whole territory of the Northern Baptist Convention not more than 50 per cent of the churches reported any baptisms last year." This is the solemn statement of Rev. S. E. Wilcox, in The Standard (Baptist, Chicago). If Mr. Wilcox is correct, the baptistries of the Baptists in Northern Convention territory are in danger of drying up. However, we will let him give the facts himself:

> In Iowa, where Mr. Wilcox lives, the reports show about 400 churches; 2,005 baptisms were reported; 927 members received by letter and 541 by experience and restoration; total 3,473. Losses by letter, exclusion, erasure and death, total 3,094. This should show a gain of 379, but the totals show a loss of 317, the present total membership being 43,910. Two hundred and eight churches report baptisms; the others report none. This is not a good showing but as good or better than some other states, e. g., Minnesota with 258 churches reports only 103 churches having any baptisms; in Vermont only one-half the churches report any baptisms; Rhode Island, of seventy eight churches, thirty-nine report baptisms; and in Kansas of 626 churches only 218 report any baptisms. In New York 406 churches report no baptisms. Taking the whole territory of the Northern Baptist Convention not more than 50 per cent of the churches reported any baptisms last year.

An Interesting Example

An interesting example of Christian union may be found at Forest Hills, N. Y. Eight different denominations are represented in the enterprise to be led by Rev. J. C. Rollyman, a student of Union Theological Seminary, New York City. Presbyterians, Congregationalists, Methodists, Baptists (mark you!), Episcopalians (yes, Episcopalians!), Dutch Reformed folk, Lutherans and Friends have united in a common church enterprise, "determined to make one strong, church body, which, holding to the essentials of orthodox Protestantism, should have a basis of faith of sufficient breadth and flexibility to accommodate all evangelical Christians." Shades of John Calvin, John Wesley, Roger Williams, William Penn, and Henry VIII! Behold how good it is for brethren to dwell together in unity! We shall watch with much interest the returns on the $12,000 invested in the property of the United Church of Forest Hills, New York.

Munificence of Seventh-Day Adventists

A Baptist missionary who has made a close study of the work of the Seventh-Day Adventists gives in the Baptist and Reflector the following facts concerning that denomination: A membership of 105,526 gave in tithes and offerings, according to the latest report, $21.27 per capita; their 4,151 Sunday-schools gave for missions $134,830; they maintain 74 hospitals and sanitariums, valued at $3,386,000.

Strength of Congregational Foreign Missions

The 102nd annual report of the American Board of Commissioners for Foreign Missions, together with the minutes of the meeting held at Portland, Me., Oct. 8-11, 1912, is issued by the Congregational Publishing Society, and is filled with information of great value. There has been a shortage of workers in recent years, but in 1910-1911 the ranks were refilled with 73 new workers and 54 appointments have been made since the previous annual meeting. Modern missionary work calls for more highly specialized and thorough work than formerly to meet conditions on mission fields. For the fourth consecutive time the annual meeting closed with no debt. The total income was $1,062,442.98, but this was not due to the gifts of the living, for the weakest spot in the finances is the direct giving of the churches. The Balkan-Turkish War has caused suspension of work in Bulgaria and Macedonia. The statistics show missions in South and West Central Africa, Turkey, Marathi, Madura and Ceylon, China, Japan, Philippines, Micronesia, Mexico, Spain and Austria with 617 missionaries, 5,036 native laborers, 77,619 communicants, 167,071 adherents, 14 theological schools, 18 colleges, 115 boarding schools.

A Presbyterian Administration

Wilson, Marshall and Bryan constitute the Presbyterian triumvirate at the head of our nation. Records may be searched in vain for a similar contribution by a single denomination of such political leadership. No wonder our Presbyterian brethren feel like trying to make one of these their moderator at Atlanta next May. The Presbyterian church may be congratulated on having three such distinguished statesmen not only living at the same time, but working together as president, vice-president and secretary of state. While we so rejoice with the Presbyterians, yet, in the language of The Congregationalist (Boston) "the rest of us have to find solace in the reflection that all three gentlemen have strong leanings towards Christianity!"

Record Breaking Gift to Foreign Missions

The largest single bequest ever made in the history of Christendom to the cause of foreign missions came to light when the will of Robert Arthington, late of Teignmouth, Devon, England, came to light. The gift was $4,500,000 outright to that cause, as follows: $2,500,000 to the English Baptist Missionary Society, and $2,000,000 to the London Missionary Society, which is an Independent Congregational organization. The nearest approach to this munificence in recent times was the bequest of John S. Kennedy, who died about two years ago leaving a fortune of some $25,000,000. Mr. Kennedy bequeathed several millions to the Presbyterian Board of Foreign Missions.

Another Large Missionary Bequest

In the wake of the Robert Arthington bequest in England, of $4,500,000 to missions and the offer of John D. Rockefeller to give $100,000 conditionally to Baptist Foreign Missions in this country, it is good to record that nearly $200,000 has been added to the reserve deposits of the Board of Missions of the Protestant Episcopal Church. This large gift comes from the estate of Miss Mary Rhinelander King, which results from the sale of the King homestead on Long Island. This is emphatically an era of "greater work" in foreign missionary offerings. The cause is touching the hearts of millionaires, whatever else might be said about them.

Joseph: The Beauty of Forgiveness

Forgiveness has been called "Christ's most striking innovation in morality." "The phrase 'a Christian spirit' is commonly regarded as synonymous with the disposition of readiness to forgive." Those who look in the Old Testament for foreshadowings of the Christ will find them in the conduct of men who had some appreciation of the wisdom and grace that appeared in their fulness in Jesus of Nazareth. Men who taught and practiced forgiveness were preparing the world for the coming of the Master of all who try to live well.

Forgiveness is the conservation and the reclamation of moral resources. The unforgiving man is a destroyer. He wills that some individuals shall be lost to the society of the virtuous. The moral advantage of the one from whom injury has been received is duly considered when the spirit of forgiveness controls our actions. Our desire then is to win him to right living. He is material not yet fitted for social uses or spoiled by misuse. The prudent manufacturer looks well to his prosperity by employing all the resources of science in the examination of his waste products. He is aware that much of what was formerly thrown away has been discovered to be of very great value. It may be that what is now thought to be waste is really valuable. He feels that he cannot afford to be complacent about the matter. He must be alert and find out what can be done. A greater alertness is demanded of the disciple of Jesus.

In the story of Joseph we have the littleness and meanness of selfishness set forth for what they are. There is a spirit within us which bids us, when men defraud us and put obstacles in our way, square the account with them by making them feel our power and contempt as soon as we are able to crush them and to deride them for their weakness. But this course never shows meanness to be mean. It justifies the other man in taking advantage of us. We condemn him only when we act with him on the level of brotherly kindness. It is the great forgiving soul that reveals the pettiness of revenge and the destructive power of hate. Preaching against any kind of sin amounts to nothing unless the opposite virtue is exhibited in the life of some one to whom the preacher can point and whom the people can understand. It is the first business of the church to furnish examples of forgiving love.

Rebuke may often necessarily precede forgiveness. Men whose actions and motives are wrong must be told what they are doing for themselves. Good natured acquiescence is in no way related to forgiveness. The one who forgives is exacting in his demands. He will be satisfied with nothing short of the best in those whom he loves. Careless work draws from him plain speech. "The command to 'rebuke,'" says Henry Churchill King, "sets forth the duty of holding the other to his best, of reminding him that he has done that which is not worthy of him—the duty to be no flatterers, spoiling our friends and ministering to their weaknesses, but to prove ourselves able to give the faithful 'wounds of a friend.'" The forgiving love of God is the greatest incentive ever offered to men to arouse them to their best endeavor. It is an invitation to enter into the enjoyment of the most exalted privilege, that of partnership with God in work. God's word of forgiveness is an assurance that we have duly recognized our sins, that we have no apology for them, and that we intend by the help of God to convert our weakness into strength.

The only way to dispose of enemies in a satisfactory manner is to forgive them. Of course this cannot be done unless they patiently listen to rebuke and honestly seek to correct what is wrong in their lives. If it is ignorance that causes another to try to harm us, then our duty is to help him to obtain knowledge that will change his conduct. It is not armies that will rid the world of perils from the savage races of the earth; it is the teacher of the truth. If personal enemies refuse to understand us and if national enemies choose to follow the rules of barbarism in preference to those of civilization and enlightenment, the forgiving spirit is still imperative. We must withhold moral fellowship from men in their evil course but as Christians, our desire will be that the opportunity of moral fellowship with all who have wronged us may come speedily. A Wave of Social Investigation

A wave of investigation has been sweeping across the country. A legislative committee has been investigating New York's dreadful police system, and the Illinois Senate has been investigating the effect of low wages upon women workers in the state. Some of the religious bodies such as the Presbyterians and the Methodists have gotten into the habit. The former with a reduction of expenses in view and the latter the charge that a publishing house has been publishing and distributing literature of a rationalistic and liberalistic tendency. The Illinois senate committee put some of Chicago's largest employers of women on the stand and compelled them to admit that the wages paid their female help was pitifully low in these days of high prices. The legislative committee on remedial police legislation concluded its public hearings in New York. It will submit a report to the legislature with recommendations for regulation of the police department and vice. Three topics of importance discussed by witnesses at the hearings were excise, disreputable resorts and gambling, as sources of police graft. Among remedies looking toward elimination of graft as considered in the committee's report are the establishment of a board of public morals, employment of women as police officers in regulating the social evil, Sunday opening of saloons during restricted hours, official consideration of the disreputable resorts as a public nuisance, regulation of the mayor's power over the police and increase of pay of policemen. Let us hope that this investigation wave will carry on its breast, reform into many needed places and not vanish into nothingness and forgotten dreams.

THE WAGES OF WORKING GIRLS.

It became very evident during the Illinois senate investigation last week that Chicago's working girls are not the highest paid workers in the world by a good deal. Julius Rosenwald, philanthropist and head of the great Sears-Roebuck concern, testified that the minimum wage paid girls employed by his concern, was $5, and that, after a period, not to exceed three months, this was raised to $5.50. He said also that it was the policy of his company not to employ girls not living at home, at less than $8 a week. He declared it as his opinion that a girl living at home ought to be able to live on $5 a week and that a girl "adrift" should be able to live honestly on $8 a week. The witness declared that he did not believe the employer was in any way responsible for the downfall of a girl, so far as the wages of the girl was concerned. Mr. Rosenwald said Sears, Roebuck & Co. earned in profits something over $7,000,000 in the fiscal year of 1911. He said the company had a surplus of more than $3,000,000 at the end of that year, after dividends to shareholders had been paid. Surplus at the end of 1912 was $12,000,000. In reply to a question, he said it would have been possible to use $2,000,000 of that amount to increase the wages of employes. One of the heads of Marshall Field & Co. testified that the Field concern in its retail store employed 4,222 women and girls regularly, that is, for eight hours each day. Of this number, 213 girls received only $5.00 a week. This witness was compelled to admit that he did not think it would seriously affect his firm if the sum of $1,070 per week was expended in raising the wages of these girls to $10.00 a week. Heads of other big retail concerns testified to a similar low wage.

REPORT OF DIVORCE COMMISSION.

The marriage relation is not as lasting in Illinois as it is in some of the other states. According to the first report of the Illinois commission on marriage and divorce Illinois leads the world in the number of its divorces. Statistics are presented to show that from 1867 to 1906 120,000 divorces were granted in this state, 632,000 in the middle western states, and 1,250,000 in the United States. The report points to the pitiful condition of 1,300,000 "divorce orphans" who have been deprived of homes and of one or both of their parents in the United States in the recent fifty years. A hundred thousand divorces were granted in this country in 1912. In 1900 twenty European countries and Australia, New Zealand, and Canada contributed to the marriage tragedies of the world 27,000 divorces. In the same period this country had 56,000 divorces. Yet this nation had only 76,000,000 population, while the other nations cited contained 267,000,000 people. The rate of divorce, reads the report, is seven times greater than that of Europe. This condition, existent for so many years, has brought on the American people opprobrium from the civilized nations of the world. The report points out, however, that Illinois has divorce laws which have been used as a standard in many parts of the world. But complaint is made of the execution of the law in the state. The report says most of the divorces go by default. In half the cases the defendant cannot be found or has left the state. This, says the report, presents a large field for fraud. The report urges attention to the hearing of divorce cases and advises the passage of additional laws.

THE ROCKEFELLER FOUNDATION.

The senate committee has come to a conclusion in the Rockefeller matter. The proposed $100,000,000 Rockefeller foundation for benevolent purposes constitutes the safest disposition that can be made of that portion of John D. Rockefeller's immense fortune, is the conclusion expressed in a majority report from the senate judiciary committee, presented to the senate recommending the passage of the Rockefeller foundation bill. "This money is now in the control of a private individual, who could, if he chose, direct its use to purely private ends for a considerable period after his own death," says the report. "Instead of this, he proposes to place it, subject to congress, in control of a body of men now actually administering well known charities of acknowledged usefulness." The report says the bill has been changed so that all danger of an unrestricted perpetuation of the Rockefeller foundation is done away with. The choice of successors to the original incorporators must be approved, under the terms of the bill, by the president of the United States, the chief justice of the Supreme court, the president of the senate, the speaker of the house, and the presidents of Yale, Harvard, Columbia, Johns Hopkins, and Chicago universities. "The proposed foundation," says the report, "is an exception among charitable trusts in that the element of perpetuity has been practically removed."

At High Tide

Two men were speaking of the death of a mutual friend. Each had known and loved him well, and to one of them he had stood in a relation particularly close and tender. One by one they recounted his traits of character,—his sincerity, sympathy, earnestness, sweetness of spirit and unselfishness. He had devoted his life to a work that was arduous and unremitting. Much that he had done had not been seen of men. He had not lacked for appreciation, for all who knew him recognized his goodness of heart and his unfailing kindness, but much that he had done was inconspicuous, and many of the burdens he bore alone. The two friends told over to each other the qualities that made the man; the entire lack of condescension toward those that did not rise as high as he in public favor, and his equal lack of jealousy toward those who appeared to have risen above him, and they both said that it seemed as though he never had been so much needed as when he was taken away.

"But," said one of them, "there was one lesson to me in the tributes which his death brought forth,—we have been able to measure the influence of his life at high tide."

Then they spoke again of what sometimes happens to the man who lives beyond his prime; of failing powers and the lack of adaptation to the continual movements of the world; of living until one's real life work has become a memory, and his influence has ceased to count largely in favor of the things for which his life has been spent; and they agreed that it is needful in this thoughtless world, that now and then a good man should die in the full strength of his career, that men may realize how much life is worth at its best.

So many hearts are burdened amid similar cares; so many minds are perplexed by the same problem, it may be well to recall the judgment of those two men of the friend they honored and loved. We are not wise enough to explain the mysteries of life and death, or to interpret infallibly the providences of God. But we may accept the sorrow that comes with the bereavement in the assurance that no good life is wasted, and that some lives most truly fulfill their purpose that are ended in their prime,—ended for a new and better beginning.

From wholly unexpected quarters came tributes to his memory. Constant discoveries of those who were being helped by his life are coming continually to light. Even the friends who loved him best felt and knew as they had never felt, the full strength and dignity of his influence. His power for good was measured at high tide.

The White House Pulpit

Woodrow Wilson, preacher! No one can read the inaugural address of the new president without being stirred to the depths. It is almost as if one were reading from Isaiah or Amos, when our eyes fall upon the words, "We have been proud of our industrial achievements, but we have not hitherto stopped thoughtfully enough to count the cost, the cost of lives snuffed out, of energies overtaxed and broken, the fearful physical and spiritual cost to the men and women and children upon whom the dead weight and burden of it all has fallen pitilessly the years through." Or again, when we read, "This is not a day of triumph; it is a day of dedication. Here muster, not the forces of party, but the forces of humanity." Mr. Wilson is not the first occupant of the White House who has exercised the office of preacher, but this document, not only for its mastery of style, but for its ringing moral challenge, will perhaps take place beside the memorable messages of Abraham Lincoln. The true object of government is not the piling up of unlimited wealth, but the safeguarding of humanity. Were it not for the restrained and chastened style, one might almost imagine that this were a part of an address by Mr. Lloyd-George, the British chancellor. For it breathes the same lofty moral purpose and has as a background a similar religious spirit.

Interpretations

Mrs. M. E. Harlan

When I first entered college Mrs. Harlan was married and in school with her husband. I think Mr. Harlan was not a member of the church when they married. She won him to the church and inspired him to enter the ministry. Gladly did she sacrifice in order that he might be well equipped for what she considered the greatest task to which a soul can be called, the ministry of Christ. Little did she think during those happy sacrificial college days that she was preparing for a very large place in Christ's church.

Where it was that she received the missionary vision that shaped all her subsequent life, I do not know. It may have been in her mother's home. It may have been in the little country church. But certainly early, for she had the vision in college; she and her Lord held a tryst, the holiness and compulsion of which she never for a moment forgot. She, more than any other, was the inspiration of the early missionary spirit and plans at Drake University.

It was our good fortune to have Mrs. Harlan in our home last Thanksgiving. It was a quiet day. We had her to ourselves. Her conversation ranged from the small talk about former days to the great passions of her missionary soul. I marked her growth, and so when The Christian Century wrote and asked for a few words of appreciation I considered the task not a difficult one, but one that must be performed with a subdued soul. She seemed so well last Thanksgiving, and so full of large plans for the Kingdom. She talked much, too, of her sons and their prospects. And today she is dead! We can never steel our souls to the ways of death. His ruthless taking away of our loved ones almost causes our hearts to stop beating. The sky today is overhung with clouds. I hear a little bird singing, but his song is not joyful. And to think that death is to be the last enemy to be destroyed! Glad we all must be that ultimately life is to be victor.

"Nor blame I death, because he bore
The use of virtue out of earth;
I know transplanted human worth
Will bloom to profit otherwhere.

"So many worlds, so much to do,
So little done, such things to be,
How know I what had need of thee,
For thou wert strong as thou wert true."

Today, before I heard of Mrs. Harlan's death, I was reading Samuel Rutherford. He is a splendid key to her life. No better could be found. Let me quote a few typical sentences from Rutherford:

"Sweet, sweet is the Lord's cross."

"I esteem suffering for Christ a king's life."

"Welcome, welcome, sweet, sweet cross of Christ."

"Christ hath eased me, when I saw it not, lifting the cross off my shoulders, so I think it to be but a feather, because beneath are everlasting arms."

It was the cross of Christ that was the determining motive and power of Mrs. Harlan's life. Her Christianity was joyous in its hardship. Her soul was never so heavenly in its feeling as when bleeding with burdens. Never did she think she could have fellowship with Christ without having fellowship with his sufferings. With Rutherford she would say: "Losses and disgraces are the wheels of Christ's triumphal chariot." And, "I know that an inflicted life looks very like the way that leads to the kingdom."

I remember E. S. Ames remarking to me about this emphatic characteristic of Mrs. Harlan. His remark was made a dozen years ago. I think we both then thought it somewhat abnormal.

Do we think so now? No. The dozen years that have passed since have taught us much. And then the soul of Mrs. Harlan has gone where earth values count for nought, but only the eternal survives.

Even in college the sacrificial spirit in her was dominant; but it grew as the years of her abode "in heavenly places" increased. There came to her two great experiences. First, the death of her husband after darkness had come to him; and, second, she was led to face an unevangelized world with official responsibility.

On Thanksgiving day she told us about the last wonderful prayer her husband offered. She said it was like Christ's prayer in Gethsemane. In the last supreme effort of his soul he seemed vitally to lay hold of God and to hold awful fellowship with Christ. And then the dark—while life continued awhile.

Again she faced the task of taking the Christ of the cross to an indifferent church as well as to a world ignorant even of His name. The cross became richer in her life because of these experiences. Its tenderness became greater. Its forgiveness was more stressed. Its encompassing love was more believed in. Its glow and life was brighter and fuller.

And so, if you would understand the early ambitions of Mrs. Harlan for an education; if you would understand her arduous labors as a minister's wife; if you would know the secret of the simplicity of her speech and dress; if you would fathom the deep motives of her missionary zeal; if you would explain the growth of her mind until she thought in terms of the world; if you would discover the secret of her ever-broadening sympathies; if you would get into her very heart of hearts—you will hear her deathless spirit singing—ever singing:

"In the cross of Christ I glory, towering o'er the wrecks of time;
All the light of sacred story, gathers 'round its head sublime."

A great heritage has been left her sons and the church, the heritage of a Christian soul intensely in earnest with Christ. Surely somewhere this white soul must still be a missionary of the cross.

Conditions in Mexico

What They Promise.

BY PERRY J. RICE.

The overthrow of Madero and the developments which have followed are deeply significant. They indicate a complete reversal of the regime inaugurated with the overthrow of Diaz two years ago, and the rise to power of the old military despotism. Huerta and Blanquet as well as Felix Diaz are men of the old type, and have no other sentiments or purposes than those which actuated Porfirio Diaz. The proof of this is seen in the murder of Madero and Suarez and others who were influential in the establishment of constitutional government. No one who knows at all the Mexican character, or who is at all acquainted with the methods of the former military rulers doubts for a moment that the men now at the head of the government were more or less definitely cognizant of the plot which culminated in the death of the deposed president. It was in line with a policy that has been pursued for years and by which numbers of liberators of Mexico have lost their lives. The personnel of the old regime is in the saddle and the old despotism is at least temporarily triumphant.

The men who have usurped the reigns of government promise to restore peace, and it is not improbable that they will succeed. But it will be the peace of suppression and oppression—the peace of a grave yard. They will shoot down in cold blood every man who has been associated with the Madero program, and every man who dares to raise his voice in defense of human rights and liberties. They will, by sheer force of military power, subject to peonage and abject slavery the great masses of the Mexican people who are too poor to resist and too weak and ignorant to protest. Let no one be deceived by the plausible promises of the present usurpers. Diaz made similar promises but did not even attempt to fulfil them. There will be no distribution of lands, there will be no release from poverty and ignorance. The large estates will continue to be held by the few, and valuable concessions will be given to Mexicans in good favor and to foreigners who will pay the price exacted by the rulers.

Who can believe that the men who could form and carry out as treacherous a plot as that formed for the overthrow of Madero, are moved by any sentiments of civilized patriotism or of humanity? There is absolutely nothing in the present situation that promises relief for the masses or surcease of suffering on the part of those now living in the most degraded state of poverty and ignorance. It is doubtful if Livingstone found anything in Central Africa, where the slavers carried on their diabolical traffic, more distressing than might be found in Mexico today. Against these conditions Madero, the unselfish champion of human rights, the man of great wealth who refused the luxury and ease which he might have enjoyed, hurled himself with all the force of his wealth and learning, with all the passion of sympathy which he felt for the helpless; and for a brief period was triumphant. But the odds were against him. The army never rallied to his support, the holders of vast estates secretly desired his overthrow; the former supporters of Diaz lent him little or no assistance, and finally traitorously turned against him, overthrew him and murdered him.

During all this time what has the United States done? I regret to say it, but the truth of it is too apparent to be denied. She has done nothing worthy of her ideals or her precedents. The army has maneuvered along the border at great expense to the country, but has given only a weak and hesitating protection to Americans and American interests. Her diplomatic measures have been anything but creditable. It is useless to name over the mistakes of the past, but I cannot but express the conviction that if our government had played a stronger hand a year ago the life of Madero might have been spared and the reforms which he advocated might have been substantially advanced. No, it would not have required intervention; no one who knows the nature of the country and the character of the people can have wished for that. Besides, we do not favor war. We are pleading for international peace and long for the day of its realization. There has been reason enough for intervention, but even these reasons have grown very largely out of the lack of real statesmanlike handling of the situation.

Had we exhibited as much of diplomatic ability as was exhibited sixty years ago in our relations with Japan, the whole situation might have been altered. We have signally failed to do our duty as a big brother in the terrible crisis through which Mexico has recently passed. I say the crisis which is past. I think it is past and with it a great opportunity. Despotism is in the saddle again. Felix Diaz will in all probability be elected to the presidency. The traitorous usurpers of the government will continue in power. The people wiill be subdued and the concessionaires, Americans and others, will be able to dig the ores out of the mines, to fell the rich forests, to pump the oil out of the ground and enrich themselves and the Mexican rulers. And the United States will be compelled to recognize the government and wink at its atrocities. It is in the interest of business, of trade and commerce which, of course, we must not interrupt.

I am thinking of the duty of the church in this situation. There is a method of intervention which, after all, costly as it is, we dare not refuse. It is an armed intervention, too, but the weapons of this warfare are not carnal. Urged on by every sentiment of justice and of humanity, the church must enter Mexico, armed with the sword of the spirit and with all the implements of moral and spiritual conquest. In this way only, as it now appears, will we be able to reclaim the nation and make amends for our failures during recent years. Deep as our resentment is because of the crimes that have been recently committed, it may be that it is all a part of the divine program for the redemption of Mexico. At any rate the call is to the churches, and it ought to be answered heartily and liberally.

I cannot be quite so sure as I was a week ago that the provisional government in Mexico will be successful in restoring peace even though the most severe and rigid military measures be adopted. In case the various revolutionary forces are not subdued the opportunity for the United States to exercise its diplomatic skill still remains. It is to be hoped that the new administration will seize this opportunity and thus evince our friendship for Mexico, and make amends for the mistakes of the past year. After all this is done the opportunity for the churches to enter the country with greatly augmented forces, and carry on with vigor educational and industrial as well as evangelistic enterprises still is open. Only in this way will peace be permanently restored in that war swept republic.

James Bryce and Federation

There never has been a shrewder observer and a more capable critic of American conditions than James Bryce, author of "The American Commonwealth" and retiring Ambassador from Great Britain. Anything this distinguished Englishman has to say, therefore, about religious conditions in America, is of extreme value. On February 17 the Federation of Churches in Greater New York City gave Mr. Bryce a luncheon at Hotel Astor. Bishop David R. Greer of the Protestant Episcopal Church, presided. Mr. Bryce eulogized the work of the Federation, and said it had caused a distinct change in dealing with the problems of the day. He said: "The first advance made by religious bodies, is that they are now far more willing to co-operate with one another than they ever have been before, in every kind of work that makes for the material and moral improvement of the people. There is a wish to lay more and more stress upon all that they have in common. Differences of view as regards ecclesiastical arrangements and still deeper differences of view as regards the doctrines of theology still exist and are likely long to continue, but there is a stronger feeling today than there has ever been before of that which they have in common in worshipping one Almighty Ruler, in recognizing Him as the Author of all good, and in feeling that as His children they are bound to one another by ties which rise above their differences."

DR. WILLETT'S MISSION TOUR

The Disciples of Christ in Japan

It was natural that a people full of a desire to have a part in the great enterprises of the kingdom of God should wish to send missionaries to so promising a field as Japan. Accordingly, in the second period of modern missionary work in the Sunrise Empire, the period of rapid growth and great success, two families were sent out by the Foreign Christian Missionary Society, Charles E. Garst and George T. Smith and their wives. That was in 1883, and after six months of study of the language in Yokohama, they went to Akita, an important city of the north, on the west coast.

In an important sense Mr. Garst was the father of our mission work in Japan. First at Akita and later on at Tokyo he and Mrs. Garst gave themselves with complete devotion to the enterprise of representing the message of the gospel to the people who seemed so ready to receive it. With rare personal charm they won their way into the hearts of a growing company of believers. Mr. Garst was tireless in his labors. The missionaries there speak of him with high appreciation and affection. He literally gave his life to the cause. His long and hard journeys and his disregard of his own comfort in a too-ready satisfaction with native food and shelter, to which he was not accustomed, no doubt hastened his untimely death.

Mrs. Laura Delaney Garst, who shared Japan's pioneer mission task.

Mr. Garst's Work Still Lives.

But Mr. Garst's work lives. He laid foundations both in Akita and Tokyo on which substantial structures have risen. Mrs. Garst, now residing in Des Moines, Ia., has helped on the work to which she and her husband gave their united efforts. Among her missionary writings, "In the Shadow of the Drum Tower," the story of the labors of Dr. Macklin in Nanking, China, and of the experiences of Mrs. Macklin, her sister, has a value not only for the study of Chinese missionary work, but for similar labors the world around; and only this year, a few days before we sailed for Japan, her daughter, Gretchen, left for Akita to take up there something of the task which her father did not live to complete.

From the beginnings under the hands of Garst and Smith and their wives has grown a work which is now distributed in four centers, Akita, Sendai, Tokyo and Osaka, each of which has several out-stations. It might have been supposed that after thirty years in Japan we should have a larger number of mission centers. But in nothing is the wisdom of missionary administration shown more admirably than in the strengthening of stations to true effectiveness and the refusal to push out into fields for which there is no adequate equipment in sight, and where at best only a questionable work can be done. It would be better for a missionary board to have a single station in a country, and make it strong in all the essentials of missionary efficiency, as for example the Southern Methodist Board has done so admirably at Soochow, China, than to plant a dozen stations, no matter how promising the fields, without the ability to bring them to real effectiveness. Such a practice was common in the first days of missionary work. The boards of all the denominations have seen the error of this method, and are giving thought to the efficient manning and equipping of the most promising of their stations, rather than the planting of more.

The Work in Tokyo and Osaka.

It was a great disappointment to me that we were unable to visit Akita and Sendai. Both are interesting cities for other reasons than our missionary interests there. The work in both is intimately connected with the lives of very dear friends of mine. But it was impossible to go so far north, and Japan is, lengthwise at least, a large country.

But in Tokyo and Osaka it was possible to see something of the work. Of our churches in Tokyo I have spoken in a previous letter. But the institutions we are building up in the suburb of Takinogawa, an important part of Tokyo, are among the most promising we have in mission lands. This was the district of the city selected by Dr. H. H. Guy when the plan of founding a school and seminary was first contemplated. It was made possible by the gifts of Gen. Drake, and now includes the Bible School, the Middle School, corresponding to an American high school, and an English Night School. It was a great misfortune to the Bible School, and indeed to all our work in Japan, that Prof. Guy was compelled, for health considerations in his family, to give up his work and return to America. By many he is rated as the best master of the Japanese language among the younger men who have labored there.

Schools for Boys and Girls.

The faculty of the Bible School includes R. D. McCoy, A. W. Place, N. Otsuka, P. A. Davey and Pres. Ishikawa. The latter is the head of the Chu Gakko, or Middle School. His relation to the Disciples is interesting. He first learned of our people while a student in America. He studied in the Imperial State University and at Ohio State University. After his return to Japan he was employed as a teacher in a middle school, but his abilities were discovered, and he was made professor in the Nobles College in Tokyo, where he received from the Imperial Household department an order of merit. Yet he was all the time interested in the work of the church, and preached on occasion. At length he gave up his governmental position, with its higher salary and its assurance of a retiring pension, and took service in our Middle School, where his accurate scholarship and high teaching ability have made him a most valuable factor.

There is also a Girls' College in close connection with the Boys' College. This includes a Bible school and a high school. The leaders are Miss Bertha Clawson, Miss Mary Lediard, and a corps of teachers, both native and foreign. The Takinogawa

Church was the direct outgrowth of the schools. The first services were held in the home of Prof. Guy, and the men in the Bible College have been its sponsors and preachers.

The Stay and Staff of Japanese Missions.

It must not be forgotten that the stay and staff of our work in Japan is the force of native preachers, teachers and evangelists. A few of them I have named, but their number is far greater, and their labors have been the secret of the success which has been attained by the Disciples. Many of them are men of ability. Most of them have been trained in our school in Tokyo, and some, like Professors Ishikawa and Otsuka, in America. It is they who have the burden of the active field work and preaching, and it is such as they to whom the care of the churches and schools must be increasingly entrusted.

In Osaka we have a church at Tennoji, a part of the city which takes its name from a Buddhist temple of some considerable celebrity. M. B. Madden is the missionary in connection with the Tennoji Church. The structure is an attractive one, built through the generosity of an Indiana Disciple. The Japanese pastor lives in a house attached to the church, and therefore convenient for gatherings of the members, one of which we greatly enjoyed after the public meeting in the church. The memories of Mr. and Mrs. C. S. Weaver, who were with the church for several years, are very dear. Mr. and Mrs. Madden are active and efficient, and are rearing a family of boys whose lives are committed to the work of missions.

The total list of our missionaries who have labored in Japan, or are now there, runs to more than fifty, and includes such names as Garst, Smith, Stevens, Guy, Pruett, Marshall, Erskine, McCall, and many others, in addition to those whom I have mentioned in these letters. Besides there have been and are several who have labored under independent auspices, but none the less effectively.

Forces Are Pitifully Small.

But all told, our forces in Japan are pitifully small. They could all be placed in a single station without unduly augmenting the number of workers. In Osaka, for example, we have the single church with its out-stations, and one missionary family in charge. In such circumstances the proper increase of the work is absolutely impossible. No school work can be attempted, where it would be an effective power for spreading the message. The reason is, of course, that there are no workers to take the added burden. It is hardly creditable to a people like the Disciples to open work in such important centers and leave it half cared for.

The same thing is in large measure true of the equipment of our work in Tokyo. The schools there need additional property and buildings. The Buddhist school a short distance away has imitated several of the features of our institutions, and has recently planted two new centers in the neighborhood. That is a section of Tokyo which the Disciples could take as their own if they were able to secure the men and the means for such an advance. The adequate strengthening of such educational opportunities as Takinogawa offers, or such church openings as wait for the enlargement of the force at Tennoji, is a duty to which the Disciples must respond.

Difficulty of Selecting Missionaries.

It is a satisfaction to know the men and women who are our fellow-workers and representatives in Japan. The selection of missionaries is a very difficult process. It is hard to know who will succeed and who will fail, who will be able to work with others on the field, and who will prove impossible and a source of strife. All missionary boards find this a hard problem to face, and our own Foreign Christian Missionary Society has had its troubles in Japan as elsewhere. All such experiences point to the facts, now more clearly than ever recognized, that the prospective missionary must have physical, mental and moral soundness, the best educational training afforded by the times, and sufficient experience at home to test his abilities and his wisdom. Beyond these, many things may be desired; less than these no man or woman should carry to the non-Christian lands.

To the plea and purpose of the Disciples our missionaries in Japan, the best of them at least, are true. By this I do not mean that they are merely sound on some of the denominational insistences to which some of the Disciples have attached their affection, as if those few tenets represented the faith of the fathers. I mean rather the insistence upon the unity of the people of God as the imperial duty of the church in this generation.

Place of Disciples in United Counsels.

Our missionaries in Japan have an intimate and honored place in the counsels of the united churches. Their coöperation is asked and expected, and more than one of them has been entrusted with official duties in connection with the common program of Protestantism in Japan which reflected credit upon them and the people they represent. Other and even more notable services of this kind will be rendered by them in the future.

As one looks back on a short month of delightful and impressive experiences in Japan, among our own people, with those of other Protestant bodies, among the shrines of Shinto and Buddhist faith, and in the circles of the Japanese themselves, he is appreciative of all the values that the experience has brought, and is haunted by the desire to spend a longer time upon that soil, to plough with deeper furrow into the interests and lives of so fascinating a people, and to have some larger share in that work to which the honored men and women whose names we utter in daily prayer are devoting their lives in the land of the Rising Sun.

An Income Tax

Under the new amendment to the constitution of the United States an income tax becomes a possibility. On the face of it, an income tax is the fairest of all taxes. But that does not prove that it is best. An income tax is declared on high authority to produce "a nation of liars." So does any other tax. How few men, and still fewer women step down the gang-plank after a return from Europe, without some mental juggling with figures; and how few men return to the assessor a perfectly truthful answer! David said in his haste, "All men are liars." David never was a tax-collector, or he would have said it deliberately. And who ever loved a tax-gatherer? The publicans were tax-collectors, no wonder they were unpopular. Has not the time come when a scheme can be devised for the collecting of taxes in such fashion that it shall be easy for men to do right?

Have We Found The Real Tomb of Christ

By William E. Barton

The Crusaders fought for an empty tomb. The mere statement of the fact seems to condemn it as an act of folly. Yet that sentiment for which hundreds of brave men laid down their lives is not to be dismissed with a sneer. They cared enough for the Holy Sepulchre to die for its recovery, and their wars changed the history of the world. We have no occasion to fight for it, but we cannot well fail to be interested.

THE GARDEN TOMB.

Ever since the fourth Christian century a particular spot in Jerusalem has been pointed out as the site of the place where Jesus was crucified and buried. Helena, the mother of the Emperor Constantine, making her pilgrimage to Jerusalem, identified, as she believed, the place where Jesus had been crucified, and caused a church to be erected above it. This "Church of the Holy Sepulchre" from that time on has been held in reverence; and when Jerusalem fell into possession of the Mohammedans it was this that nerved the army of the Crusaders in their efforts to recapture Jerusalem and recover the tomb of Christ. Hundreds of thousands of pilgrims visit Jerusalem and stand reverently under the dome of the great building which is supposed to cover the site of the hill on which Jesus was crucified and the tomb in which He was laid.

Spot of Peculiar Interest.

Even to one who does not credit the tradition, which makes this the veritable tomb of Jesus, the spot is one of peculiar interest. Round it gather more of sacred sentiment and holy tradition than belong to any other spot on earth. For it hundreds of thousands of Christian people have shed their blood, and to it millions from all over the world have made reverent pilgrimages.

Still, it cannot be claimed that a visit to this spot is wholly free from disillusionment. As one descends the steps that lead into the open court before the door, he finds himself surrounded by noisy peddlers. Some of them are selling rosaries that have been blessed before that shrine. Others sell hideous white cotton shrouds, printed in black with grewsome inscriptions, and these are sold to pilgrims, who take them inside the church, fold them on the stone where the dead body of Jesus is said to have been anointed, and convey them to distant lands—especially Russia—to be kept with those folds unopened till the pilgrim himself is laid out in his shroud for burial. Others sell pictures, and others vend mother-of-pearl crosses. They have made what ought to be the holiest place in Christendom a place of merchandise. They have coined into petty cash the very blood-drops of the Lord.

Three sects hold the place in common—the Greek, the Roman Catholic, and the Armenian. Just inside the door on a platform is the Turkish guard of about a dozen armed soldiers. It is pretended that the Turks are needed there to keep the Christians from killing each other. Largely this is pretense, and is used as a pretext for petty graft; but the presence of a Moslem guard in the church that is supposed to contain the tomb of Christ, for the alleged purpose of keeping these Christians from leaping at each others' throats, is one of the high scandals of Christendom.

Crucifixion Outside City.

The New Testament story shows that He suffered outside the city—was not crucified inside the walls. It also tells us that the place was "near the city," and it is evident that a public road, and perhaps more than one, passed near it. There is good reason to believe that the place was on the north side of the city, for the palace of the Governor was not far inside the Damascus Gate, and the place of execution, which doubtless was often used, was not likely to be on the opposite side. All the sites that have any tradition in support of them are north.

But the Church of the Holy Sepulchre is well inside the present walls, and the more carefully we study the ground the less likely does it seem that the walls as they stood in the time of Christ could have run south and east of it. Either there was a sharp reentering angle, or the wall went around the site of the present church. If this is so, then the Church of the Holy Sepulchre does not stand where Jesus was crucified and buried, and we must look for the place farther north. The deeper the spade goes at the base of the old walls, the less probable it seems that Calvary occupied the site of the Church of the Holy Sepulchre. But whether it is the site or not, it is impossible to make it real to oneself in the surroundings and atmosphere of the present Church of the Holy Sepulchre.

Place of the Skull.

In the belief that the second wall in the time of Christ ran not very far from the line of the present wall, reverent men set forth to explore the space just outside the wall of Jerusalem to the north in the effort to find there, if possible, a site which fulfilled the conditions of the Scripture narrative. There is just such a hill situated near the highway that leads from the Damascus Gate. It is an elevated spot adjacent to the main Damascus road, not far from the Damascus Gate, and presenting toward the city a rocky face with deep caverns that instantly suggest some resemblance to a human skull and makes the name Golgotha, or the Place of the Skull, strikingly suggestive.

But if this was the hill of Calvary, where was the tomb? Can we with any approach to certainty identify the place where Jesus was buried? Not certainly, for Jerusalem abounds in tombs; yet there has been discovered a tomb which strikingly satisfies the conditions of the narrative. It is close by the site of the crucifixion, and the Gospel narrative tells us that His burial place was "in the place where He was crucified." It is a single tomb, in a garden, and on important archeological grounds it is believed to date from the Jewish period. When found it was filled almost to the top with skulls and bones which had been thrown into it from other graves. It contained no skeleton in place. The human remains evidently had been thrown in from several other graves. Though apparently a Jewish tomb originally, it had been occupied in later centuries by Christians. Two crosses in red paint were found upon the walls with Greek letters at the corners. These, of course, are centuries later than the crucifixion. It contains spaces for three bodies, two adults and one child. But only one of these spaces was ever finished. It was distinctly "a new tomb," and apparently only one body was buried in it. From the level of the ground outside one looks down into it as Peter and John are said to have done. When we say that only one human body appears to have been buried in it, we find another interesting fact, that bits of rock at the bottom of the one finished compartment, when analyzed at the British Museum, are alleged to show that no human body ever decomposed above it. The skulls and bones that later were thrown in decomposed in other graves. As an actual place of burial this tomb was completed for only a single occupant, and that occupant left no chemical trace of the decomposition of organic matter, such as belongs in the human body, to penetrate the porous rock beneath.

Do all these facts prove conclusively that this was the tomb of Christ? No, they do not. They merely prove that this may be that tomb, or that this is a tomb essentially like that in which Jesus was buried and from which He rose.

Church of the Holy Sepulchre.

One Sunday morning I went early to the Church of the Holy Sepulchre. It was thronged. An English-speaking monk and a Turkish sergeant made way for me, pushing devout worshipers right and left that I might come near to each of the score of holy places under that historic roof. I saw them all, and left with heavy heart. Not so could I make real to myself the mystery of our Lord's passion and resurrection.

It still lacked an hour of breakfast time, and I went to the garden outside the city wall, and rapping at the gate, was admitted. It was spring, and the garden was abloom with all the flowers of Palestine. Alone and in silence I made my way through the flowers to the tomb. I stopped at the door as John stopped, and then, reverently, walked within.

Whether this be the very spot or not, I thought, this is the one place where a reverent pilgrim can make the scene real to himself without the presence of the superstitious throng and the pitiful presence of much that desecrates the scene. "Come, see the place where the Lord lay!" How real the message seemed! How the hewn rock sepulchre made the message almost audible!

At last I turned, and walked out of the tomb. I had forgotten the world outside. I had forgotten what day it was, and what time and season. But it came back to me in a flood of light and beauty as I stepped forth into the spring sunlight and walked among the flowers. I plucked a red anemone and put it in my Bible—a flower that grew near to where his blood was shed, and his life rose up in beauty from the earth. And all the flowers and all the sunshine of that Sunday morning in the spring proclaimed to me the glad message of Easter.

A Notable Painting of the Triumphal Entry

One of the most notable successes in British Art was attained by Benjamin Robert Haydon in 1831, when he exhibited his "Entry into Jerusalem." Of his three greatest works it was the most noted, and he himself was the foremost English painter of his day. Charles Lamb wrote a poem in its praise; Wordsworth declared it was worth waiting fifty years to get so perfect a picture. All London went to see it and paid a shilling a head. The painting was hailed as the harbinger of a new era in British Art.

What became of this notable picture? One may find in London less notable productions by this versatile artist, but this, his greatest picture, is in America, in the Art Museum of Cincinnati.

It is a notable picture for many reasons. One is that Haydon wrought into it a considerable number of the literary people of his own time. The Saviour's left hand almost touches the face of the Apostle John, a portrait of John Howard Payne, the American author of "Home, Sweet Home." The profile in the door, still farther to the left, is Keats', and immediately before him, with hand upon the breast, is Wordsworth. The sharp-visaged, alert face looking over Wordsworth's shoulder is Voltaire, and the profile just beyond him is Sir Isaac Newton. The Virgin in the painting is said to be Mrs. Siddons, though this is disputed; and other faces identified by an authentic key are those of Hazlett, William Berwick, the artist, and other early Nineteenth Century notables.

Many stories are told about this painting. It is generally believed that the ass was painted by Landseer, at that time Haydon's most promising pupil; and it is said that Haydon himself was greatly disturbed because so many people said, "What a wonderful donkey," instead of "What a wonderful Christ."

In 1810 his troubles began. His father had been allowing two hundred pounds a year and this stopped. From this time on he was harassed by debt. He had a genuis, however, to turn even his difficulties to advantage. When he got into jail for debt he gathered his companions around him and painted a picture, over which the King, George IV, laughed and swore and paid him 500 pounds for it. While arguing with a sheriff he would sketch him and get free use of a model and later make a picture of it. He was vain and quarrelsome and improvident, but he was industrious and made a good husband to a young widow whom he married in 1821 and a good father to the children whom she brought to him. He was a man of deep piety, and believed himself guided by a personal, merciful and over-ruling Providence. He had the most profound confidence in his own mission and believed in himself with an unquestioned devotion which was at once the cause of his triumph and downfall.

No picture that he ever painted drew such crowds as this of "The Triumphal Entry." Years afterward, with some feeling of bitterness and sense of the ingratitude of England, he painted "The Banishment of Aristides," but England did not pay a shilling to find herself rebuked. The great picture was exhibited in a hall in one end of the building, while down the corridor at the other end was another exhibition hall, where the American dwarf, Tom Thumb, was also on exhibition. The British public by this time cared a great deal more to see Tom Thumb than it did to look at Haydon's picture. Haydon had become a back number. The exhibition was unsuccessful. The artist's difficulties increased. Overcome by debt, disappointment and ingratitude, he wrote, "Stretch me no longer on this rough world." On June 22, 1846, he died by a pistol shot at his own hand.

He left a great name in English Art. By some critics he was applauded, and by others derided, but by the public he was neglected. His "Lazarus" is in the National Gallery, London, and his other great paintings are scattered. Few writers on the subject of Art have realized that his masterpiece was in America; yet here it is, and Cincinnati may well be proud to possess this notable production. Overrated as it is doubtless was by those who first trod on each other's toes to obtain a sight of it, it still is a great and reverent attempt to set forth the hour of our Lord's brief triumph. Painted as it was in the midst of Haydon's triumph, a triumph followed soon by his rejection and ultimately by his tragic death, there is much in it that may well suggest a lesson for this Passion-tide.

MODERN WOMANHOOD

Conducted by Mrs. Ida Withers Harrison.

Mrs. Harrison will be glad to receive communications from any of her readers offering suggestions concerning woman's welfare, criticisms of articles or inquiries concerning any matters relevant to her department. She should be addressed directly at 530 Elm Tree Lane, Lexington, Ky.

THE PASSING OF A NOBLE WOMAN

A great loss has come to the Christian Woman's Board of Missions in the death of its most able and beloved leader. Mrs. M. E. Harlan died at St. Louis on the morning of Tuesday, March 11, after an illness of only a few days. She left Indianapolis for St. Louis on Monday, March 3, seemingly in perfect health. After she was stricken, President McLean telegraphed to headquarters, that he had talked with her on Tuesday, and that he had never seen her look brighter and better.

She was taken suddenly ill on Friday, and was sent to the hospital, where she received every care that human skill and the tender care of friends could bestow. It is a source of thankfulness to her friends that her summons came in a place where the best surgical and hospital facilities were available, and that nothing was lacking for her comfort and healing. Her two sons, Earl and Paul Harlan, were with her, and several of the great company of her friends were at her bedside.

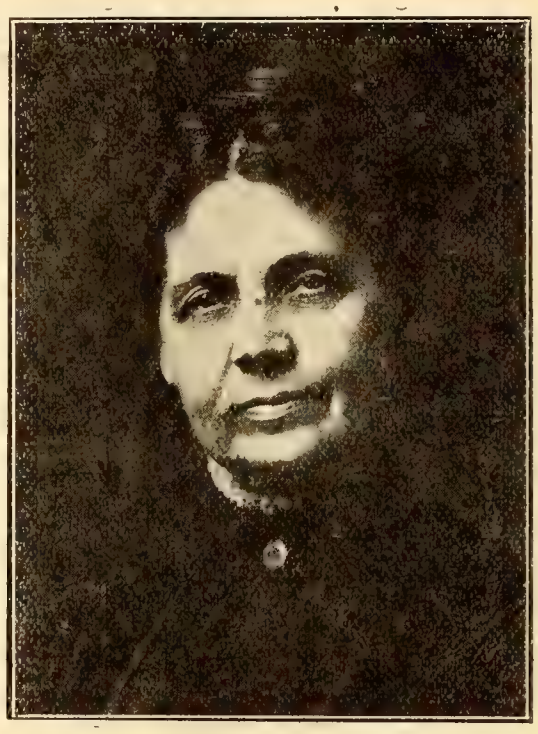
Those who knew Mrs. Harlan well often feared she was working too hard. Though seemingly of vigorous physique, she often had sudden and severe attacks of sickness, after protracted spells of hard work and responsibility. The mental and physical strain attending the issuing of the annual reports of the board was always a season of solicitude to those who loved her; her consuming passion for the work often lead her to over step the boundaries of her own strength and endurance.

And yet, in a way, her passing was to be desired; she was called by Him who giveth his beloved rest, in the very fulness of her service to His work. What greater prize could one ask than that! But a few weeks ago, another of our faithful and capable workers was called in like manner to her reward; in December, Mrs. Sara K. Yancey, for twelve years corresponding secretary of the Kentucky Christian Woman's Board of Missions, was making her round of C. W. B. M. Day addresses—she reached one of her appointments on Saturday evening and died before the dawn of Sunday morning.

Mrs. Harlan's special line of work was the oversight and development of the home base of the Woman's Board, and it has broadened in many ways under her leadership. One of her distinctive contributions to it was the inauguration and superintendence of the Jubilee Campaign, where our board co-operated with all the great women's organizations of other churches in a Coast to Coast series of meetings for foreign missions; this movement not only promoted the great cause for which it stood, but established a cordial acquaintance and fellowship with the women of other churches, which had been lacking in our work hitherto.

Another contribution, was a closer co-operation with the boards in our own church. The Secretaries' Association that she was attending when she was stricken, was one of the expressions of this wider and closer unity. She was the representative of the Christian Woman's Board of Missions on the Two Million Dollar Campaign Committee, and was full of plans for launching this great enterprise next fall. The last meeting of the executive committee that she attended showed in a striking way the growth of her department of the work—the whole of an all day's session was devoted to the consideration of the plans and problems of the home base of our work.

Mrs. Harlan's whole life was one of unbroken Christian service; in her girlhood at college, she was influential in organizing the first Young Women's Missionary Circle among us. After her marriage to Marion E. Harlan, she was untiring in her labors for the churches he served—even filling his pulpit in his absence, when it was unusual for a woman to do such a thing. She thus came to our work, equipped by the companionship of one of the noblest of our preachers, and of joint care with him of the churches to which he ministered. She has given our board nearly seven years of beautiful and whole-hearted service, and her love and her praise are in the hearts of thousands of women all over the land with whom she came in touch through her busy pen and persuasive voice. She had the crowning gift of knowing the human heart; she was all things to all women—wherever she went, she made friends for herself, and for the work.



Mrs. M. E. Harlan.

Her book of remembrance is written in loving and mourning hearts wherever the Christian Woman's Board of Missions is known; her imperishable epitaph is in her life of service for her Master. Of her, it may be truly said, in the words of the Good Book:

Her own works praise her in the gates.

A Reasonable Protest

The Mississippi Valley Woman Suffrage Conference holds its second meeting in St. Louis the first week in April. The first of these conferences was held in Chicago last spring, and representatives from sixteen states in the South and Middle West were present. In four of these states Kansas, Wisconsin, Ohio and Michigan, constitutional amendments were pending granting the franchise to women, which were to be voted on at the following November election. The Ohio and Wisconsin amendments failed of passage; in Kansas, full suffrage was granted to the women by a large majority; in Michigan, the amendment passed, and was thrown out by (as we believe) a fraudulent re-count of the ballots.

Within the past two months, constitutional amendments have passed the legislatures of three more states, and will be submitted to the people at a subsequent general election; in a number of other states, vigorous suffrage campaigns are being conducted. All of this makes woman suffrage loom large on the horizon, not only of its advocates, but of the public at large.

In view of these facts, as well as of the fact that in nine of our states women have equal political rights with men, the complaint in the following letter is not unreasonable. It is written by a well known woman, who has been a leader in religious and missionary work in our church for a long time. It seems hard, that ministers should use the pulpit to denounce a cause so dear to a large part of their congregations—especially when there is no opportunity given to answer and show the fallacy of the arguments advanced.

"Dear Mrs. Harrison: What can be done to reach those ministers of our church who use the pulpit for the denouncement of woman suffrage? Does it not seem hard that the ministers can speak against woman's cause when they have depended on women so largely for sympathy, service and support? I love the church and I have labored for it from earliest childhood. I love missionary work and will be true to Christ and the spread of his gospel till the end of life. But it really may quench the spirit of some good women to have men say from the pulpit that "there is no application of Bible texts to suffrage—and it is neither right nor expedient for women to vote. They should be true to their sacred calling, etc." Of course every argument could be answered but there is no opportunity. The one argument that every well read minister should have at his tongue's end is "The liberty of the individual is a principle of Christ's gospel." The application has ever cost strife and trouble. But the expediency should not concern us—the justice of our cause is enough now. If it is right, time will adjust conditions.

"Some men argue that women will not vote for temperance and hence should not be allowed to vote at all. I want to ask can they (men) decide questions of womanly fitness or right? Can good men afford to see this question, and line up with saloon keepers and white-slave traders? None of the last named classes ever did favor woman's suffrage. Preachers may believe that women will not be true at the polls, but men interested in degrading humanity never will believe it.

"Can we write to some of our leading brethren and ask them to speak out and help our cause?

"Years ago John A. Brooks, J. A. Lord, and other pastors, did not hesitate to speak for franchise when in or out of the pulpit. You will remember that when women began to speak in our conventions, J. B. Briney and others wrote against the custom in our church papers. I remember that though a young woman then, I wrote to him and asked him to see from my standpoint. We exchanged several letters and he was most courteous and just, and he ceased his objections—so far as I know. He has ever been a true friend of the Christian Woman's Board of Missions.

"Another time my dearly beloved brother, T. P. Haley, refused his pulpit to women. I pleaded with him to see from our standpoint, and he invited me to speak a number of times from his pulpit, and gave me his time in the Lord's Day service; he was a great power, and so true to us. Now you see my point? Could we not render more efficient service by visiting with our Christian editors or writing to them? I ask you because you know our people and love both causes—but they are really one."

Church Life

A Flagrant Inaccuracy Effectively Corrected.

Our readers will recall an article reprinted in The Christian Century from the London Christian World and presenting a blunt but, in the main, not unkind critique of the Disciples of Christ. One flagrant inaccuracy in a statement of fact, however, was patently incredible. The writer, Geoffrey Palmer, quoted an "Irish churchwoman" as reporting have heard a Disciple minister preach "a picturesquely American sermon on 'He that is not baptized shall be damned.'" Leslie W. Morgan, Disciple pastor at Hornsey, London, wrote to Mr. Palmer for the name of his informant. On receiving it he communicated with the lady and found that she had referred to a serman she had heard in Southport preached by James Small, the American evangelist now at work in England. Her impression was vague and uncertain as to just what Mr. Small did say. Upon submitting copies of her letter to the minister and officers of the Southport Church, they signed a statement, which, after a sentence of preamble, reads: "We hereby assert that no such teaching was given during the mission in October last as stated; and that if anyone has drawn any such conclusion from what was said his impression is wrong; and further that the repetition of such statement is a gross misrepresentation of the position of the Disciples of Christ." Mr. Small was also shown the letter and replied, in part, with the following flat denial: "I did not preach any such doctrine, and never have in a twenty-six years' ministry in the Church of Christ. I should look upon it as a terrible doctrine if I heard any man preach it . . . As to my interpretation of Mark xvi., 16, I emphatically deny that I ever drew the conclusion that a person unbaptized will be damned. I said that very evening that a man is not lost because he is not baptized." These statements were promptly communicated to the editor of the Christian World, and appeared in the issue of February 20, together with a letter from Mr. Palmer, saying: "I welcome, with enthusiasm, this official repudiation of a generally misunderstood sermon, and, of course, accept it without the slightest reservation." And he adds: "It does seem a pity, however, that such emphasis should have been placed upon immersion at an evangelistic service as to mislead such intelligent hearers." Mr. Morgan in recounting the incident in his parish monthly paper admits that it is indeed a "pity," and he does not wholly aquit the Disciples themselves of fault in creating the all too common misunderstanding. Without reflecting upon Mr. Small he declares that "we cannot throw the responsibility upon the hearers and say that they have no business to misunderstand." "We carry on our work professedly in the interests of Christian union, and where there are misunderstandings, disruption is often created instead of union, and thus the purpose for which we exist is thwarted." He quotes Mr. Small as saying that he has come to feel that whenever he preaches an argumentative sermon on baptism "the temperature of the meeting is perceptibly lowered." Hence the evangelist has abandoned a strong sermon on the subject which he used years ago. "Of this we are convinced," adds Mr. Morgan, "that it would be better to leave the people forever unbaptized [we presume he means "unimmersed"—Editors] than to bring them to see it in a distorted light."

A Disciple's Church Before the Disciples.

Harlem Avenue Church, Baltimore, whose celebration of the twenty-fifth anniversary of the building of its present house of worship was recorded in these columns last week, is one of the oldest congregations among the Disciples. It was founded in 1805, four years before the famous Declaration and Address was written by Thomas Campbell, by a disciple of the Haldanes who had emigrated from Scotland to this country. Several years later while Alexander Campbell was yet a Baptist he visited the congregation soliciting funds to help in the building of a Baptist church at Wellsbury, W. Va. It early became identified with the Disciples movement and at its final incorporation in 1849 bore the beautiful name of The Congregation of the Disciples of Jesus Christ." The anniversary addresses delivered by former pastors C. K. Marshall, of Richmond, Ky., James Vernon, of Henderson, Ky., B. A. Abbott, of St. Louis, Mo., and W. E. Sweeney of Evansville, Ind., were listened to by large congregations. The present pastor, H. C. Armstrong, is greatly encouraged in his leadership of this church.

"The Heart of a Man."

First Church, Paris, Ill., gave a men's banquet, Thursday evening, March 6. There were 200 present. Edgar D. Jones, of Bloomington, Ill., delivered the address of the evening, on "The Heart of a Man." The local papers speak in glowing terms of the speaker and his speech. The Paris Church is the strongest in Edgar County. It has within its fellowship a large number of the most representative men in eastern Illinois. H. H. Peters has been with this congregation only three months. The church has had two pastors during the past nine years, Finis Idleman, now of Des Moines, Ia., and W. W. Sniff, now of New Castle, Penn. Mr. Peters solemnized twenty-three marriages and conducted thirteen funerals the first three months of his pastorate there.

Paris, Mo., and F. W. Allen.

How fine a spirit of Christian unity already obtains at Paris, Mo., where Frank Waller Allen is pastor, was indicated by the fact that the Presbyterian pastor sang in the choir, all the other pastors of the city assisted in other ways, and all prayer-meetings and Sunday evening services were merged in united services, while Graham Frank, of Liberty, Mo., was conducting evangelistic meetings in the Paris Christian Church. In fourteen days there were fifty-four accessions. Men and boys were in the majority among the converts. Mr. Allen saw much of the work of his seven years' pastorate there come to fruition. He speaks glowingly of Mr. Frank's preaching.

Presbyterian Text for Disciples' Plea.

I. J. Cahill, Ohio state secretary, has published a tract on the program of the Disciples of Christ. An interesting feature of the tract is that the author takes for his text a statement from the minutes of the General Assembly of the Presbyterian Church for 1900 which he quotes as follows: "The object of the foreign missionary enterprise is not to perpetuate on the mission field the denominational distinctions of Christendom, but to build up on Scriptural principles and methods, the kingdom of our Lord Jesus Christ." This, says Mr. Cahill, the Disciples of Christ undertake to do in the homeland and in all Christendom as well as in heathendom.

Silver Anniversary to be Celebrated.

Fifty years of church life will be celebrated March 28, by the Iowa City, Ia., congregation which was organized March 28, 1863. J. Madison Williams, for many years the pastor of Iowa City church, now residing in Des Moines, will be present as the guest and speaker of honor in the celebration. On the Sundays approaching the anniversary special addresses are being given by the pastor, C. C. Rowlison and by Dr. J. L. Deming, the new professor of sociology in the state university at Iowa City. Professor Deming came there recently from Yale and has attached himself in the spirit of service to the Disciples congregation.

Secretaries Honor President McLean.

At the secretaries' meeting held in St. Louis and reported in last week's Christian Century, it became known that the date of the thirty-first anniversary of President A. McLean's relation with the Foreign Missionary Society was coincident with the opening day of the convention. An informal luncheon was prepared with Dr. McLean as guest of honor, and toasts were proposed in which his high character was lauded and his unique service to the Disciples of Christ appreciated.

President Frederick D. Kershner, of the Texas Christian University is to be the chief speaker at the Kansas Ministerial Institute to be held in Emporia, April 6-9. He has announced a very attractive series of subjects, on the main theme of "Christian Idealism." They are as follows: "Christian Idealism Defined," "Religious Interpretation of Christian Idealism," "Christian Idealism and Union" "Christian Idealism in the Home," "Christian Idealism and the Individual," "Christian Idealism and Social Service."

"The state secretary was privileged to be with them on that day, and largely owing to the preparation of Brother Pearce and the Marion people the full amount asked for, $3,500, was raised"—this is the refreshingly modest way in which a dedication service at Marion, Ind., is reported by Secretary I. J. Cahill. He gives the pastor, C. A. Pearce, full credit for the thorough way in which the people were prepared to make their offerings.

Cedar Rapids, Iowa, First Church gave an "anticipatory banquet" recently looking forward to the dedication of their beautiful new building in August. C. H. Morris, pastor at Marshalltown, Iowa, was the chief speaker. The pastor, Walter M. White announced that the dedicatory services would be followed by an evangelistic meeting led by E. E. Violett, and said that to expect an increase in their membership of 500 persons was not putting a strain upon his faith. The congregation is enthusiastic.

The total offerings from October 1 to March 1, for Ministerial Relief, amounted to $13,037 against $4,951 for the same period last year, a gain of $8,086. Of this, $5,000 is in the Permanent Fund, leaving a gain of $3,086 for current use. All of this is needed says Secretary W. R. Warren, to take care of the roll of veterans, which has been increased by eighteen since October, and the enlarged payments which have been made to meet their actual necessities.

Dr. C. M. Chilton seems to have gotten into a sort of "evangelistic gait" this season and can't stop. After conducting a four weeks' meeting in his own First Church, St. Joseph, Mo., he preached for three weeks in a Hannibal, Mo., meeting and now finds himself at King Hill church in St. Joseph, where he is rendering unselfish service to a daughter congregation with excellent results.

A "New Life Meeting" began March 9 and will continue for two weeks at South Street Church, Springfield, Mo., conducted by F. L. Moffett, the pastor. The purpose of the meeting is not simply to win recruits to the church but "to instill new spiritual life into the church members and to encourage them to adopt systematic church attendance."

The disintegration of the membership of a Universalist Church at Ottawa, Ill., opened an opportunity for the Disciples to secure a house of worship in that city and to establish a congregation. The building was purchased for $1,525 at public auction by agents of the Illinois state board. A minister will be appointed to this work immediately.

S. G. Inman, missionary leader of the "People's Institute" at Piedros Negros just across the line in Mexico, writes to say that he thinks there will be no harm come to his own and other American families there for provision has been made, in anticipation of the opening of hostilities, to convey them quickly to the American side.

Announcement is made of the marriage next May of Miss Lura V. Thompson of Carthage, Ill., and J. W. Porter, a former pastor of the church at Rutland, Ill. Miss Thompson has been state secretary of the Woman's Missionary Society in Illinois for a number of years and is greatly esteemed among the churches.

J. H. O. Smith, pastor First Church, Oklahoma City, was asked by a delegation of his townsmen attending a cattlemen's convention at Amarillo, Tex., to accompany them and act as spokesman in presenting the invitation of Oklahoma City for the next convention.

The Ohio state convention to be held at Lima in May, will devote less time to speech-making and more to business discussion than in previous years and will give a place of special prominence to the rural church.

"One thousand pupils in attendance and one thousaand dollars in the offering" is the Easter Sunday aim of Terre Haute, Ind., Sunday-school of which George Darsie is pastor.

Charles Reign Scoville, evangelist, is now holding a union revival meeting at Lincoln, Nebr. He was called there with especial reference to a pending local option battle.

Kearney, Nebr., church dedicated a house of worship costing $28,000 on March 9. Geo. L. Snively assisted the pastor, A. L. Zink, in raising $12,500 on that day.

In the death of Mrs. George Pasfield, First Church, Springfield, Ill., loses one of its most abundant financial givers and one of its finest Christian personalities.

The Northern Illinois Ministerial Institute will be held at Lincoln April 9 and 10.

Church Extension Notes

At the meeting of the Church Extension Board on March 4, the following churches were promised loans: Porterville, Calif. First Church, $1,000, $600 increase; Hazelwood, Ind., $2,000; Louisville, Ky., Flora Heights Church, $750; Estacada, Ore., First Church $400; Coshocton, O., $4,000; Caddo, Okla., First Church, $800.

The following loans were closed during the month of February: San Dimas, Calif., (General Fund) $7,500; Altoona, Pa., second loan (Frankfort, Ky. Church Fund) $1,500; Blacksburg, Va., (Geo. F. Rand Fund) $1,250; Seymour, Ia., (General Fund) $3,500; Baldwin, Ga., (Y. P. S. C. E. Fund) $300; Corning, Calif., (T. W. Phillips Fund) $1,500; Alma, Nebr. (Kansas City, Mo., Independence Boulevard Church Fund) $750; Doland, S. D., (General Fund) $1,400; Total $17,700.

During the month of February the Associate Secretary, John H. Booth, made a tour of the Oklahoma and Texas churches with splendid results in securing payments on loans that were due. Mr. Booth is doing remarkable work in this department. During March the Associate Secretary makes a tour of the churches of Southwest Missouri with District Secretary Jones and Grant K. Lewis in a campaign of education and helpfulness to the churches.

Ten Big Reasons Why

BETHANY GRADED LESSONS are being adopted by so many of the best schools among Disciples

1. There is more to them—at least a third more—than is contained in any other series.
2. They are rich, vital and full of suggestion to teacher and pupil.
3. They are free from the sectarian spirit.
4. They are soundly and fervently evangelical.
5. They are truly artistic in all their illustrations.
6. They are printed on better paper with better binding and in better taste than any other series.
7. Every lesson writer is an expert of interdenominational reputation.
8. They are a monument to the modern spirit of unity—a dozen leading denominations have co-operated to produce them and are now using them.
9. The Disciples possess full editorial rights, through the editor, Charles Clayton Morrison.
10. Every Disciple school that uses them participates in and promotes a great Christian union enterprise.

India Letter

Mr. Grainger reports six more baptisms in Mungeli. The work is doing nicely in that station. There is a caste of people known as the "Satnamis" who are much more responsive towards Christianity than most of the castes of India. It is from among these that converts are coming. Many of them are poor, which does not matter greatly, as those who have more wealth usually have to abandon it all when they become Christian. Mr. Grainger hopes to see many more in that locality entering into the fold of Christ.

One of the interesting works of the mission is the Women's and Bibies' Home in Kulphar. Mrs. Lohr has charge of this work and is assisted by Miss Vance. There are over one hundred women and children in this institution. Many of them are exceedingly ignorant women. It is surprising though what a change a short residence in the institution makes upon them. They learn to do sewing, though many of them have never handled a needle before. Each woman is required to do two hours field work daily. This work is the means of keeping them all in robust health. Some time is also given to school work and they are taught reading and writing. The women are all well disciplined and very much attached to their home. After a short residence they usually become Christian. The supporters of this work should feel every encouragement in regard to it.

The Divinity of Christ

BY EDWARD SCRIBNER AMES

Is a popular statement of both the theological and practical truths centering in our evangelical faith in Christ.

It is scholarly, but not technical.

It lifts the problem of the nature and character of Christ out of the setting of the old-time dogmatism and places it in the light of the more empirical, human and meaningful thought of our own day.

Its Treatment of Unitarianism is original, fresh, illuminating. A single chapter entitled, "Why I am not a Unitarian" will furnish any reader, conservative or liberal, a new point of view.

It is glowing with religious earnestness. It is a living word spoken to the hearts and souls of living people.

Appreciations

Professor George A. Coe says: "These sermons display a remarkable union of intellectual boldness and spiritual warmth. I know of nothing else in print that brings out quite so clearly the positive religious values that can be reached by a rigorous application to Christian dogmas of the functional and valuational point of view. Even readers who cannot accept Professor Ames' position at all points must agree that such a book helps to clear the air, and to focus attention at the right point."

The Indianapolis News says: "One would go far to find a finer interpretation of religious thought and experience in terms of spiritual laws. Mr. Ames is emphatically a man with a message."

The Chicago Inter-Ocean says: "Six sermons full of broad humanity."

The Watchman says: "Professor Ames is avowedly a "liberal" in theology but his liberalism seems to be of a wholesome kind, in the sense that he is less concerned about doctrines and creeds than he is about service and the helping of people to their best life."

The Independent says: "Dr. Ames does not deny being a liberal, but strongly objects to being styled a 'Unitarian', quoting with enthusiasm a saying of one of the early leaders of his denomination: 'I am neither a Unitarian nor a Trinitarian, but strive to be simply a Christian.' The sermons are thoughtful, moderate in tone and straightforward in expression."

Unity says: "Those who were privileged to listen to these sermons must have found their spiritual natures quickened."

The Advance says: "These are strong, virile sermons, appealing to the reason and satisfying the heart."

Professor Edward C. Moore, of Harvard, says: "It is a very clear and convincing statement of the issue as it stands in the minds of modern men. It makes us realize how the old formulation of the question has become obsolete, no one any longer states the question in the old terms. Dr. Ames has availed himself in admirable fashion of the opportunity for a new statement of the case, and the spirit in which he writes must convey confidence and reassurance to all."

How often have many lady readers longed for the death of the old stove-heated sad iron and the hard, tiresome, hot days work it means to them each week—for the man that cut ironing day in two.

He lives—a genius of Cincinnati has invented a device that is proving a blessing to women folks. Made ironing day troubles all over—changed—there's a new way of ironing—astonishing but true. The family ironing can now be done in less than half the time—less than half the work, and with one-tenth the usual fuel expense. No running back and forth between stove and ironing board—iron where you please—you do not need to stay in the hot kitchen—iron in any room—on porch—under shade of tree if you wish. No drudgery—that is past. Goodbye to the old style stove heated irons. The easy way of ironing is here to bless our dear women.

SEE HOW SIMPLE, DIFFERENT, EASY

Light the iron; set it for the amount of heat desired. See how rapidly the hot iron slides over the damp clothes, ironing and pressing them quickly and easily, the smooth point in and out of the gathers, tucks and ruffles, drying them as it goes. Nothing to delay; it is hot, keeps hot, runs easily and smoothly. Iron on the table all the time, one hand on the iron—the other to smooth, turn and fold the clothes. It is a fast iron, you unconsciously move quickly to keep up with it. You can go as fast as you choose, and the clothes are ironed better and in one-half the time.

No waiting with this iron. Go right along, one thing after another. Irons all kinds of goods. No time wasted—iron right heat; regulate it to the required amount for any kind of ironing. If you want more heat, turn it on; if you want less heat, turn some off. Always ready for use when you want it. Just light the iron and go ahead, you don't need to build a fire in the kitchen range and wait for three or four irons to heat. With the Self-Heating Iron you have the iron when you want it, where you want it, and with the heat you want; whether you want to do a big ironing, or whether you want to press and iron only a few pieces. Sounds strange, may be hard to believe—but listen, the writer saw it demonstrated—it's all true. No experiment—going on daily. THOUSANDS ARE IN USE and customers are delighted. It not only irons white goods, finest laces, curtains, but anything that can be ironed by the old method. Saves time, fuel, health and money. Well and durably made, will last for years. Right size, right weight, right shape. Perfectly safe—anyone can use it.

HUNDREDS A WEEK

While at the factory in Cincinnati, the writer found that this invention has caused remarkable excitement all over the U. S. FACTORY ALREADY RUSHED WITH THOUSANDS OF ORDERS. Evidently the company's agents are making big money, as they offer big commissions to active agents, and will also send a free sample to those who mean business.

It will be noticed from the engraving that this iron is different from any other iron. Construction very simple—easily and safely operated by anyone, and built on the latest scientific principles.

It will be seen that the Standard Self-Heating Iron is complete in itself, simple and compact in construction. Carries its own fuel, makes its own gas, burns its own gas. The reservoir is placed above the iron and under the handle, convenient for filling, yet out of the way, does not interfere with the ironing. By an ingenious device, when lighting it is only necessary to open a small slide which can be again closed, thus retaining all the heat in the iron. With our new burner the flame is evenly distributed over the bottom of the iron, insuring a steady, regular heat. The valve for regulating the heat is on the outside, under the handle; turning this one way or the other gives more or less heat. No attachments, connecting pipes, no elevated tanks projecting to be in the way when operating.

The handle is of wood and requires no cloth or holder; the iron burns perfectly, standing on heel when not in use.

CUSTOMERS PRAISE IT

The writer was shown hundreds of letters from actual users of this grand invention, proving it a positive success and giving splendid satisfaction. The following extracts may interest our readers: Alex Stalker, N. Y. writes: "The Self-Heating Iron received some time ago and will say right here it is the most useful and money-saving device that was ever made. My wife has just finished a large ironing in two hours that usually took her half a day with the old stove-heating irons, and the house is cool. It is certainly just the only iron made. We want the agency." W. P Farnum: After receiving your iron and giving it a thorough trial it will be a perfect success. My wife is enthusiastic over the work it does and the economy in its use." Mrs. J. E. King, Ill.: "Received iron yesterday in good shape. Well pleased with it. Want the agency." J. N Newby, Ill.: "Find it to be all you claim for it." Mrs. Josephine Route, N. Y.: "Received the iron O K. and did my ironing with it yesterday. I like it very much." A E Covert, N. Y.: "Have lighted it several times already and find I can do ironing so much quicker and cleaner than in the old way. Think it is the best thing I have ever had in my house." Miss Roxie Sheete, N.C.: "The 2 irons received and am delighted. Have turned off our regular ironer and will do the ironing ourselves, now. Sold the extra iron to the first lady I showed it to." Mrs Watson C. McNall, N. Y.: "I am more than pleased with it and its work. It is not a bit clumsy. It is a delight to use it." Mrs Cora Wright, Ill.: "I received the iron Saturday and like it fine." Mrs C. M. Winstead, Ky.: "I received my iron about three weeks ago. Like it better than anything I ever saw in the way of irons."

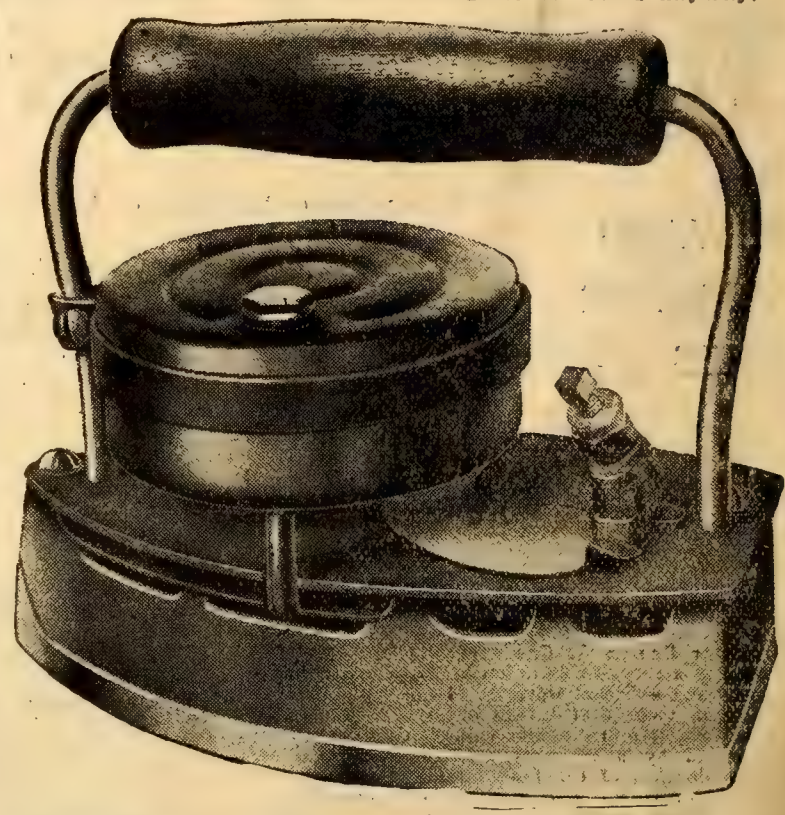
This invention must, indeed, be wonderful, yes, a God-send, that cuts ironing-day in less than half and cuts fuel expense to almost nothing.

The writer personally saw this iron in operation and after using one in his own home is delighted with it and after a thorough investigation can say to our readers that the Standard Self-Heating Iron, made by the Cincinnati firm, seems to delight the users and the makers guarantee every one.

HOW TO GET ONE

It is not sold in stores. Write to the C. BROWN MFG. CO. 1075 Brown Bldg., Cincinnati, O. the only manufacturers of this grand invention. Send no money—simply your name and address, and they will send you circulars giving full description, and testimonials from users. The price of the Standard Self-Heating Iron, complete, ready for use, with full directions, so anyone can operate it, is only $4.50. If you prefer to order at once, do so—you won't be disappointed, as the makers fully guarantee every iron. They are reliable, have been in business for years, and do just as they agree.

Don't fail to send for circulars anyway.



FREE SAMPLE TO AGENTS

The firm wants agents, salesmen, managers, both men and women, all, or part of time, home or traveling, take orders and appoint agents. All year business—experience not necessary. This iron sells on merit—sells itself. SPLENDID INDUCEMENTS, $30.00 to $50.00 a week. Standard Iron is new—nothing else like it. World unsupplied; five million to be sold. Every home a prospect. Price low. All can afford it. Where operated, people stop, get excited, watch it. How they do sell. Even 2 or 3 a day gives $27.00 to $40.00 a week profit; 6 sales a day is fair for an agent; some will sell a dozen in one day. Show 10 families—sell 8. Not sold in stores. Why should any of our readers be hard up or poor with such a chance at hand? Send no money. Write postal today for description, agents selling plan. How to get FREE SAMPLE.

Disciples Publication Society

THE DISCIPLES PUBLICATION SOCIETY is a corporation chartered under the laws of Illinois. It is organized for the purpose of publishing books, Sunday School literature and a weekly religious newspaper. It has no capital stock. Its profits are not to go to individuals but to be appropriated to advance the cause of religious education, especially the higher education of the Christian ministry. The term "religious education" is regarded as an ideal common to Sunday Schools, missionary societies, colleges, seminaries and universities, and other organizations that promote Christian progress through Christian education. The Society through its trustees has purchased the entire assets and good will of the New Christian Century Company (including the subscription list and good will of The Christian Century; a contract of participation in the interdenominational syndicate for publishing the Bethany Graded Lessons; a contract of membership in the United Religious Press; all books, Sunday School supplies and other stock on hand; all accounts and bills receivable; besides assuming liability for all accounts and bills payable), for $16,000 and has executed its notes to that amount which have been accepted by the stock-holders of the New Christian Century Company in payment for their property. To provide capital for enlarging the business the trustees are issuing 5 per cent bonds in the amount of $50,000, retirable after five years, to be sold to persons interested in the ideals of The Christian Century. It is believed at the present time that not more than $25,000 of these bonds need be sold in order to put the Society on a sound profit earning basis. Subscriptions for the purchase of these bonds are now being solicited by C. C. Morrison and H. L. Willett, editors of The Christian Century. During Dr. Willett's absence in the Orient correspondence may be addressed exclusively to Mr. Morrison. Full information as to all details will be given upon inquiry. The essential purpose of the transaction and proposals herein described is to provide a way for the general brotherhood of the Disciples of Christ to buy The Christian Century and its publishing house and to pay for them by patronizing them. The bonds and notes are to be retired out of the profits earned by the Society. The purchasers of bonds, therefore, will stand, with the holders of notes, in the position of sustainers or supporters of the enterprise while the brotherhood's patronage is paying for it and increasing its value. The question of defining the membership of the Disciples Publication Society is still open, and upon it the organizers will be glad to receive suggestions. It is the purpose to make it thoroughly democratic and representative. The five trustees named by the charter will act for the Society until the basis of membership has been determined and the members elected.

A GREAT AND POPULAR CHURCH MUSIC BOOK

The New Praise Hymnal

By GILBERT J. ELLIS and J. H. FILLMORE

The New Praise Hymnal comes as near being the ideal church hymnal for the present day as could well be conceived. It is a handsome book, dignified in appearance and make-up. It embraces in its contents as nearly everything demanded to-day as could be gotten into a book of 600 pages.

The New Praise Hymnal is practical in every way; everything in it is available for use in the average congregation. It contains what is used by the most advanced churches. The setting of the hymns and music is engaging to the eye and pleasant to read and sing.

It is a book that grows in favor as it is used. New beauties are discovered from time to time as its pages are tested. The hymns and tunes of the church universal are found in The New Praise Hymnal, also the best available Gospel Songs that the modern church has found to be necessary to its various activities.

The sales of The New Praise Hymnal are larger now than they have ever been. The sales are increasing day by day. This means that it meets the demands better than any other book. Sample Copies mailed for examination.

Prices: Silk Cloth Sides, Leather Back, at $70 per 100; Vellum Cloth, at $50 per 100.

Foreign Mission News

A friend in California sent $5,000 and a friend in Texas $1,000 last week on the annuity plan. We hope other friends in California and other states will remember the great work in the same way.

The church at Huntington, W. Va., has raised its living-link fund and indeed think they will go up to $800 this year.

F. C. Buck, Luchowfu, China, says: "The spirit which now prevails in China is quite different from that which was before the Revolution. There is now the spirit of hope among the people and a kindly disposition characterizes their relationships with us and our work. China now feels that she is well on the way to progress."

The Foreign Society has determined to build a hospital in Manila as soon as the funds can be secured. This is an important step. It will be of tremendous influence and will accomplish great good among the people.

First Church, Akron, Ohio, sends $750 cash and about that much more will be received from this great missionary church. This does not include the Children's Day Offering. The Sunday-school supports a living-link by itself.

Sir John Kirk, who went out to Africa with Livingstone as the scientist on the Zambesi Expedition in 1860, still lives and resides in retirement at Sevenoaks, England. A daughter of Livingstone resides in Scotland, his native land.

The celebration of David Livingstone's one hundreth anniversary was observed on Sunday, March 15. This has been a great inspiration to the churches. The books read and the sermons preached on the life of this great missionary hero have lifted the churches to a higher spiritual plane. One writes: "I want to thank the Foreign Society for this great missionary campaign on Livingstone. The unveiling of the great hero's portrait thrilled our people. I am a better man from having studied Livingstone's life afresh. My people are on a higher level."

The new Children's Day Exercise is a gem. Half of it is a program on the life of G. L. Wharton, pioneer missionary to India, closing with the unveiling of his portrait. The lithograph portrait will be furnished free to all Sunday-schools observing Children's Day.

STEPHEN J. COREY, Secretary.

Missions and Our List of Heroes

Of late there have been additions to the list of reasons for the work of foreign missions. We are called to remember certain by-products of missionary endeavor. We are told that missions improve sanitation, tend to diminish the dangers to civilization from infectious disease, promote commerce, and spread civilization. Beside which, we are reminded, they do the thing which primarily they were established to do, in adding to the number of redeemed souls. To this list of incidental benefits let there be added another. Missions are adding to the world's list of heroes.

That list is none too long. It has lengthened slowly and by various methods of increment. Round the rim of history with its monotonous horizon of human weakness and timidity stand out solitary figures here and there—brave Horatius on the bridge, intrepid Leonidas at the pass of Thermopylae, Jim Bludsoe at his engine on the burning steamer, the boy upon the burning deck, and here and there another and another. Let none of them be forgotten. In olden time every boy in Greece had to learn the full list of names of the brave three hundred who died at their post at Thermopylae; three hundred names were not too many to add in one feat of memory to the too short list of heroes of the world.

There is no justification of war; but insofar as any good word can be said for it, it is this, that through war with all its cruelty and barbarity the world has discovered names of those who counted not their lives dear unto themselves in the presence of an ideal.

The Crusades were a bloody and foolish undertaking, with free intermixture of fanaticism and licentiousness, but they gave to the world such names as Baldwin and Barbarossa and Richard of the Lion-heart.

The attempts to discover the poles have been terribly costly and commercially indefensible; but the English-speaking world is holding its head the higher to-day because of the exploits of Captain Scott and his associates.

Who that has ever witnessed a truly brave deed can forget it? The writer of this article was early on the scene of the Iroquois fire, and saw the first fireman enter the building by means of a ladder. When he was three-fourths up the ladder the heavy plate glass front above the main entrance bulged and broke outward, possibly by reason of the explosion of superheated air behind the proscenium arch; probably by reason of the very burst of flame and poisonous gas that killed hundreds of people in their seats. The fireman looked upward at that bulging glass and heard the heavy cracking sound as it fell outward, and leaned a little forward protecting his hands with his body, and received the full weight of the falling glass and lead upon his helmet and shoulders. He reeled upon the ladder, but recovered his hold, and climbed slowly up and disappeared in the jagged hole in the glass. There were no reporters there at that early moment. Few, comparatively, saw what was done, and it never received any official mention; but again and again the mind recalls the picture of that helmeted figure on the latter, reeling, bruised and cut, but pushing straight on to make a way for the men who followed with the hose.

Whose blood does not run more swiftly when he recalls some deed of heroism? Who does not grow more proud of his manhood when he remembers what brave deeds men have done? Nay, though heroism has been esteemed the monoply of men, who that has lived long or observed thoughtfully has failed to discover that heroes are not more in number than heroines; that women have added their full quota to the world's honor roll of the heroic?

Now, if missionaries were misguided and fanatical, this still would need to be said to their credit, that in an age when occasions of heroism have diminished by reason of the growth of peace, the missionaries have added brilliant names to the world's list of heroes. From the days when the mediaeval Church sent forth Augustine to England and Wilfrid to Germany, down to these very days in which we are living, there have been illustrious examples of sheer physical courage which challenged the admiration of the world.

But the enterprise of missions has given to the world examples of physical and moral courage combined. It has sent into the heart of dark continents and brought back the bodies of men who have died at their posts, and has enshrined them in the holiest spots in Christendom, because the world honors courage.

Carlyle had no wish to be buried in Westminster Abbey. Taken all in all he did not like the company he would have to keep there. He said there would be a great jail delivery there some day, and he did not want his bones disturbed by it. Men have broken into Westminster Abbey for their burial in various ways. There are some who have little right to be buried there on any classification of greatness. But among those whose right is undisputed is David Livingstone. Whether because he added to the world's knowledge, or moved forward the world's hope, or preached the world's salvation, he belongs there. And for one other reason his place is there. He added one to the list of the world's illustrious heroes.

Y. M. C. A. and the Word "Evangelical"

Active membership and official control of the Y. M. C. A. is limited to "evangelical" Christians. In 1869, the Portland (Me.) convention of the Y. M. C. A. gave a definition of the word "evangelical" as follows: "We hold those churches to be evangelical which, maintaining the Holy Scriptures to be the only infallible rule of faith and practice, do believe in the Lord Jesus Christ (the only begotten of the Father, of the Godhead bodily, and who was made sin for us though knowing no sin, bearing our sins in His own body on the tree) as the only name under heaven given among men whereby we must be saved from everlasting punishment, and to life eternal."

In 1907, nearly forty years after the Portland convention, a committee of fifteen was appointed by the Y. M. C. A. to "consider the desirability of rephrasing the definition of the word 'evangelical' as contained in the Portland basis." This question of rephrasing followed an agitation to extend active membership and official directorship in the Y. M. C. A. to churches whose evangelicalism was questioned. After six years of study, the committee has come to a conclusion not to recast the phraseology of 1869. And so, according to Y. M. C. A. authority, the word "evangelical" means in 1913 what it meant in 1869. On the other hand, fourteen members of the Y. M. C. A. Committee of Fifteen, admitted that the same policy may be enforced under a different form of words and recommended that associations be fully recognized which propose to accept active members from all the churches associated in the Federal Council of Churches of Christ in America.

Wanted: 900 Presbyterian Preachers!

The Presbyterian Church (U. S. A.) is now studying its Vacancy and Supply problem. Walter H. Houston, corresponding secretary of the Permanent Committee on Vacancy and Supply, is letting the Presbyterians know through their denominational organs that "the Presbyterian Church in the United States of America, at the present time, needs upwards of 900 additional pastors in order to properly man and carry on its regular work." There seems to be a genuine preacher-famine even in that wealthy and powerful denomination. There are 296 presbyteries in the denomination, but 234 presbyteries were selected for purposes of study by the Houston Committee. Of these 234 presbyteries scrutinized, actually only twenty-two presbyteries, less than 10 per cent, reported all fields supplied. Dr. Houston carefully figures out that these 234 presbyteries "in order to properly care for the work of the fields able to support ministers, actually need a total of 706 pastors in addition to those already serving within their bounds." Nothing but final figures from all presbyteries could possibly change Dr. Houston's estimate, he says, and these would have to "differ in a very remarkable degree" from the figures already obtained from 234 out of 296 presbyteries.

Henry Ward Beecher's Centennial

The centennial of Henry Ward Beecher's birthday will be June 24 of this year. Undoubtedly, it will be observed the nation over, since Mr. Beecher is justly regarded as perhaps the greatest preacher ever produced by this country. Dr. Lyman Abbott, Beecher's successor at Plymouth Church, thus estimates Mr. Beecher's art: "If the test of the oration or sermon is its perfection, whether of structure or expression, other orators have surpassed Mr. Beecher; if the test is the power of the speaker to impart to his audience his life, to impress on them his conviction, animate them with his purpose, and direct their action to the accomplishment of his end, then Mr. Beecher was the greatest orator I ever heard; and, in my judgment, whether measured by the immediate or permanent effects of his addresses, takes his place in the rank of the greatest orators of the world."

Henry Ward Beecher was born in Litchfield, Conn., on June 24, 1813. He was the son of the famous Rev. Lyman Beecher, a brother of Harriet Beecher Stowe, author of "Uncle Tom's Cabin." He graduated from Amherst in 1834. In his own witty language, "he stood next to the head of his class, but it was when the class was arranged in a circle." He studied theology under his famous father at Lane Theological Seminary, Cincinnati. In 1837 he was called to the pastorate of a small Presbyterian church at Lawrenceburg, Ind., at a salary of $400 a year, including aid from the Home Missionary Society. He lasted two years there, and in 1839 he became pastor of the Second Presbyterian Church, of Indianapolis, at a salary of $600 a year. It was here that he first became famous for his eloquence. New York City had heard of him. Strong churches were calling him, but he declined them all. Finally, he did accept a call to a newly organized parish in 1847. It was Plymouth Church. He remained there forty years, dying in 1887.

Mr. Beecher's services to the nation at a critical time in 1863, endeared him to the Lincoln administration. He went to England at the request of the administration in 1863 to vindicate with all his commanding eloquence the Lincoln policy in the war for the Union. In 1865 he delivered an oration at Fort Sumter, on the anniversary of its fall, at the request of the government. He was one of the founders of The Independent. He even tried his hand at novel-writing, when in 1866 he published "Norwood." a novel of New England life. But it was as a preacher, that he will be chiefly remembered.

Athansiam Creed Unpopular in England

The Church of England has three creeds in her prayer-book—the Apostles', the Nicean and the Quicunque Vult or, as it is erroneously but popularly called, the Athanasian Creed. For more than a millennium this "pæan of intellectual orthodoxy" has thundered out its horrific wrath against Arianism in Europe. The Church of England has treasured it for centuries as of inestimable value in keeping her clergy intellectually straight. The Protestant Episcopal Church, the American child of the Church of England, felt from the very first that the Separatists, the Puritans and the Anabaptists of the early colonies would not stand for its presumptuous "damnatory clauses." In October 1784 in New York City, representatives of the Episcopal Church from Pennsylvania, New York, New Jersey, Deleware, Maryland, Virginia and Connecticut convened and conferred together. There and then the so-called "Creed of St. Anthanasius" was quietly dropped during a revision of the prayer-book. While the Church of England in the colonies could and did adapt itself to American conditions, and Americanized itself as much as possible after the surrender of Cornwallis, the Church of England in Great Britain continued its traditions. There was no great need then to drop the Quicunque Vult. But the need is being felt now, nearly 130 years after the Episcopal Church in this country, her own daughter in the faith and "succession," had felt it and heeded it. From an orthodox point of view, there is no particular theological objection to this creed. But while its theology may be correct enough, according to trinitarian standards, its religion is certainly inferior to its theology. More and more, the "Athanasian Creed" is striking the average Englishman as a case of bad religion. Its harsh, damnatory tone and preface is becoming offensive to English ears. Already, a growing sentiment is becoming crystallized in open protest. It is strongly felt to be out of joint with the spirit of the age. As a test of modern orthodoxy, it is as unnecessary as it is exclusive. Worst of all, it is clearly felt to be a discord in public worship.

The Luxury of an Episcopate.

There is a "grave situation" in the Methodist Episcopal Church, caused by an uncomfortable failure of its funds to provide the support of its bishops. By an act of the last General Conference of that church, the support of the missionary bishops was taken from the foreign mission fund and placed upon the episcopal fund. This meant a larger demand upon the episcopal fund. And yet, in the face of this increased demand, the reported receipts for the fund in the last fiscal year were $10,815 less than in the year preceding. The congregations are assessed on account of this episcopal fund one and three-fourths per cent of the amount paid for pastor's salaries. Verily, our Northern Methodist brethren are beginning to feel apparently that the episcopate is a luxury. The estimate for the year 1913 reveals that it will take $243,810.88 to carry the espiscopate. The high cost of the episcopate is divided as follows: Salaries, house rent, stenographic expenses of all bishops, $202,416; traveling expenses of all bishops, $24,815.49; allowances to widows of bishops, $6,212.50; moving expenses (this year) $6,679; office rent, attendance upon anniversaries, printing and sundries, $3,787.89. Total, $243,810.88. Let non-episcopal churches take what comfort they can from these figures.

Interchurch Comity at Worcester

The Congregationalists and Methodists of Worcester through their pastors have entered the following compact: "We, the pastors of Methodist and Congregational churches of the City of Worcester, the district superintendent of the Methodist church and the president of the Worcester City Missionary Society hereby make a joint declaration that it is our intention in the future to take no steps toward the extension of Christian work in Worcester until representatives of the two denominations shall have fully consulted together." The Congregationalist, reporting the compact says to Christians of other cities: "Go and do thou likewise!"

Balaam: The Wasting Conscience

The view that Balaam betrayed his conscience is not held by all students of the Old Testament. There is a recent study of Balaam by George Adam Smith in the Expositor. I quote from it the following paragraphs which present the seer in a more favorable light than that in which Christianity has usually seen him.

"Balaam is essentially an Arab seer of an early type, the type which combined the priest's office of ritual, the diviner's reliance upon spells and lots, and the prophet's use of ecstasy and trance. Some of these men rose to great fame in Arabia, and were frequently called from a great distance, as Balaam was called by Balak, to assist chiefs or tribes who were in difficulty. One of the principle functions for which they were employed was to curse the foes of their employers; and this was regarded as a sacred function of divine efficacy, and was accompanied by sacrifices and other rites and by the reading of omens and the casting of lots."

"To such practices our text states that Balaam was accustomed. He himself directs the building of altars and the elaborate sacrifices which precede his oracles, and he goes to seek for omens. Observe also in Chapter twenty-three, that when one site for these performances proves inauspicious and fails to compel him to curse Israel, he consents on Balak's motion to change the stage on the chance that his message may change with it. That is a resource characteristic of paganism all the world over; and along with other features of the story proves the writer's fidelity to the religious conditions of the time."

"But while continuing to try all these, his professional rites and shifts, Balaam holds true to one thing, that he will only speak the word which God shall speak to him. To this he is constant, making it plain both before he will consent to come with Balak's messengers and throughout the course of gambling artifices which after his coming are employed to influence his message. His faithfulness is rewarded and his patience to listen receives an answer. The word comes to him, and it is a word not to curse but to bless."

"On what does Balaam base the conviction for which he has waited so impartially, and which when it arrives is strong enough to overwhelm his former practices and ideas? He rests it on the fact that God has already blessed Israel. There is no use in him, Balaam, fighting against a Divine Fact. That is the whole matter—very simple and very clear."

The early Hebrew seers were like their Arab kinsmen. They were busy with ritual and with divination by omens and lots. "Such men, bred like Balaam in more or less servile relations to the truth, subject in many ways to the superstitions and false science of their age, God lifted out of their slavery and, in the words of Christ, made them His friends. They enjoyed, as they tell us, a close communion with Himself. They were forgiven and they were trusted afresh by His Grace, past all their deserts or abilities. They were steeped in His purity, His patience and His love. He led them into the secrets of His nature and His will. He made them partners with Himself in His Passion for men. By their own sufferings for the sins of others, He gave them an understanding of His very heart; and they felt how it was not only full of travail for the spiritual victory of His children, but itself bore to the uttermost weight the shame and misery of their sins and defeats."

If Balaam then is no longer for us all an example of a wasting conscience, he shows us how to respect our sense of right. An example of that sort is more useful than one of a man who missed his opportunity. We wrong our conscience when we have no great purpose to which our lives are dedicated or when having a purpose we are caused to swerve from it by love of pleasure or dread of pain. Every day we are tempted to forget our high calling. Both failure and success are temptations. If we fail, we may say, "What's the use? There is a little pleasure at hand, why reject it for the sake of some future enjoyment that may never come?" If we succeed, we are in danger of overemphasizing the externals of power and place and of ignoring the righteousness of the heart. Again, in a world where differences of opinion obtain as to what is right, it is difficult to hold opinions of our own and at the same time grant to others the right to think for themselves. Neither the opinionated man nor the man without convictions has the right sort of conscience. [Midweek Service, April 2. Num. 22-41; 31:16; Jude 11.]

Church Sends Greetings to President Wilson

President Woodrow Wilson's Inaugural Address promises to become a classic, possibly ranking alongside of Lincoln's Gettsburg speech. If the Prophet Amos had been making such an address, it is hard to see how the prophet could have done better. The address is fired peculiarly with the prophetic spirit of Amos. It is a sermon. Moral passion distinguished it more even than its literary excellence. It is, in effect, a challenge to the Christian manhood of the nation by an unmistakably Christian statesman. It is therefore fitting that the Federal Council of the Churches of Christ in America, should at the outset of the President's administration greet him as follows:

"To Hon. Woodrow Wilson, President of the United States: The Federal Council of the Churches of Christ in America extends to you the good will and the prayerful sympathy of the Churches of Christ, and tenders you the serious and earnest co-operation of the forces represented by the churches, as you take up the task, as the chief magistrate of the nation, of guiding the moral forces of the people, and of the leadership of the nations of the world.

"Your warm and sympathetic sense of our democracy; your conviction expressed in so many ways, both by utterance and execution, that our social order must be fashioned after the Kingdom of God as taught by Jesus Christ; together with your public faithfulness and your personal faith, lead the churches of the nation to look with confidence to the performance of the serious and solemn duties of the coming years.

"The beginning of your first Quadrennium as President is almost coincident with the beginning of the Second Quadrennium of the Federal Council. While you are planning for these four years, the Federal Council is also projecting for the same term of years, larger movements in the interest of the spirit and realization of Christian unity expressed by the Council. It is to be hoped that, without unwise embarrassment, with both sympathy and discrimination, with social vision and social emotion, the political forces of the nation, and its moral forces as embodied in the churches of Christ, may feel and serve together for the social and spiritual wellbeing of the people."

Sorrow Without Hope

In the midst of the expectant hope and joy which stirs the world at Easter time, a life passed into the unknown, leaving to the sorrowing ones here an estate and three dying wishes. Those who loved and sorrowed were, according to these wishes, to be denied the sweet privileges of laying the body of their beloved one in its last resting place, of reverently laying upon it Easter lilies, as emblems of their love, and hope, and of committing the soul to the tender care of God. Instead, not one unnecessary penny was to be spent upon funeral expenses; a common wagon was to carry the body to a crematory where, after cremation, the ashes were to be scattered to the four winds of the earth; and all "so-called Christian rites or ceremonies" were expressly forbidden. And all this to be done "in the name of that unknown, unseen force that created, controls and directs the affairs and destiny of man."

Without any commentary the newspaper states that friends assembled at the grave and that a minister of the gospel conducted services there. So, the little group, left on this side of Eternity, are witnesses that the hope, born at Easter time centuries ago, will always live. The human heart will believe in immortality whether or no. The dying wishes of those we love often seem to us to be inspired by a more than earthly vision and to bind us with an authority, born not of time, but of eternity. But such authority is not so binding as the insistent claims of immorality for recognition. No commands, uttered "in the name of an unknown, unseen force," can ever triumph over the hope and faith offered to a sorrowing world by Him who "brought life and immortality to light."

White Ribbon Ideals at the White House.

Race customs are hard to down. It took a long time to discredit duelling. Even after the conscience of society had been aroused to its immorality, those who refused to fight frequently had the charge of cowardice flung at them. It has been the same with temperance. Mrs. Hayes was the first mistress of the White House to do away with liquor at state functions, and all through her husband's administration, she was subjected to a fire of cheap criticism. The recent announcement that President and Mrs. Wilson are likewise to banish liquor from the public functions of the White House has elicited similar criticism. They are "narrow," it is said, and one London paper expresses the fear that the new president is a crank, which only illustrates the delightful provincialism of some Englishmen in its implied ignorance of the constantly growing temperance sentiment in this country. But not only have President and Mrs. Wilson announced that liquors will be taboo at their table, but other leading families in the administration are to adopt the same practice, among them Vice-president and Mrs. Marshall, Secretary and Mrs. William J. Bryan, and Speaker and Mrs. Champ Clark. Surely the temperance "cranks" are neither isolated nor obscure! This policy ought to commend itself not only to temperance advocates, but also to those whose moral standards permit personal liberty in the matter of the use of liquor. Why it is "narrow" and characteristic of a "crank" not to have liquor on the table is difficult to understand. The example of the first lady of the land and other Washington leaders may have no particular effect upon those for whom the church and religion mean little, but it ought to brace up mightily a good many church members who have conformed to the growing habit in certain circles of using liquor at social functions, if not having it constantly on the sideboard.

One Day Rest in Seven

Modern society is becoming so complex that industry is getting to be of necessity more and more continuous. "During May, 1910," states the United States Bureau of Labor, "50,000, or 29 per cent of the 173,000 employes of blast furnaces, steel works and rolling mills covered by this report (all those in the United States except the Bethlehem Steel Works) customarily worked seven days per week." In the Bethlehem Steel Works, "out of 9,184 persons employed (in January, 1910) 2,628 or 29 per cent worked regularly seven days a week. Sunday work was the rule and was not considered overtime." The rush of modern conditions has made continuous seven-day toil a necessity. "Sunday laws do not and cannot deal adequately with the situation," says John Fitch. "Stop all trains, all street-cars, all heating and lighting plants, all delivery of milk, and all garbage removal, on Sundays, and the great cities will suffer as under a pestilence. Stop the blast furnaces, smelters, and other industries which for technical reasons require continuous operation, and those industries will be paralyzed." In sixteen groups of occupations employing about 180,000 trade-union members in the state of New York one man in every five worked regularly seven days a week. In Massachusetts in 1907 a joint legislative committee estimated that 221,985 persons, or over 7 per cent of the population, were engaged in seven-day labor. A new type of law is needed based on a new principle—a law that will forbid an employer to work his men seven days a week, and yet permit an industry necessarily or desirably continuous to operate seven days a week. The American Association for Labor Legislation has a standard bill for one day rest in seven which it is trying to introduce into all states. More than ever people are realizing that Sunday legislation must recognize economic as well as religious sanctions.

Russians Persecuting Baptists

Religious persecution by Russians, as all the world knows, is one of the fine arts of the Holy Synod of the Czar's domains. For years, the world, and especially the western hemisphere, was shocked at the series of persecutions visited upon the 5,000,000 Jews of Russia. We have not heard recently of these persecutions, but every now and then the trained persecutors of Russia are turning their judicial guns on Christian believers and workers not attached to the state religion. It appears that the Baptists are encountering persecution there now, as they have encountered similar treatment in every land where they have come in contact with a more settled religion. A Baptist pastor in St. Petersburg, William Fetler, has written to American friends of a new outbreak upon Baptist missionaries. Local authorities have harassed them in petty ways. The general government threatens to forbid preaching itineraries. This will certainly cramp the Baptist missionary conscience. Heavy fines, imprisonment, and even exile may be their reward. A Rev. V. Povloff, of Odessa, reports that he has had to pay a fine of $250 for performing a marriage ceremony for two members of his own church because the police discovered the bride had not formally declared before the magistrate her separation from the Orthodox communion. An indictment also hangs over his head, alleging that he allowed a statement by a Baptist to the effect that the latter was influenced in his apostasy from the Greek Orthodox Church by the disgraceful character of its clergy. If convicted under this indictment, Pavloff goes to prison for conscience's sake. It is reported that all the Baptist chapels in the province of Livonia have been closed and padlocked by the secret service agents of the Czar.

Our Churches and Our Charities

When a university professor, deeply interested in a special department of philanthropy, attacks through the press the whole Christian church because churches have not responded to his appeals as he thinks they should, he makes a serious mistake and one which is not likely to benefit his cause. In the first place we have in the United States, according to the federal report just published, 5,397 benevolent institutions, enough to confuse contributors, and, except a very few supported by Jews, they are all the offspring of the church. When that attack declares the church is "peculiarly indifferent to the welfare of children" it is sufficient answer to know that 1,365 such institutions in the states are exclusively for children and 1,442 others admit children. We asked the well known head of one of the best known of these independent organizations for the care of children—their instruction, nurture and intellectual development here in Chicago—who were the helpers in her work. The answer was direct and unequivocal, "Christians; I have never had a secularist last over three weeks in the actual work." Such institutions are the distinguishing feature of a Christian civilization. Drop out the church and they would drop dead.

—The Children's Day Association in Chicago is doing a grand, good work in a small way and has set a new standard for personal service charitable work. With the service of one paid visitor, assistance of executive officers and the 163 members, the association clothed 115 children, either to enable them to go to work or to school; furnished Christmas dinners for 129 families; remembered forty-two families with money gifts at Thanksgiving and boarded ninety-four children from one week to five months. Twenty-six of these boarded children were infants under one year old, for whom there is no institutional provision in Chicago except the Foundlings' Home, where the mother must relinquish the right to her child. Forty-three homes were re-established, the greatest amount spent on one of them being $68. Emergency relief was given 810 families and 1,544 children were directly benefited at a total expenditure of approximately $5,000.

—Bishop C. E. Cheney of Christ's Reformed Episcopal Church, Chicago, has just completed his fifty-third year as its rector. The bishop is still in excellent health and there is no talk of his resigning for another ten years. Bishop Cheney out of his years of experience says: "Avoid a leading contributor. It is hard for a church to succeed that has an overshadowing member. Let the burden of support and work fall equally on all alike." The Bishop thinks that Chicago has changed since he preached his first sermon at Twenty-fourth street and Michigan avenue. The day he arrived he drove away out over the prairie from the end of Michigan avenue at Twelfth street. He had been called to Christ's Church, Carville, not Chicago, the Illinois Central shops having created a village away out at what is now downtown Chicago.

—The churches of Washington are already after Mr. Bryan to become a member, knowing full well that the fact of his membership would have a most stimulating effect in strengthening the work. Mr. Bryan has been invited to take charge of the Young Men's Bible class in the First Presbyterian Church Sunday-school, and in consequence the membership of the class is going up by leaps and bounds. Mr. Bryan has not yet accepted.

—The ministers of Evansville, Ind., led by Rev. J. A. McCuaig, got after the business concerns of that city whose female employes were receiving very low wages. The result was an increase in wages for girls in Evansville. A ministerial body can do more perhaps for reform than a senate commission when it takes off its coat and goes after some of the tangled problems of the day with its sleeves rolled up.

—Scenes from the life of Christ are being shown in all St. Paul motion picture houses during the week preceding Easter. The slides are furnished by the Social Service church, which is behind a movement to lift the moral standard of pictures.

DR. WILLETT'S MISSION TOUR

An Inland Sea

It often occurs to the traveler in Japan that a somewhat undue amount of beautiful scenery has been lavished upon this island. There are other spots on the planet which are beautiful in some degree, the Rhine, Switzerland, Niagara, Kentucky and California. And then there are tropical lands where the wonder of vegetation never ceases. But in the combination of the most pleasing and impressive of natural beauties, mountain, river, forest and sea, with the artistic devices that the skill of man has contrived, Japan seems to have the place of leadership.

That was what we thought as we left Kobe for two days of travel westward on the Inland Sea, that body of water that flings itself far across the land from the Yellow Sea, and reaches from Kobe and Osaka on the east to Nagasaki and Shimonoseki on the west.

We had seen something of the hurrying life of Yokohama and Tokyo; we had taken our way to the mountain retreats of Nikko and Lake Chuzenji under the shadow of Nantizan, and of Myanoshita and Lake Hakone beneath the snow line of Mt. Fuji; we had visited the historic sanctuaries of Kamakura with its temple of the war-god Hallimon, Nara, with its temple dancing girls, at each of which there is a huge image of the meditating Buddha; we had spent delightful days at Kyoto, the old capital, a city of wonderful temples and still more wonderful schools; and we had passed all too brief a time within the walls of Osaka, whose ancient castle contrasts strongly with its many factories, and with Luna Park, its amusement ground; and along the hillside at Kobe, whose modern, and almost European appearance, and great Commercial College under governmental direction, as well as its many and admirable mission schools for boys and girls, make it worthy of a visit of many days.

Torii at Lake Hakone.

To the Land's End of Japan.

It was on a Saturday evening that we took the ship at the Kobe docks to make the journey westward to the Land's End of Japan. The lights were just coming out along the streets and up the hillside, where the great red eye of the court-yard light at the Tor Hotel seemed to gather to itself the converging lanes of light. Presently the little ship dropped the cables and slipped out into the darker night, and the city was left behind.

The boat, the Tonagawa Maru, was only of a few hundred tons, and had just about cabins enough for our party. The rest of the passenger list was a miscellaneous assortment of Japanese, of second and third class, and the latter can be very simple and primitive on a boat of this sort. But none seemed to mind. The deck or the bow were good enough. The first class cabins opened directly on the main deck, with a very narrow passage along the side, and from time to time the other people on board came and looked curiously and amiably in through the doors to our cabins, which the warmth of the night had induced us to leave open.

Toward midnight, lured out by the brilliant moonlight, I stood for a time by the gunwale, when presently I saw that several of the crew were taking the inevitable Japanese hot bath. There was a little room forward into which they went one at a time, and presently returned to the open deck, where the air began to be chilly, steaming from the boiling to which they had just consigned themselves. There were at various times at least a dozen gathered in this cheerful and unabashed devotion to the gods of the boiling springs.

Enchanting Scenes Suggesting Worship.

The next day was Sunday, and all day long we were in the midst of some of the most enchanting scenes it is possible to imagine. We should have preferred to spend the day as is our custom. But in the necessity which lay upon us to make the journey partly on that day we found compensation in the thoughts of wonder and worship which the scene suggested. Hour after hour we sat on the upper deck in the midst of a panorama of mountains, hills, valleys stretching away to hide in the uplands, towns hugging the shore and sending out little cargoes of people and merchandise to hail the passing ship, lighthouses and fortifications set upon hills, fishing junks, with curious high bows and sails of alternate white and black, traffic-boats whose power was usually a woman working with curious rolling motion the single oar at the stern of the craft, islands around which we had to make our way with care, and channels so narrow that it seemed hardly possible to pass through, or so completely land-locked that there would be no exit.

Then we would slip quietly by some town, whose stone docks we almost touched without stopping, and into all the privacies of whose domestic life we could look without exciting the least interest or resentment on the part of the villagers. Then again it would be a large harbor, in which war ships were gathered for practice, to be reviewed by a member of the government. And in the meantime the people who came and went, arriving from the towns along the shore, or leaving us as the boat paused opposite some landing, were a constant source of interest. They were all curious, interested, observant, but wholly unconventional in many of the matters concerning which a westerner is sensitive.

The Island of Miyajima.

And so the day wore to its close, and long after dark we reached the island of Miyajima, where we were to stop. The ship, as usual did not go to the dock, if there was one, but waited for the small boats to come out for cargo and passengers. Presently we saw the lights of the hotel launch approaching, and were soon making our way across to the little hotel dock, at some distance from the town. Then we were led around the face of the cliff from the landing to the Miyajima Hotel, and waited for morning to bring us the satisfaction of seeing one of the most beautiful places in Japan.

The island is perhaps a mile from the mainland, and along its front the tide comes and goes over a wide stretch of beach. Out in the tide-water stands the famous torii, or temple gateway, which is one of the favorite devices in Japanese art. It is most picturesque, forming as it does a sort of sea-gate to the sanctuary, which however, is never approached that way. The town, of which the temple is the most significant building, sprawls along the shore for half a mile. Just back of it rise the hills, whose sides are covered with beautiful maples at this season of the year.

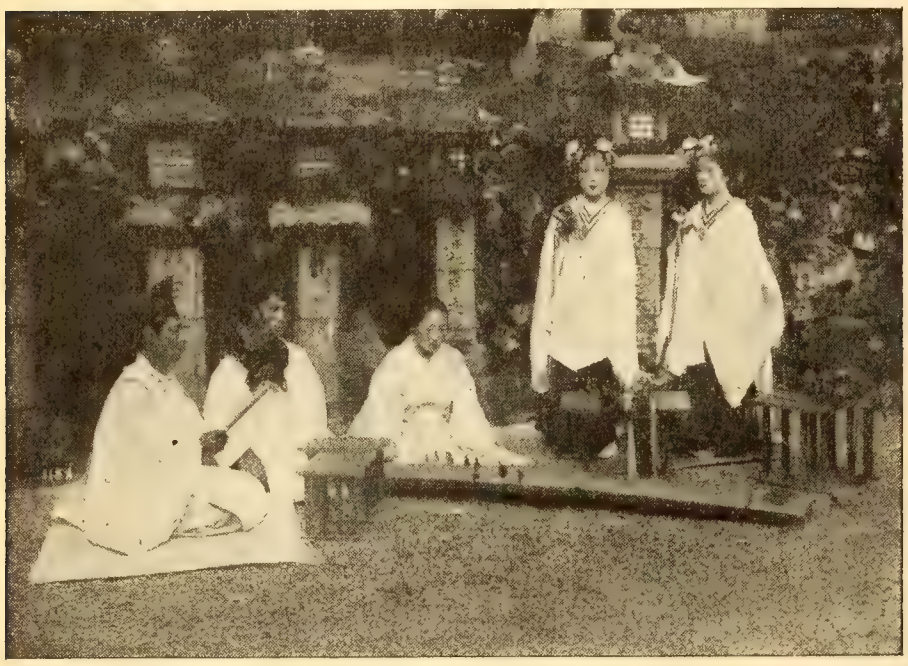
There are no vehicles of any sort on the island. You can wander about through the forest-covered hills, or stroll along the shore past the town to the school, or take a boat and circle the island, taking in the lovely views from every side. The hotel is a rustic, comfortable place, which is open all the year through, and it is not strange that people come from all the near-by cities to rest in so enchanting a spot.

School of the "Lady of the Decoration."

From Miyajima we took the little hotel launch across to the railway station on the line which connects Tokyo and Shimonoseki, and went to Hiroshima where there are two important schools for girls, one of which is connected with the story of "The Lady of the Decoration." The authoress of that charming series of letters was not there, but we visited the kindergarten in which she is chiefly interested, and saw the girls of the school in their chapel assembly as well as the regular school work. Many appreciative references were made by our hosts to the visit of Professor Mac-



Temple Dancers at Nara.

Clintock of the University of Chicago, who came over to Japan and China from his educational work in the Philippines last year, and delivered lectures in a number of places.

On the return to Miyajima we saw one of the astonishing sights of the Inland Sea, immense numbers of jelly fish, which at points were so numerous as to completely cover the surface of the water. It is a common sight to see one or more of these curious sea creatures in waters of this region, but the enormous numbers gathered in this channel were almost beyond belief. Their thin, soft white films lay outspread in vibrating circles, seemingly too fragile even to expand and contract in the breath-like pulsations that made them so fascinating to watch.

From Miyajima we took an afternoon train at the little station on the the through line, and all the rest of the day, and until ten at night, we were running along the shore of that beautiful Inland Sea, catching sight of little craft in one place and of ocean-going steamers in another, with alternating pictures of bamboo groves, garden spaces, villages with fishing boats in the harbors, country roads with loads of vegetables, turnips, lettuce, hay, firewood, charcoal, fish, pottery and scores of other market materials, carried by men, women and donkeys.

First Unpleasant Weather.

As the evening came on a cold rain set in, and we saw that we were to leave Japan in the midst of almost the only unpleasant weather we had experienced during our stay. Rains there had been, but none of serious or uncomfortable sort. In most cases they had been just sufficient to bring out the funny bamboo umbrellas in such multitudes as to make the streets look like a shiny, slippery moving mass of yellow circles. But this was a steady, heavy downpour. And as we pulled into the station at Shimonoseki the jinrikisha men drawn up in the shelter of the railway shed did not look as if they cared even for the fares that would take them out into the wet.

Fortunately for us there was no need of such exposure. We had a brief wait, in which the luggage was rechecked, and then presently were conducted to the little tender at the foot of the covered pier, in whose stuffy little cabin we took a ten-minute ride out through the many ships in the harbor to the Oji Maru (you will notice that every Japanese boat of any size is named some sort of a "maru," or ship), and soon we were under steam for the coast of Korea, across the rather unquiet strait which connects the Sea of Japan with the East China Sea. The Japanese chapter of our journey was all too soon at an end.

A New Court for Girls

Judge Pinckney of the Chicago Juvenile Court, has added to the admirable changes which he has already made, another of very great importance. What is practically a new court, with the purpose of shielding delinquent girls from morbid hangers-on in the Juvenile court and of obtaining data on the social evil, was opened recently in connection with the Juvenile court in the county building. Miss Mary M. Bartelme, for sixteen years public guardian, is the "judge." She was appointed by Judge Pinckney as a sort of master in chancery to hear cases of delinquency and report to him. "The object," she said, "is to get at the truth. Many girls lie when they are subjected to the gaze of men in the courtroom. We take only one case at a time. All of the assistants are women. One girl, only 14 years old, was on trial to-day. She told us everything—things she could not possibly have told to Judge Pinckney. We learned the truth about her." From the success of the first day the new "judge" was hopeful that in a few months she might be able to furnish statistics which will be of vital importance in analyzing the social evil. The court room is on the tenth floor of the county building adjoining the Juvenile court, where Judge Pinckney hears the boys' cases. While theoretically the purpose of the new department is to get at the truth, this branch of the court should be made to serve important moral interests. The method by which women, and especially young girls, have been and are placed on trial in the presence of a crowd of loafers violate every principle of decency. May this excellent departure be but the beginning of a wide reaching reform.

Abbie Ben Adams

Abbie Ben Adams, may her life be spared,
Awoke one night and felt a trifle scared,
For on her shirt-waist box, cross-legged, sat
A vision writing on a little slate.
Exceeding nervousness made Abbie quake,
And to the vision timidly she spake:
"What writest thou?" The vision looked appalled
At the presumption, and quite coldly drawled:
"The list of Our Best People who depart
For watering places sumptuous and smart."
"And I am in it?" asked Miss Abbie. "No,"
The scornful vision said: "You're poor, you know."
"I know," said Abbie: "I go where it is cheap;
I can't afford mountains or prices steep.
But, just jot this down before you fade—
I never leave my mission dues unpaid."
The Vision wrote and vanished. Next night, late
He came again, and brought his little slate,
And showed the names of people really best,
And, lo, Miss Abbie's name led all the rest.

New Timber in the Cabinet

Years ago, in his book on "Constitutional Government," President Wilson, then professional historian, pointed out that in the early years of our government it was common for the president to summon to his cabinet part leaders and veteran politicans, but that more recently the tendency was to disregard politics and secure experienced men of affairs rather than those whose chief profession was that of politics. The new cabinet on the whole is an illustration of this tendency. The men selected by President Wilson to be his advisors come largely from the South and East. It may be thought by some that the appointment of the new secretary of state, William Jennings Bryan, is one of the political order. It must be remembered, however, that Mr. Bryan's connection with the peace movement, his contribution to the Taft arbitration treaties, and his acquaintance with the world's leading statesmen, are qualifications for this office which will please most people except the militarist class and those who have benefited by the "dollar diplomacy" which has been the recent policy of the state department. The appointment of Franklin K. Lane, of California, as secretary of the interior, is regarded by those who know as a guarantee of a sound conservation policy, one of the most vital public questions to be determined by the new administration. Another appointment which will probably give offense to the militarist class is that of Josephus Daniels, of North Carolina, which seems to indicate a not overly aggressive naval policy, which on the other hand will please more people than it will offend. Many have felt that the cabinet would have been greatly strengthened by the presence in it of Louis Brandeis, of Massachusetts, who was, however, if newspaper reports are to be relied upon, strongly opposed by Governor Foss. As a whole the cabinet is progressive. No reactionary is in it. For practical influence it will far outrank the members of the cabinet whose portfolios have just been given up.

A Christian Painter of Christian Pictures

Autobiography of Henry Ossawa Tanner

EDITORS' NOTE: The art struggles of Henry Ossawa Tanner, the American colored painter, son of Bishop Tanner of the African Methodist Church, lend themselves to singularly interesting story telling. Their intrinsic interest is heightened greatly when the artist himself tells the story. Mr. Tanner now lives in Paris, where his color does not count against him, and where he and his wife have always moved freely in such society as they chose. Two of his pictures hang in the gallery of the Luxembourg, one of them being "The Disciples at Emmaus" which it is our privilege to reproduce here. Dr. William E. Barton, the artist's personal friend, has written the interpretative suggestions accompanying the smaller reproductions on the following pages.

THE DISCIPLES AT EMMAUS. PAINTING BY HENRY O. TANNER.

I BECAME AN ARTIST at the age of thirteen. I was walking out with my father one fine, fair afternoon in Fairmount Park, Philadelphia, and there for the first time I saw an artist at work. Since that moment I, too, have been an artist. He sat in the park with his easel and palette, painting a tree, using a spy glass now and then to assist him in the detail. As a school boy I had been accustomed to draw pictures on my slate, and somewhat to the detriment of my lessons, but all this was without aim or purpose until I saw a living artist actually transcribing nature and interpreting it with oil and color. That night I shortened an awning that hung over our kitchen door, made a palette out of the cover of an old geography with a hole jabbed through for my thumb, and I began to paint.

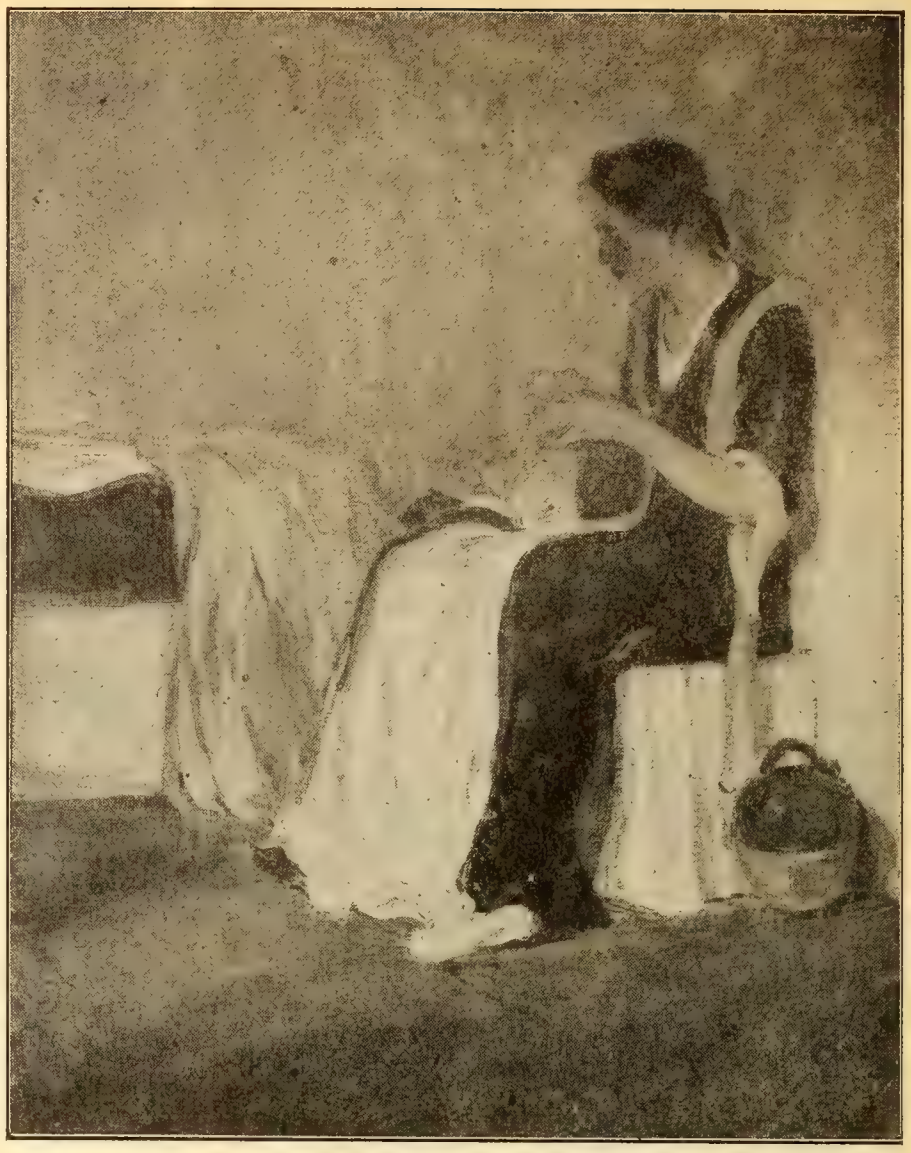
I was one of a large family, my father a minister and later a bishop of the African Methodist Church. My birthplace was in Pittsburgh, but we seemed likely to live sometime in Philadelphia and my father was trying to buy a home. However, after a long conversation with my mother I secured 15 cents, and with this I went to work next morning, returning to the spot where I had seen the artist and endeavoring to paint the same tree. I got more paint upon myself than I did upon the canvas, but I went home happy and well satisfied with my first attempt. I turned my picture right side up and upside down, and from whichever point of view I regarded it I was sure any one would recognize that it was a tree. The picture looked better upside down than any other way, but that fact did not in the least disturb me. I was an artist, and I have been one ever since.

From that time onward I was all aglow with enthusiasm, working at spare times between school hours, and soon afterwards my companions knew—indeed I had no hesitation in proclaiming it to them—that I was an artist. Some of them were thoughtful enough to tell me that all artists lived in garrets and died poor. My answer was ready. I was not going to be that kind of an artist. I was to be no ordinary, every-day artist, but one who obtained recognition and grew wealthy and great.

After school I would often go down on Chestnut Street to see the pictures in the galleries, and they delighted my soul. I soon had my favorite subjects. I was to be a marine artist; indeed, I definitely decided that I would be America's greatest marine artist. I saw a note in some art journal that the great crying need of America was a good marine painter. I never hesitated, but determined to supply that need. This was within a year from the time that I became an artist. I still was thirteen years of age.

JESUS LEARNING TO READ. BY HENRY O. TANNER.

One of his most recent paintings, and one of the most attractive as well. There is something in the face of Mary and her son which holds the visitor's attention and causes him to suspect some more than usual interest on the part of the artist in their portrayal. I asked Mr. Tanner where he found his models for that painting, and after a little hesitation he told me that they are his own wife and little son.



MARY. BY HENRY O. TANNER.

The Virgin sits in a room almost completely bare, a low-arched roof above her, with a water pot beside her, and her sewing in her hands. This is all one sees at first till following her own vision the eye rests upon the cradle toward which she looks in wonder and with something of foreboding in her half-comprehending eyes.

I later came to know that even then there were a number of very reputable marine painters in America, but I do not think that if I had known the fact it would in any way have altered my determination.

Something occurred to change this plan, however, and this was my meeting with an animal painter, Mr. J. M. Hess, now dead. From him I learned that animal painters were even less numerous in America than marine painters. I determined that my country should not be left longer in this deplorable situation. I renounced the inviting field of marine painting to become the great American Landseer. By this time I must have been fourteen.

During one of my school vacations I worked and saved $50. This was earned with the express understanding that it should be devoted to study. But with whom should I study? What great artist should I make greater by instructing me and receiving some part of this $50? I made the round of the studios. Alas! it was a disheartening process. The artists had other pupils, or they had no time for pupils, and the men whom I first visited had little time to bestow on a boy who knew nothing and had little money. Finally, Mr. I. L. Williams agreed to take me for $2 a lesson. I was so excited I could hardly wait for the appointed day. What a wonderland his studio was to me! I was dazzled, I was dazed by the thought that at last I was to be the real pupil of a real artist. What astonishment I should now make! What great pictures I should begin immediately to paint! How I should strive in a few lessons to overtake his one other pupil! I dreamed of it by night, and my day-dreams were on the same subject and not less vivid.

The day or two of waiting finally passed. I did not know before how less than half a week could seem a large cross-section of eternity. I was on hand long before the appointed hour, and I spent the time after my hasty breakfast walking up and down Chestnut Street waiting for it to be nine o'clock. At last trembling with excitement I entered the studio and met this most kindly old artist. His first question was, "Can you draw a straight line?" I never had tried, and he suggested that I try. I tried for three hours to draw simple, straight lines, horizontal and perpendicular. At the end of three hours I paid my $2 and left.

Philadelphia did not contain on that day a more thoroughly disheartened boy. So this was art! This was all I was getting for my precious $2. My dreams were smashed to smithereens. My confidence that I could ever be an artist mocked me from the sheets of my faulty efforts to draw straight lines.

It took a couple of days to restore my depressed spirit. One thing was decided. If I should have to learn to draw straight lines I should have to do it by myself. To pay $2 a lesson for this would be likely to ruin a Rothschild, so I set myself to drawing straight lines and plodded along as best I could without instruction.

I must have made a little progress, for the next summer while at Atlantic City I made a sketch of a wrecked schooner driven ashore in a great storm. My ambition to become a great marine painter had left me, but I must have made a little progress, for an amateur artist noticed my sketch and commended it. He learned that I was from Philadelphia. That was his home. He offered to give me some instructions on our return in the fall. He became like a father to me. He was a man of generous impulses, though erratic, and he required a complete renunciation of all ideas not in accord with his own. Every whim of his had to be religiously followed. I lived for a year in his house, and though it was a most constrained life and our acquaintance came to a rather sudden ending, I have much to thank him for. We had a misunderstanding, and I found all my belongings outside of his studio door. I made several efforts to see him, but without avail. I never met him but once again and that was years afterward.

About this time I left school, and my father, feeling the uncertainty of an artist's life, put me with a friend to learn the flour business. But this work proved too trying for me, and a severe illness, from which I did not fully recover for many years, brought my career as a merchant to an end. My family decided to let me be an artist if I could. I was now a lad of eighteen, hampered by frail health and lacking in money. Friends advised me to go to the Adirondacks. But how? Though no very feasible way appeared, necessity found a way. My dear mother finally saw me off, expecting, as she told me afterward, never to see me return alive. But I got to the Adirondacks and returned alive, thankful to this day to the good God who opened the way and gave me friends, filling me with confidence for the future, and who never deserted me in those darkest days.

Upon my return to Philadelphia I had the good fortune to make the intimate acquaintance of Mr. C. H. Shearer, an artist, whose stories of life in Dusseldorf and Munich fired my desire to visit Europe. Besides this, he gave me personal advice and helped me to reduce the bitterness which at this time had crept into my life, and gave me a hopeful view of my individual situation. A visit to him always renewed my courage. There were things in my life then that were very hard to endure, and it was he who helped me with the idea that I might have qualities that, cultivated, would help me to conquer in the battle of life. He called my attention to my own best qualities and encouraged me to cultivate them. He told me I had an attractive manner, which made it easy for people to like me, and he encouraged me to put bitterness out of my soul and to cultivate the best within me.

About this time Mr. Thomas Eakins, under whom I was studying in the Pennsylvania Academy of Fine Arts, gave me a criticism which aided me much. I had made a start on a study which was not altogether bad; indeed, I think it was the best thing which up to that time I had ever done. He encouraged me to go on with it, but I was so afraid I should destroy what I had done that I really did nothing the rest of the week. He was disgusted and gave me emphatic orders to work it over. "Get it better or get it worse," he said; "no middle ground compromise." This advice has helped me ever since. Mediocrity is the foe of real excellence.

I began to paint sheep pictures. I made this discovery, that while a flock of sheep is docile and peaceful, one sheep alone is the most stubborn, balky, befuddled, run-away animal that any one can imagine. The individual sheep has hardly any of the characteristics of the flock of sheep. I finally succeeded in painting a sheep picture, which I traded for a pair of antlers, worth $10. I thought I could sell the antlers, perhaps for $5. Everything in creation seemed to have market value, except pictures.

Yet, now and then I began to sell some of my paintings, and about this time I met with substantial encouragement from Bishop and Mrs. Hartzell, through whose assistance I arranged an exhibition of my pictures in Cincinnati in the fall of 1890. They did their very best for me, but I did not sell a picture. I would gladly have parted with the whole collection for $25. However, I had saved a little money and my friends made up a sum beside, and on Jan. 4, 1891, I set sail for Rome, by way of London and Paris.

I did not get to Rome. I stopped in Paris and began painting there. I had little money, and I suffered much self-denial, but I never suffered anything on account of my color. No bars were ever put in my way. From the beginning I was counted a hopeful student, and in time I was called a credit to American art.

I began painting at the Académie Julian. Never had I seen or heard such a bedlam, nor beheld men wasting so much time. Windows were nailed fast at the beginning of the cold season and for five or six months never opened. Fifty to sixty men smoking in such a room for two or three hours at a stretch would make the room so thick with smoke that one could hardly see the model. All the competitive examinations, known as concours, came on Sunday. I disliked this and was at not a little disadvantage. I made a canvass of the foreigners to see if enough of us objected to this to bring about a change. No considerable number objected, but I am sure we could not have changed the custom if all of us had protested. I did, however, argue with the secretary, and as he was a good friend of mine he agreed that should I loyally follow out all the other requirements he would change the day for the acceptance of my sketch from Sunday to Monday and would place it to be judged among the rest. This he had no authority to do, but he did it, and to my great surprise my sketch, "The Deluge," received one of the two prizes. I had other matters of conscience also, and I need not record them here. I believe it is worth while for a man to be loyal to his conviction.

I kept a strict account of all my money and my expenses for the first two years were $365 a year. The third year I had typhoid fever and I have no doubt that too much work and too little food were contributing causes.

I was in Paris two years before I ever heard of the Salon. Then, one Sunday, returning from the American Church, I saw a throng of people going there and followed them in. By that time I had a new ambition. I would hang one of my paintings there. My first attempt was refused. Two years afterward, in 1895, one of my pictures was accepted. It made no impression. It was skied. Had I been the son of the western farmer whose boy came to study art in New York, my father would have been proud of me. Recounting to his friends in the West what he had seen in New York, he said, "There were paintings all over the wall everywhere, but Bob's picture, my boy's, was over them all." Mine was as high as the ceiling would permit. I am satisfied no one ever saw it but myself, and it nearly broke my neck to find it.

In 1895 I painted "Daniel in the Lion's Den," and this was exhibited in the Salon in 1896. For it I received my first official recognition. It was only a "mention honorable," but it was an honor. It brought back my day-dreams and I went to work with new heart.

More and more I worked on religious subjects. I stayed in Paris through the summer, for I had not money enough to make the usual exodus in even the cheapest way which students commonly did. In summer one can make special terms with models, and I needed all the terms I could make. I was working on "The Resurrection of Lazarus." I continued to work upon it. Upon its completion it was shown to a gentleman from Philadelphia whose business office was in Paris, and he was so much pleased with it that he thought I ought to see the Holy Land, so in February, 1897, through the generosity of this Philadelphia gentleman, I visited Egypt and the Holy Land.

My six weeks' stay in Jerusalem passed quickly, and before I could realize it it was time to return homeward. While in Venice on the way back I received the offer of the French government to purchase my picture "The Resurrection of Lazarus," for the Luxembourg. I could hardly believe it, and as the letter was three weeks old I feared by that time the offer had lapsed, so I nearly went bankrupt on a long telegram of acceptance. I received two telegrams in reply, one from the government confirming the purchase, the other from a friend in Paris, saying, "Come home, Tanner, to see the crowds before your picture."

The next year I painted "The Annunciation," but was not satisfied with the result. I tried again with better success and the newer picture now hangs in the Wilstack Gallery in Philadelphia.

Again, I visited the Holy Land, and spent six months painting around Jerusalem and the Dead Sea and gained an insight into the country and character of the people. There I made a study of the Mount of Temptation, from which I afterward painted "Moses and the Burning Bush." I afterward commenced the picture, "The Scapegoat," which still is in a dark closet among other unfinished efforts. I also painted "Christ and Nicodemus," and I remember so well the Yammanite Jew who posed for Nicodemus. Several times I have painted "The Flight into Egypt." Up to this time I had painted only pictures of males. Now I began a series of five pictures, "Mothers of the Bible"—Mary, Hagar, Sarah, Rachel and the mother of Moses. Probably the most difficult effect I have ever undertaken is that in the picture, "Christ in the Home of Mary and Martha," now in the Carnegie Gallery.

I am glad to have won a measure of recognition abroad and now to be winning it at home. The picture, "The Disciples at the Tomb," which received the Harris prize at the Art Institute and was bought by the gallery a number of years ago, is one which I am truly glad to leave in America.

It is not by accident that I have chosen to be a religious painter. I am very glad to say that I have not been forced to paint any pot boilers for twenty years and I never do them. I paint the things I see and believe. I have no doubt an inheritance of religious feeling, and for this I am glad, but I have also a decided and I hope an intelligent religious faith not due to inheritance but to my own convictions. I believe my religion. I choose religious subjects not primarily because I believe they will interest people, nor because I consider them most salable. I am very glad if they do interest the people, and certainly am glad to sell them. Yet, I have chosen the character of my art because it conveys my message and tells what I want to tell to my own generation and leave to the future.

You will notice that the critics habitually speak of me as "young." They are quite right. A man is as old as he feels, and I marked twenty years off the number which the calendar allows me in my hope to continue for many years to come in my work of interpreting through my brush the holiest and greatest theme that belongs to the literature and hope of the world.

Grace and the Law

By G. Campbell Morgan

"Fear not: for God is come to prove you, and that His fear may be before you, that ye sin not."—Exodus 20:20.

In those wonderful days of the emancipation of the Hebrew people and their realization of a constitutional national life, Moses twice uttered these words, "Fear not." In each case they were addressed to the people when they were filled with fear. In the first case the fear was that of Egypt; in the second it was that of God.

Law is a revelation. It was a revelation to these men, first of life according to the will of God. It was a revelation to men of the standards of life in the economy of God. As the first ten words were uttered they constituted a revelation of holiness in human life. They are words which define man's relationship to God and man's relationship to his fellowman; broad foundation words, upon which all future codes were to be erected. They discovered God in His purity, in His holiness, in His justice, in His righteousness. The first four revealed denoting man's relation to God as the foundation of all morality; the last six revealed man's relationship to his fellowman as the expression of his obedience to the first four. From these words of the law, there shone upon men the light, the awful light of the holiness of God.

That revelation of holiness was in the hearts of the men who heard it, inspiration, the creation of desire, or of admiration of the ideal. Perhaps as Paul became the most remarkable illustration in the apostolic records of incarnate Christianity, so also Saul of Tarsus was the most remarkable revelation in the Bible of incarnate Hebraism. In his Roman letter he declared that after the inward man, he delighted in the law of God; he knew its glory, he knew its beauty. That is the first thing that the law does for a man.

If the law is thus a revelation of God, it becomes necessarily to the men who receive it, a revelation of themselves. When the light of the law flamed upon these men they knew their failure, and they knew their weakness; and so while it is true that law becomes an inspiration, the final word is that law becomes a condemnation. It is the revelation of failure. Because in the light of the requirement of the law I learn how I fail, and how weak I am, it rests upon me as a perpetual condemnation and denunciation. The law then is a revelation which inspires and creates admiration for goodness in the soul of a man; but as it reveals it condemns, making a man conscious how far he has come short and how appallingly weak he is.

Thus we come to the final note. "That ye sin not." There are many words in our Bible both in Hebrew and in Greek translated "sin," but the common word in the Hebrew and the common word in the Greek have exactly the same significance. Sin is missing of the mark, failure to realize; and that, whether it be wilful or ignorant. If we are dealing with sin as guilt, then the sin of ignorance brings no guilt with it. It is wilful sin that brings guilt. But if we are dealing with man, and attempting to see his place in the economy of God, and the purpose of heaven, for the true realization of life, then sin is failure. If a man comes short of the highest fulfilment of his own life, that is sin. The law was given that men may not sin, that they may not miss the mark, that they may not fail to realize the real meaning and purpose of their own lives.

A Wider View of Law.

In this connection we must take a wider view of law than Exodus affords. We go back to the beginning of human history as the Bible records it, and there we find law; not the law which was here uttered, but human life conditioned in the will of God; God uttering His own word, a commandment laid upon man as a safeguard, and revealing to him his relation to a supreme authority. That is law. Leave these earlier records and come to the New Testament, and in the teaching of Jesus we find law; but the Master goes to deeper depths, searching the profound things of human life; no longer merely conditioning external conduct, but setting up His standard in the inner recesses of motive and desire. The broadest conception shows that law is a revelation to man of himself, made by the grace of the Divine love; a kindly and tender declaration of the path in which he should go, that he may not miss his way; a statement of the principles that govern his life that he may not violate them. In Christ, men are set free from the law, which is Hebrew; but they are brought under the law of the Spirit of life. That law is the language of love. God bending over a nation, or bending over a man, says to it or to him, "Thou shalt have no other gods before Me." That is not the language of hardness, of severity, of unkindness. It is love showing the nation or the man that life must be adjusted to the supreme things in order that it may rise to the height of its possibility.

This is true of every one of the ten words; and it is equally true of the words of Jesus. They are severe, they are awe-inspiring, they search and scorch and frighten the soul, if men will listen to them. Nevertheless they are the words of infinite compassion, of infinite tenderness; they are words uttered to my soul in order that I may know the way wherein I should go, if I am not to miss the meaning of my life, if I am to realize it in its height, its breadth, its depth, its glory. Jesus said that He did not come into the world to condemn the world, but that the world through Him might have life.

If law is the expression of grace, it is not its final word. Law brings man to a consciousness of his sin, and has no more that it can do. What will grace say to a man who stands condemned by this uttering of law? Let us first remember this. Grace does not deny that man's sin. The business of grace is not that of hiding sin or cloaking it over or denying the reality of it. Let us remember in the second place that grace does not excuse the sinning man. Nevertheless grace operates, in some infinite mystery of love, in such a way that the sin of sinning man may be forgiven, and the sinning man himself conformed to the very ideal of purity and beauty which the law has revealed. The central word of grace is that of God, "I will come to thee." That is what grace says to the man condemned under the law; it draws near with healing, with renewal.

If you ask me how grace can accomplish this, I point you to the Cross, and ask you to listen to the words of inspiration as you gaze upon the profound mystery. "God was in Christ reconciling the world unto Himself, not reckoning unto them their trespasses," Or again, "God commendeth His love toward us in that while we were yet sinners Christ died." By an infinite transaction in the very Being of God, grace having spoken in the law and thereby revealed to me my failure, reaches me, captures me, holds me, remakes me, energizes me; and all this in order that I may become that which law has revealed to me I have failed to be.

The Simplest Figure.

If again you ask me for an illustration of how this can be, I shall take you to the simplest figure in the New Testament used by Christ and His holy apostles; realizing that it is but a figure, realizing that it is a figure that we do not often make use of in this regard; and yet convinced that it is one of the most illuminative in all the New Testament. I mean the figure of the forgiveness of debt. What is it to forgive debt? Remember in the first place that no man can forgive debt, except the man to whom the debt is owed. Let me reverently place the illustration upon the commonplace level of the currency. Here is a man who owes to another man a hundred pounds. He has nothing to pay, he is bankrupt. The man to whom it is owed, in grace forgives it. Has he a right to do it? No one will question the right. How does he do it? By himself suffering the loss. That is the principle of the Cross. He bore our sins, He carried our sins, He made Himself responsible for our moral debts. Grace confronts the bankrupt soul and says, I forgive by suffering the loss. I know the frailty and the imperfection of all this illustration. I would not use such a figure if it were not a figure in the New Testament. Yet this is exactly what God does. He forgives by suffering loss. The very grace that is set upon my perfecting, and has given me the law that I may know what perfection is; and thereby revealed to me my imperfection, steps into the breach, gathers into itself the infinite loss, cancels the bond, and so gives me forgiveness and life.

Think once more in the realm of that illustration. On the level of human inter-relationship the illustration may break down in ninety-nine cases out of a hundred, but in the one-hundredth it is fulfilled in the sense in which I now use it. Let us go back to the two men. The one owes the other. The other forgives his debt, himself suffering the loss of that which is owed, in order to do so. What happens? The man forgiven, goes out to begin again, freed from encumbrance, freed from the burden. In the passion born of gratitude for the act of grace, he gives himself no rest until a day when he pays his debt.

I do not hesitate to use the illustration now. So will it be with all the truly ransomed. He Who met me, and revealed to me my failure, and made known to me how far I am in debt; He Who then in infinite grace bore the loss Himself, and uttered the word of freedom; He at last, by the inspiration of the love and gratitude of my heart, by an operation of power given to me in the economy of that grace, will present me faultless before the throne of God; He shall see of the travail of His soul and be satisfied.

Law is beneficent, the language of love, and yet it condemns. The grace that utters law has other things to say, and by virtue of what it is in itself brings to men more than law. It brings the pardon and power by which at last, measured by the standards of law, they will be perfect in the sight of God.

Church Life

Passing of Well-known Churchman.

Payne Avenue Church, North Tonawanda, N. Y., is mourning the death of Mr. George B. Vandervoort, one of its charter members and for many years an elder of the congregation. Mr. Vandervoort's interests included every agency that made for human uplift in his own community and in the life of the nation. With great business responsibilities he was never too much engaged to give time and personal energy to the unselfish tasks of the Kingdom. It was he who bluntly told the workers in behalf of the foreign mission equipment fund to ask for a round million dollars instead of $500,000. "This is a million dollar age," he said. And the workers from that day set a new aim for themselves. In his domestic life Mr. Vandervoort was an ideal husband and father. Many young men were present at his funeral and testified to the inspiring influence of his personality upon their lives. Broad-minded and tolerant, without a trace of sectarian bigotry, he was nevertheless deeply loyal to his own church and counted no sacrifice too great to promote its welfare. His pastor, V. W. Blair, bears testimony to his sympathy and constancy. "His unfailing sympathy," adds William C. Hull, a former pastor, "helped me through some of the most trying experiences of my life." The church feels doubly weakened at this time because Mr. Vandervoort's death followed only ten days after that of Levant R. Vandervoort, who was taken very suddenly and whose place in church and community was similar to that of his brother.

Bible College Enlarges to University.

The spirit of the West is playing havoc with the original plans of certain Disciple leaders in the Inland Empire who had a vision of a Bible College at Spokane, Wash., and had already made a start at realizing their vision. The vision has grown since class-work was begun last September. It is now believed that it is more practicable to build a university that will meet adequately the all around needs of the educational situation than a vocational seminary to prepare men for the single profession of the ministry. "Spokane University" was therefore incorporated March 7, 1913. A tract of land, 400 acres, valued now at $150,000 and certain to bring $400,000 when sold in building lots, situated in a beautiful suburban relation to Spokane, has been offered to the new university on terms that call for the outlay of only $125,000. B. E. Utz, who is known by those who know him at all as anything but a promoter of wildcat enterprises has been elected chairman of the board of trustees and president of the University, "until the right man can be secured to take this important position," he adds, referring with unnecessary modesty to the presidential office. Mr. Utz believes profoundly in the enterprise. He points out that a radius of 500 miles shows only one educational institution maintained by the Disciples—the Eugene Bible Seminary at Eugene, Oregon. It is 1,460 miles to the nearest Disciples' College—Cotner, at Lincoln, Nebr. Spokane is the logical center for an Inland Empire university, he declares. It is already the intellectual center of that great section. The citizens, regardless of denominational lines, are showing an interest in the proposed school. Mr. Utz describes what is happening as follows: "On March 6 the trustees gathered from the Inland Empire were taken in automobiles to see the grounds and then to an elaborate banquet where 300 guests were seated. Regardless of religious belief all the people joined in a most royal welcome to the trustees to whom the land was tendered. These rich orchard lands suburban to the city of Spokane, are occupied by a superior people. Many Spokane business men have their homes here. An atmosphere more congenial for Christian homes and the home of a Christian institution would be very hard to find. University Place is on an elevated ridge overlooking the rich orchard lands of the valley as well as the city of Spokane, while it is in turn surrounded upon all sides by beautiful mountain scenery. The elevation and location of the site will make the university buildings observable to practically all through trains, being very conspicuous from eight railroads. Our beginning is very auspicious. The people generally seem to be awakening to our possibilities. Students from various sections of the country are planning to enroll for next year's work. Families are getting ready to make their homes in University Place. Conditions challenge us for leadership in a great institution."

Will Maintain Two Sunday Schools.

An afternoon Sunday-school, following the practice of some Eastern cities, has been undertaken by Central Church, Des Moines, Ia., of which Finis Idleman is pastor. It is not intended to give up the regular school which meets at the noon hour nor to urge its attendants to return in the afternoon. The afternoon session is primarily for the children of the down town community in the midst of which the church is situated and from which it draws confessedly all too small a share of its church and Sunday-school attendants. Writing of the new work Mr. Idleman diagnoses the situation and suggests Central Church's program as follows: "All the down town Sunday-schools are held at the noon hour from 12 to 1 o'clock. It is not to be imagined that everybody is free at just that hour to go to Sunday-school should he wish to do so. Many boarding houses have dinner at that hour. Many people are engaged at work—a great number of young people are assisting in boarding houses, hotels and restaurants in various ways, and not the least hindrance is the fact that nine out of ten non-Christian homes in this part of the city do not make provision so that the children can attend at that hour. The family dinner is first. Because of all these hindrances to those who might wish to attend, we propose to begin an afternoon Sunday-school at three o'clock. We shall not ask any of our pupils in the main school to return, although they will not be prohibited from doing so. We are making an appeal to the immediate vicinity of the down town section. We have an adequate corps of teachers who are both willing to give themselves in teaching and in calling to make this school a success. It will be under the supervision of the main Sunday-school. It is planned to put the very best of equipment and service into its administration. A stereopticon will be used at the close of the school to illustrate Bible geography and history. We count this but a reasonable service that we owe to our immediate vicinity. To do less than this would be to shirk our honest duty. We are but meeting our church neighborhood responsibility." No doubt other church workers in down town or rapidly shifting sections of cities will find helpful suggestion in this plan of Central Church.

Edgar D. Jones on Wilson's Inaugural.

Taking President Woodrow Wilson's inaugural address at the subject of his Sunday evening sermon recently, Edgar DeWitt Jones, of Bloomington, Ill., spoke in part as follows at First Church: "The inaugural address of an incoming president is always a matter of nation-wide interest. The inaugural address of President Wilson has been read perhaps even more widely and with deeper interest than usual. There are two reasons for this: first, the personality of the man; second, the transition period that after a period of sixteen years, returned a political party to power. The address is a model of chaste and beautiful English, of simple and noble rhetoric. There is not a pedantic term nor an unusual word in it, and the diction is the choicest. The sentences are short for the most part, although one contains one hundred and sixty-seven words, and are cogent and complete. Literally considered, the address indicates anew the skill and aptitude of Mr. Wilson as a phraseologist. For four years at least we may expect presidential papers and speeches of a superior literary style. President Wilson's inaugural reads in places like passages from the Hebrew prophets. The prophetic strain or note runs throughout the entire address. Take for example this fine sentence, 'The feeling with which we face this new age of right and opportunity, sweeps across our heart strings like some air out of God's own presence, where justice and mercy are reconciled and the judge and the brother are one.' How like the prophet Micah in the sixth chapter and eighth verse of his book: 'He has showed thee, O Man, what is good and what doth the Lord require of thee but to do justice and to love mercy and to walk humbly with thy God.' The modern social gospel pervades the president's inaugural as the fragrance of an apple orchard in blossom does a day in May. Compassion for the poor, oppressed, long wronged, imparts to the oration a solemnity that strikes and stirs to the depths, strong emotions. Here and there both in spirit and cadence there is a suggestion of Lincoln in his speech at Gettysburg and his second inaugural. One may search in vain for anything approaching the partisan spirit in his address. The exultant note of 'To the victor belong the spoils' is lost in the deep, solemn chord of self-dedication by a people's leader. There is nothing visionary in the speech save in the sense that to the speaker there has been vouchsafed a vision of the world's need and the possibilities of governmental aid in assuaging social hurts. The entire document reflects the character of our new president as the water the boughs that over-arch the stream. A brave, far-seeing man, possessing the modern mind and spirit; a democrat first, without the capital "D"; a democrat second with the big "D"; and a modest, reverent, ready-to-learn type of public man—the common people have a friend at court and the kingdom of God moves on apace."

Danger in Caution, says Dr. Richardson.

"To succeed in any undertaking we must create right circumstances and a favorable environment, and then we must take some risk," said Dr. W. F. Richardson at First Christian Church, Kansas City, recently. "It is not good to be rash, but rashness is overestimated. The thing to do is to make reasonable preparations, seize the opportunity, face the way that seems to be right and eagerly go ahead. Overcaution applies also to our charitable gifts and our religious life. Some of us are so afraid we are going to help some unworthy person that we will say 'no' to a hundred who are worthy and in need. It is the same with persons who hesitate to accept Christianity until they can understand every word of the Bible. Too many want to see the end from the beginning and want to be sure of every step of the way. No one will ever become a Christian if he waits until every member of the Church is perfect and until he can understand every verse of Scripture. We should make a start and then put our trust and faith in God."

Progress in the March Missionary Offering.

Encouraging reports come from the Foreign Society office, concerning the March offering. More churches are giving so far than last year. Many new "living-links" are being enrolled. Eight were registered in one week. Words of encouragement come from every quarter. "There is a growing appreciation," writes Secretary F. M. Rains, "of the co-operation of our churches in making Jesus Christ known to the ends of the earth. Our people are coming to speak where the Book speaks on the subject of missions as upon other questions. The churches are anxious for a larger and more worthy task than they have heretofore assigned themselves. They are not satisfied with the routine and humdrum of church life that has characterized many of them in the days of the past. They have come to a new and larger religious life. There are new standards and more worthy ideals before them." Old churches, and well-to-do churches, he says, are making their first offerings to the missionary cause. The congregations that have been standing loyally by the work, year by year, are increasing their gifts. There is a steady increase in the individual gifts. Some churches have deferred their offerings for better weather and, in the country, for better roads. These churches are asked to swing into line next Sunday if possible. There is no time to be lost now. The missionary year is rapidly passing. The call of the missionaries on the field is to us the voice of God. They recognize the deep and wide-spread need on every hand. Missionaries, over-burdened with responsibility, are staggering under the heavy weight. It is hoped that every church will come to their relief at once. The mark before the Society is $500,000 for the year.

Sound Psychology and Good Religion.

In the "New Life Meetings" at South Street Church, Springfield. Mo., Pastor F. L. Moffett spoke one evening on the "Beginnings of the Spiritual Life." The following sensible analysis was the preface to a searching appeal to begin the new life: "To the ordinary mind the beginning of spiritual life is full of much mystery, but when we look deeper into the subject the mental clouds begin to disappear," the speaker said. "We will take it for granted that when we speak of the soul, heart or mind we mean the same thing, and with this thought in our mind the mystery unfolds. When we speak about psychological or mental processes we mean the laws of the mind or soul. We know more about the laws of the mind than we formerly did and the minister has as much right to study the mind or soul as the physician does the body. When we talk about the heart we mean the mind. It is said in scripture that we believe with the heart. Jesus said, Suffer little children to come unto me and forbid them not, for of such is the kingdom of heaven. There are certain mental processes that can take place or that have already occurred or are normal to the child that fit him for the kingdom of heaven. It is all a matter of mind. God appeals to the mind."

Radium and God.

"I did not bring my radium to church with me tonight," said Dr. Charles M. Sheldon, author of "In His Steps," speaking to a Sunday night congregation in Central Church, Des Moines, "but it is in my bag at the hotel. It was given to me by William Crooke, an English scientist, ten years ago and I have carried it with me ever since. Whenever I look at my radium, and I look at it often, I am impressed by a movement of tiny sparks of light in it. Those little specks of light, so small that the naked eye can hardly see them, have been going forward and receding, going forward and receding, ever since I was given the radium ten years ago. Their movement never varies in the least. When I watch them, I always think: 'Where do they get the power to move?' Nobody knows. But my answer always is: 'There is a God.'"

Church Long Closed to be Reopened.

A Disciple house of worship at Dows, Ia., closed for years, will be soon reopened and the congregation reorganized. A local business man recently conferred with B. S. Denny, state secretary of Iowa, asking whether or not the church property was for sale, and if so what the price would be. He received a letter stating that the church property was not for sale, and that the Disciples of Iowa had no notion of giving it up. On the contrary, Mr. Denny said, plans were perfected for sending an evangelist in the near future to hold a series of revivals with a view to putting the congregation on its feet and locating a resident pastor.

Typical Informal Memorial Service.

Many memorial services for the late Mrs. M. E. Harlan are being held in all parts of the country. The business session of the Chicago C. W. B. M. board was turned into such a memorial service. Mrs. Russell the president, Mrs. Chapin of Irving Park and Mrs. Brannum of Monroe Street auxiliaries spoke intimately of the good influences of Mrs. Harlan's very recent visit to Chicago. Mrs. Brannum, whose guest she was, described the eagerness with which the missionary leader visited with her such places of interest as Hull House and the Disciples' modest Russian mission, and her grasp of mind upon all matters concerning this city's religious progress. Mrs. Jackson of Englewood auxiliary also spoke an interpretive word.

Long and Fruitful Ministry Closed by Death.

L. B. Ames, veteran Disciple minister, eighty-one years of age, father of E. S. Ames, pastor of Hyde Park Church, Chicago, died in Des Moines, Ia., March 9. He had lived in Des Moines since 1885 and was a charter member of the University Church, organized in 1888. Mr. Ames had been pastor in Wisconsin and New England. He was originally a Baptist, and entered the Disciples' ministry in his early manhood. The funeral service conducted by Dr. Charles S. Medbury was the occasion of many tender and interesting reminiscences by Professors A. M. Haggard and J. Madison Williams of Drake University, whose acquaintance with Mr. Ames extended back many years.

Miss Loduska Wirick, missionary in Japan, has been visiting in Des Moines, Ia., and speaking in Cedar Rapids and other cities of the state. Miss Wirick went to Japan nearly twenty years ago and was sustained for a time by the Belle Bennett Board of Drake University from a fund contributed by friends of Miss Belle Bennett who while preparing herself for missionary service was accidentally drowned in the Des Moines River. Miss Wirick's mission work is now independent of any missionary society.

Dr. Peter Ainslie, of Baltimore, and President J. L. Garvin, of William Woods College, Fulton, Mo., are prominent speakers on the program of the Central Illinois Ministerial Institute which holds its meeting April 9 and 10 at Lincoln. The subject of Dr. Ainslie's address is "Christian Union" and Mr. Garvin's is "The Preacher as a Preacher." H. H. Peters, pastor at Paris, Ill., reads a paper on Authority in Religion and W. F. Shaw of Chicago speaks at an evening session on "The Efficient Church."

Edward O. Sharpe, pastor South Dallas, Tex., Church, has been taking the text of his Sunday evening sermons of late from masterpieces of literature. The following books are being interpreted especially with reference to the troublesome problems in society today: Gen. Lew Wallace's story of "Ben-Hur," Charles Read's "Cloister and Hearth," Victor Hugo's "Les Miserables," and Hawthorne's "Scarlet Letter."

Mrs. Decima Campbell Barclay, daughter of Alexander Campbell, has promised W. R. Warren, secretary of Ministerial Relief, "to donate some book or some relic of my dear father, that will be appreciated and kept as an heir-loom" to the person who first suggests an acceptable name or title to describe those who provide the entire pension of a veteran preacher or preacher's widow.

In her initial meeting with the Sunday-school workers of First church, Bloomington, Ill.. with which she is conducting a several weeks' campaign, Miss Eva Lemert, Sunday-school specialist, asked particularly that no efforts should be made to induce pupils of other schools to leave their own schools. Only non-attendants at Sunday-school were to be the objects of solicitation.

While Pastor I. J. Spencer of Central Church, Lexington, Ky., is abroad Prof. Farquhar of the state university is speaking on the Bible in literature at the morning services and Prof. A. W. Fortune of Transylvania University is preaching in the evenings. Both Prof. Farquhar and Prof. Fortune are drawing large hearings.

Dr. George H. Combs, pastor Independence Boulevard Church, Kansas City, delivered six lectures at Drake University the second week of March, speaking to ministerial students on fundamental Christian doctrines in the daytime and to the general public on themes of literature in the evening.

J. P. Rowlison, the new secretary of the Sixth District in N. E. Missouri is holding county conferences in all the counties for the primary purpose of creating solidarity and co-operation among the churches. The District convention meets at Macon May 5 and 6.

Frederick W. Burnham, pastor at Springfield, Ill., filled First Church twice on Palm Sunday evening by offering the public moving pictures of the life of Christ. The second audience assembled at 9 o'clock.

The corner stone of a new church edifice, was laid at Atlanta, Ill., March 16. Milo Atkinson, pastor Centennial Church, Bloomington, Ill., delivered the address. R. H. Newton is pastor at Atlanta.

The Christian Church Hospital Association of Kansas City, recently sold a Missouri farm for $20,000. The farm was the gift of Miss Mary Chiles of Independence, Mo., some two years ago.

Harry Minnick, pastor of First Church, Worcester, Mass., was welcomed back to his pulpit on a recent Sunday morning after an absence of ten months owing to illness.

W. T. Fisher, Iowa's State Sunday-school superintendent, has relinquished the work and removed to Canton, O., where he will teach in the Philipps Bible Institute.

M. L. Pontius, pastor Central Church, Peoria, Ill., was guest and speaker at a church banquet at Mackinaw, Ill., recently, much to the delight of all who heard him.

Roger T. Nooe, pastor Frankfort, Ky., preached on Wednesday evening of last week on David Livingstone to a union service at the Methodist church.

Prof. and Mrs. Guy W. Sarvis, of the University of Nanking, China, are parents of a baby boy, David, who came Feb. 2.

Wichita Falls, Tex., church has awarded a contract for building a new house of worship to cost $30,000.

Kearney, Nebr., Church dedicated a house of worship costing $35,000 on March 9.

The Divinity of Christ

BY EDWARD SCRIBNER
AMES

Is a popular statement of both the theological and practical truths centering in our evangelical faith in Christ.

It is scholarly, but not technical.

It lifts the problem of the nature and character of Christ out of the setting of the old-time dogmatism and places it in the light of the more empirical, human and meaningful thought of our own day.

Its Treatment of Unitarianism is original, fresh, illuminating. A single chapter entitled, "Why I am not a Unitarian" will furnish any reader, conservative or liberal, a new point of view.

It is glowing with religious earnestness. It is a living word spoken to the hearts and souls of living people.

Appreciations

Professor George A. Coe says: "These sermons display a remarkable union of intellectual boldness and spiritual warmth. I know of nothing else in print that brings out quite so clearly the positive religious values that can be reached by a rigorous application to Christian dogmas of the functional and valuational point of view. Even readers who cannot accept Professor Ames' position at all points must agree that such a book helps to clear the air, and to focus attention at the right point."

The Indianapolis News says: "One would go far to find a finer interpretation of religious thought and experience in terms of spiritual laws. Mr. Ames is emphatically a man with a message."

The Chicago Inter-Ocean says: "Six sermons full of broad humanity."

The Watchman says: "Professor Ames is avowedly a "liberal" in theology but his liberalism seems to be of a wholesome kind, in the sense that he is less concerned about doctrines and creeds than he is about service and the helping of people to their best life."

The Independent says: "Dr. Ames does not deny being a liberal, but strongly objects to being styled a 'Unitarian', quoting with enthusiasm a saying of one of the early leaders of his denomination: 'I am neither a Unitarian nor a Trinitarian, but strive to be simply a Christian.' The sermons are thoughtful, moderate in tone and straightforward in expression."

Unity says: "Those who were privileged to listen to these sermons must have found their spiritual natures quickened."

The Advance says: "These are strong, virile sermons, appealing to the reason and satisfying the heart."

Professor Edward C. Moore, of Harvard, says: "It is a very clear and convincing statement of the issue as it stands in the minds of modern men. It makes us realize how the old formulation of the question has become obsolete, no one any longer states the question in the old terms. Dr. Ames has availed himself in admirable fashion of the opportunity for a new statement of the case, and the spirit in which he writes must convey confidence and reassurance to all."

Ten Big Reasons Why

BETHANY GRADED LESSONS are being adopted by so many of the best schools among Disciples

1. There is more to them—at least a third more—than is contained in any other series.
2. They are rich, vital and full of suggestion to teacher and pupil.
3. They are free from the sectarian spirit.
4. They are soundly and fervently evangelical.
5. They are truly artistic in all their illustrations.
6. They are printed on better paper with better binding and in better taste than any other series.
7. Every lesson writer is an expert of interdenominational reputation.
8. They are a monument to the modern spirit of unity—a dozen leading denominations have co-operated to produce them and are now using them.
9. The Disciples possess full editorial rights, through the editor. Charles Clayton Morrison.
10. Every Disciple school that uses them participates in and promotes a great Christian union enterprise.

EVERY QUARTER ADDS TO THE NUMBER OF SCHOOLS INTRODUCING THESE LESSONS.

Disciples Publication Society

THE DISCIPLES PUBLICATION SOCIETY is a corporation chartered under the laws of Illinois. It is organized for the purpose of publishing books, Sunday School literature and a weekly religious newspaper. It has no capital stock. Its profits are not to go to individuals but to be appropriated to advance the cause of religious education, especially the higher education of the Christian ministry. The term "religious education" is regarded as an ideal common to Sunday Schools, missionary societies, colleges, seminaries and universities, and other organizations that promote Christian progress through Christian education. The Society through its trustees has purchased the entire assets and good will of the New Christian Century Company (including the subscription list and good will of The Christian Century; a contract of participation in the interdenominational syndicate for publishing the Bethany Graded Lessons; a contract of membership in the United Religious Press; all books, Sunday School supplies and other stock on hand; all accounts and bills receivable; besides assuming liability for all accounts and bills payable), for $16,000 and has executed its notes to that amount which have been accepted by the stock-holders of the New Christian Century Company in payment for their property. To provide capital for enlarging the business the trustees are issuing 5 per cent bonds in the amount of $50,000, retirable after five years, to be sold to persons interested in the ideals of The Christian Century. It is believed at the present time that not more than $25,000 of these bonds need be sold in order to put the Society on a sound profit earning basis. Subscriptions for the purchase of these bonds are now being solicited by C. C. Morrison and H. L. Willett, editors of The Christian Century. During Dr. Willett's absence in the Orient correspondence may be addressed exclusively to Mr. Morrison. Full information as to all details will be given upon inquiry. The essential purpose of the transaction and proposals herein described is to provide a way for the general brotherhood of the Disciples of Christ to buy The Christian Century and its publishing house and to pay for them by patronizing them. The bonds and notes are to be retired out of the profits earned by the Society. The purchasers of bonds, therefore, will stand, with the holders of notes, in the position of sustainers or supporters of the enterprise while the brotherhood's patronage is paying for it and increasing its value. The question of defining the membership of the Disciples Publication Society is still open, and upon it the organizers will be glad to receive suggestions. It is the purpose to make it thoroughly democratic and representative. The five trustees named by the charter will act for the Society until the basis of membership has been determined and the members elected.

A Book Review

THE DOCTRINE OF THE PERSON OF CHRIST. By H. R. Mackintosh, Professor of Theology, New College, Edinburgh. This volume is one of the well known series of the International Theological Library, of which some twenty numbers have previously appeared. It is designed, as the author states, for a student's manual, covering the whole field of Christology. Accordingly the book falls into three main divisions: I. Christology in the New Testament. II. History of Christological Doctrine. III. The Reconstructive Statement of the Doctrine.

The first division receives the usual treatment accorded the doctrine by those who recognize the several types of New Testament thought distinguished by criticism. The Synoptic Gospels are held to reflect Jesus' own self-estimate, while the rest of the New Testament literature in so far as it dwells upon the person of Christ expresses the values which Christian faith found in him. These values are diversely conceived and expressed, it is true, and yet the view of Christ's person presented throughout the main stream of New Testament thought is essentially one. In the Synoptics, in Paul's writings, and the Johannine literature alike, is expressed the conviction that in Christ God had been personally present in the midst of men for their salvation. Jesus Christ is set forth as the proper object of religious faith, even as the "Son of God from all eternity" (p. 35). All the New Testament estimates of Christ, however, are purely religious, and proceed from no theoretical interest. The history of Christological doctrine proper begins only with the sub-apostolic age, and especially with the Apologists of the second century.

In the second division our author traces the development that culminated in the formula of Chalcedon, thus fixing the doctrine that was to be orthodox for centuries to come. Upon the Chalcedonian doctrine of the two natures combined in the one person of Christ, Professor Mackintosh is specially severe. He quotes approvingly the strictures of Principal Dykes,—"A Being who combines in an inscrutable fashion divine with human properties, and of whom consequently contradictory statements can be made, whose single Person is Divine, while His dual natures hold an undefined relation to one another: this is not a scheme to satisfy either head or heart" (p. 215). Further he says that the Chalcedonian symbol represents a "form of interpretation which it is no real gain but a distinct loss to carry back in our minds to the study of the gospels." (p. 292.) With this it is interesting to compare Professor Warfield's recent appraisal of the doctrine of the two natures as being "a very perfect synthesis of the biblical data," "the key that unlocks the treasures of biblical instruction on the person of Christ as none other can, etc."

In his constructive statement our author seeks to avoid the contradictions of the Chalcedonian Christology while at the same time he tries to save the true divinity of Jesus Christ. He frankly abandons the old philosophy which sought to define and contrast the human and divine in terms of "substance" or "nature" apart from "personality," and presents a solution primarily ethical, spiritual and personal. His view may be seen in the following citation: "If we are inspired by Christian faith to affirm that Jesus Christ is identical with God in Will—a Will manifested in His achievement—we have reached a point beyond which no advance is possible; for in ethical terms, the highest terms available, we have affirmed His ontological unity with God in a sense generically different from that which is predicable of man as man. Intelligent will is the organic center of personality; and the will of Jesus fixes his absolute status in the world of being" (p. 304). Nevertheless this ethical Sonship of Christ is not to be thought of as opposed to the metaphysical aspect of Sonship. We should not forget that "the ethical is the metaphysical, that it represents the key to being as such. The ultimate and central reality of things is Will" (p. 417).

In a brief review it is not possible to discuss the problems raised in such a book as this. The test of our author's thought will appear when one tries upon his own principles to apply his conception to the New Testament facts, and when one asks for an explanation of how this absolute identity of will was possible to Jesus and to no other. In answer to this latter question our author can only use words which are after all equivalent to what the ancient formulas meant by "the homousios." Thus he speaks of "Jesus' possession of some inward and essential relationship with God, a living actuality which formed the conditioning prius of His ethical self-determination," etc. (p. 414).

The book constitutes a fresh and interesting presentation of Christology from a conservative viewpoint. Students of theology, however, will hardly accept it as forming a contribution to the subject. They will not acquiesce in the author's exemption of the New Testament origins of Christological doctrine from the same sort of scrutiny he applies to later developments. Nor will they admit that he has transcended the dualism which has been the bane of all Christologies. [New York: Charles Scribner's Sons. 1912, pp. 340. $2.50, net.]

The Germ of Infantile Paralysis

The medical amphitheater of Johns Hopkins hospital was packed last week when two tremendously significant announcements were made before an audience of physicians and other scientific men. Dr. Simon Flexner, director of Rockefeller Institute in New York City, declared that he had discovered and isolated the germ of infantile paralysis. He had found it, identified and cultivated it. At the same meeting Dr. Hideyo Noguchi, of the same institution, declared that he had discovered the presence of treponema pallidum in the brain of general paresis. The latter discovery means that this most hopeless of brain diseases sustains an intimate connection with syphilis; in other words, that "the wages of sin is death." It is another proof of what the world ought to have known long ago and which slowly and surely it is discovering. Now that the germ of infantile paralysis has been discovered the scientists of the country will give themselves no rest night or day till they discover a serum which will counteract that germ. Success to them, and all honor to those who thus devote their lives to the discovery of those agencies by which untimely death may be averted and add years to the span of productive human life.

The God of Storm and Flood

Out of the sunlight of Easter into the night and the storm; out of the day of gladness into the black midnight of desolation! Is it not enough that the forces of Nature set at naught the puny works of men's hands; must she also wreck the holiest of memorials of the faith of the human heart? The band played "Nearer My God, to Thee," and the Titanic went down into the ice-cold and fathomless depth. The choirs of Omaha sang, "I Know That My Redeemer Liveth," and the whirling storm drowned out the anthem.

We live in a highly improbable world.

In and of itself it does not certify a God of Love.

"Nature, red in tooth and claw, with raving shrieks against the creed" that God is love.

Nature, howling in the demon of the gale, Nature exulting in the fury of the fire, Nature dragging the great ship down into the black abyss, Nature overwhelming cities with the rushing flood, does not of herself assure us of a sufficiently good God to satisfy the needs of a time when men sit in the midst of desolation.

If some of the old Christian philosophies were inadquate to this strain, still less adequate are some of the newer forms of thought. The storm that burst on Omaha was no mere "error of mortal mind." The flood that desolated Dayton was not a mere mental delusion. These ills are incurable by means of soft sayings.

Let us have done with our cheap and mouth-filling platitudes. We live in a very stern world. Let us meet the facts as they are.

Christian faith is capable of facing all the facts of life unterrified. When Reason hesitates and Philosophy stumbles, Faith spreads her wings and lifts her voice:

> "The storm may roar without me,
> My heart may low be laid,
> But God is round about me,
> And can I be dismayed?"

After such events there are men who say, "My faith is gone. Could God be good and such things happen?" There are others to whom God long has been speaking and who have not heeded who listen now, and after the earthquake or fire or flood they hear the still, small voice.

There has come to this country a pamphlet in German by Prof. Lutgert, of Germany, on the shock which the optimism of Europe received from the earthquake of 1775. At that time the greatest name among philosophers was Leibnitz with his laws of monads and their eternal harmony. The brightest mind in contemporary life was Voltaire with a theory of an aesthetic benevolence in nature. And everywhere was a complacent deism that thought God was good but that he was not very much in earnest.

Then on November 1, 1755, the city of Lisbon went down with a loss of between 30,000 and 40,000 lives, and men began anew to examine their theories. From that time, Prof. Lutgert maintains, the rationalists ceased to be as optimistic as formerly and taught a doctrine of submission to the inevitable; while the orthodox, who had been counted pessimists in their sterner doctrine of God now rallied to a new faith, preached a goodness that could not be submerged by any calamity of life, a trust in God that no shock could overthrow, and a new emphasis on free will. Thus, as this author contends, the rationalists became the pessimists, and the Christians were revealed as the true optimists.

There had been a removal of the things that had been shaken, that the things that were not shaken might remain.

The true Christian has a faith in God which at such a time not only stands unshaken, but as this German scholar has so ably shown, proves in its very contemplation of the severity of God, the logical ground of optimism through faith in his goodness.

When human nature, appalled at the calamities that afflict the world, cries out that God is cruel, and life is a misfortune, something within us revolts at our own logic. If we, puny as we are, dare to demand of God that He shall be just and kind, then kindness and justice must lie very close to the heart of things. Justice must be very dear to the Maker of the universe, since He made us capable of such insistence. Our very doubt is an appeal to a goodness higher than nature alone reveals. It is a cry to the God that veils a smiling goodness behind the calamities of life.

We walk by faith, not by sight. When human wisdom has done its best, and has strained itself in its attempt to fathom profound mysteries, we return and learn anew our lesson of trust. We must believe in goodness somewhere.

Still within the shadow standeth God, and He careth for His children.

Eli: A Good Man But a Bad Parent

Can a man be good as a man and bad as a parent? A similar question is that of the good father who is a bad citizen. There is something lacking in the goodness of a man who fails in his duty as father or citizen. Of course good parents may have bad sons, just as good citizens may live in badly governed cities. But the sons will be bad in spite of the parents and not with their aid, and the cities are badly governed in spite of the efforts of good citizens. The family does not live unto itself. It receives and gives to the social life of which it is a part. The evil from the outside may destroy the influence of very wise fathers. Many who deride pious men for the evil in the lives of their sons have helped to ruin the sons.

The sons of Eli were public officials. It was their business to offer the sacrifices when the people came to the altar. For this service they were allowed a portion of the sacrifice. They were not willing to follow the customs regulating their pay but chose a method better suited to the demands of greed. In modern times we should call such men grafters. They used their office for private profit. It seems not to have occurred to them that the people had any rights. Their methods were violent. If the worshiper expostulated he received further insult. The whole procedure of the priests shows that they considered it foolish for any man to think he had rights which they were under obligation to respect.

The greatness of the sin of the sons of Eli is revealed in the statement: "The men despised the offering of Jehovah." That which was the center of the religious and racial life of the people was made contemptible. The result was that life was disorganized. Patriotism declined. Israel was easily overrun by her enemies. Heavy tribute was paid to the conquerors. That the sons of Eli later lost their lives in a vain endeavor to drive the enemy from the land does not redeem their names from shame. The methods they employed to save the country illustrate their ignorance of the requirements of true patriotism. They trusted to the magic influence of the ark rather than to character and courage, and the coöperation that is gained by unselfish leadership.

Eli is condemned because he did not restrain his sons. There is a report of one speech of remonstrance which he made to them in his old age. He used plain words about their sins. They paid no attention to his warnings. He was too late in making his protest. Wicked men have no sense. Reasons which appeal strongly to the good and wise are foolishness to the wicked. Had Eli trained his sons when they were children and caused them to walk in the way of right, they might have heard him when in his old age and weakness he gave them wise counsel. The habits of childhood largely determine what is possible in later life.

The good father takes account of the environment in which his children grow up. He stands for righteousness in the city and in the state. He does not consider his duty ended when he selects as the place of his residence a town with a good reputation. It is a part of his business to see that the good reputation is maintained and that a still better one is acquired. Men who demand good laws and safe environment for their families and yet refuse to bear any part of the burden of public responsibility are teaching their sons to be immoral in their relation to the public. If the sons learn to graft, they will not be departing far from the path in which their fathers walked. The fathers recognize no public obligation; why should the sons discover any rights of the public?

A man may be good in the sense that he is kind and desires the happiness of every one and at the same time be bad in the sense that through ignorance he is doing what is hurtful to his children. He wishes his children to be religious but he teaches them a religion of fear and causes them to lend a willing ear to those who say religion is useless and burdensome. He would have his children become good citizens but he instils into their minds prejudices that hinder the exercise of their powers in ways useful to the public. It pains him that any one should be feeble in body; especially is he grieved that ill health should spoil the careers of ambitious young people; yet he is ignorant of the laws of heredity and his own children pay the penalty of his ignorance. He is a reformer, perhaps, or thinks he is, but he does not know enough of history and social science to understand the causes of misery and he gives his children the example of a man who wasted his life trying to do the impossible. They must learn from some one else what is worth while or remain without ambition. [Midweek Service, April 9. I Sam. 2:12; 17; 3:9-14.] S. J.

Are the Episcopalians Protestant?

A few months ago, it will be remembered, certain Episcopalians, representing not the Protestant Episcopal Church, but a commission of that church in the Chicago meeting of the Federal Council of the Churches of Christ of America, protested against the use of the word "Protestant" in a report of the executive committee of the Council. The protest was heeded, strange to say, and the word was dropped out of that report. Many are still wondering, perhaps, how it came about that the protest of those not really representing any church should have had so much weight with the Council. Perhaps some are wondering why members of the Protestant Episcopal Church should have fought so hard against the use of the term "Protestant" in the executive committee's report. At the time the reason assigned was that the word "Protestant" prevented the Roman Catholics from even wishing to come into the colossal movement for federation.

But, more and more, as one keeps up with the controversy now raging in the Protestant Episcopal Church over changing its name from Protestant Episcopal to American Catholic, it is becoming apparent that their protest against the use of the word "Protestant" does not arise so much from a desire to make it possible for Roman Catholics to come into the Federal Council, as from a desire to bear witness that the Protestant Episcopal Church is not a Protestant body, despite its name. There is little doubt that the vast majority of the episcopate and the presbytery of the Protestant Episcopal Church are in a state of ecclesiastical convulsion over this very name "Protestant." Ever since 1886, there has been a movement to change the name of that church, chiefly because of that one word. That movement undoubtedly will come to a head next October in the General Convention to be held in New York City.

The latest champion for change-of-name is a Broad Church Party representative of the Protestant Episcopal Church, Rev. Dr. C. B. Wilmer of Atlanta, Ga. In a recent essay in The Churchman (New York City) Doctor Wilmer says:

> Truly and undeniably, the word Protestant misrepresents our position both historically and doctrinally. Not that we do not hold many things in common, but the word stands for some things we do not stand for. After doing full justice to the past and present work of Protestantism in the world, it remains true that "Protestant" is the antithesis not only of Roman Catholic, but also of Catholic. It does not stand, for instance, for the visible unity of the Church, but for the right and privilege of breaking that unity in order to propagate limited interpretations of Christianity, as Calvinism, or Converted Membership, etc. Was not Dr. Newman Smyth exactly right when he said of the "destruction of the oneness of the Church" that it is "the summation of the losses of Protestantism"?
> We are told, indeed, that to drop the word Protestant from our name will be to widen the chasm between us and our separated brethren. That would be sad indeed, but are we entitled to a truce dependent on keeping in the dark what our real position is? And I make bold to affirm that the statement of real catholicity will cause less offense among intelligent Protestants than our present misunderstood position, because a religious body claiming catholicity and wearing a sectarian name is either absurd or arrogant. On the other hand, there are many indications that the whole Protestant world is ripe, or getting ripe, to consider an ecclesiastical position which is neither Protestant nor Roman but comprehensive enough to do justice to and include the truth that is in both. Never has there been among Protestants the appreciation that there is now of the corporate strength of Rome, nor such an appreciation of the evils of division.

This language is not totally unfamiliar to Disciples of Christ who have historically labeled their plea as a protest against Protestantism, and have insisted that they were neither Protestant nor Roman, but striving to occupy a truly catholic position. "A religious body claiming catholicity and bearing a sectarian name is either absurd or arrogant"—here is the interpretation of the stubborn refusal of the Disciples through all the years to allow a denominational title to be attached to them.

If the title "American Church" or even "American Catholic Church" could be worn without arrogance or presumption by those now called Episcopalians or Presbyterians or Methodists or Disciples or any other portion of the body of Christ, not exclusively, nor with the presumption of superiority, but in the humble desire to prepare the way for ultimate unity, no disciple who understands the mind of his Lord could make any intelligent objection.

Not all of us are thoroughly convinced that Episcopalian name changers conceive the matter in just this way, however.

"An Old Game Keeper"

A sea captain, who conveyed Livingstone back to Africa on his last voyage, has told the story in one of the British newspapers. Neither he nor the men on board suspected that Livingstone was an extraordinary man. He was a good man and they liked him and on Sunday they called all hands aft and he read the service of the Church of England and gave short talks, which the captain remembers to have heard, but none of whose subjects he can recall. He does remember, however, some bits of conversation with the great missionary. In one of these he asked Livingstone why he did not now settle down at home and take advantage of his well-earned rest as he was getting on in years and the climate was perilous? Livingstone answered him that his work was not yet done. This was his stereotype reply, but he gave one other answer: "What could I do if I should return to England? There is nothing I could do to earn a living but just to be an old gamekeeper."

If David Livingstone had not gone to Africa the last time he might have stayed in England, great as he was and good as he was, and died an old gamekeeper. Yet he would have been a hero deserving of better things.

There are missionaries just as faithful as Livingstone who for entirely good reasons do not go back when they are old and feeble; there are faithful home missionaries who are forced out of the pulpit much against their will when old age comes upon them. Some of them are just as good, heroic and consecrated as Livingstone. There are ministers who have wrought with great self-denial through years of sacrifice, who find old age and poverty staring them in the face and with hardly even so inviting an opportunity to earn a livelihood as by becoming old gamekeepers. Is it not time for the Church of Christ to do something for its aged heroes? Let it be remembered that he who sleeps in Westminster Abbey might have been prevented from returning through no fault of his own and being still a hero might have spent his last years as "an old gamekeeper."

A New Cult for Foolish Women

It calls itself "Improved Christian Divine Science, the Coming Church," and it is sending out its literature and giving its treatments present and absent. We substitute "John Doe" for the real name of "this child of God" who is announcing his revelation after this fashion:

"If you cannot see me in person dear Soul, and you are in any kind of suffering, I will make you feel happy and successful 'just the same,' if you will do what I ask of you. I ask of you, dear Soul, to love me divinely—a divine love that has no doubt, fear, or lust. Unquestionably you would be willing to obey and serve me. Unquestionably you will or would not allow yourself to find any fault with me. Come into this spirit towards me dear one, and the second you do you will be made free and happy, and the grace of God will be felt and rest with you.

"This is a Godly promise I swear unto you.

"THE DIAMOND KEY
"A Special Divine Message for Womankind.

"Come dear sister and I will deliver you from all pain, sorrow, failure, drudgery, slavery, ungodliness, ignorance, the strong sinful hand of man and your unbeauty.

"I will make you a Queen, a divine woman, also beautiful in looks, deeds, and acts.

"You will strengthen every man's character, redeem him and perfectly subdue him with your Godliness.

"You will have all your wants gratified, all your desires fulfilled.

"You will succeed in every undertaking. You will be able to come, go, and do all things you wish to do, and no one could harm you.

"You will have a Godly power to do Godly things, and cause man to treat you Godly and be worthy of you. You will set a Christly example for all mankind, and you will possess all Godly wisdom, power, freedom, success, and happiness. . . .

"Come get well and free dear Child of God, and believe me it does not make any difference if you have disobeyed God's ways in the past, and not any difference the kind of sickness you may have, and not any difference if you are with or without any kind of faith.

"Come just the same and get perfectly well and happy once more.

"Come and get freedom from any and all bondage.

"Come and learn the art of truthfulness, love and kindheartedness.

"THE PRICE

"Is to sincerely ask and earnestly desire it, and then appreciate it, and then divinely love this child of God, John Doe, that God has chosen to manifest Himself in and through, which is all that is asked."

The "Safety" Razor?

Is there any accounting for tastes—in whiskers? Sometimes we think there is and then again we don't know. Just now the fact that one member of President Wilson's cabinet wears "side-burns" appears to make him the most talked-of member of the presidents' advisers. That the soldier should be "bearded like a pard" is reasonable. The soldier in active service is bearded because he has no time to shave. The Crimean War re-introduced the beard to England, as a glance at old volumes of Punch will show, and the Civil War changed the beardless American to a nation of brigands—operatic brigands we mean. Although practically every Protestant reformer in England and every Puritan divine in the American colonies, wore a mustache and "imperial" no minister with such facial adornments could have got a call in either England or America sixty years ago. The minister of that period adopted side-whiskers with the receipt of his license to preach. But the politician without close-cropped "chin whiskers" was looked upon with suspicion in Illinois and the west generally "before the war." It is safe to say that the clergy are the most conservative class in any country and even Episcopal bishops give up reluctantly the upper-lip adornment which none of their predecessors possessed for two hundred years. So far as we know the Dunkards are the only considerable body of Christians in our country who seek to regulate the disciple's beard in the interests of his religion and with the authority of the church. But we would advise our young candidates about to seek pulpits to study their environments and to follow rather than seek to lead the customs and fashions of their parishioners.

Church Peace League of America

The universal peace movement has been given another tremendous impetus by the announcement that the Federal Churches of Christ in America has organized the Church Peace League of America, a fruit of the Chicago convention of the Council last December. The Council at that time authorized the formation of such a league. Church Peace Leagues in both Germany and Great Britain have proved powerful influences for good in those empires. For three years past, requests from these empires have come across the Atlantic Ocean for a similar organization on this continent. It is significant that the churches of Great Britain, Germany and America have now come together in a movement that will go a long way forward in cementing fraternal sentiments between the peoples. The churches may do what politicians so conspicuously fail to do.

There are no dues in the new organization. It is the hope of the Council, we understand, that every minister of Christ will enroll and lend his influence to the aims and ends of the movement. Probably the first thing the Church Peace League will try to do is to encourage and promote the arbitration of the Panama tolls question. The temporary chairman of the new league is Dr. J. M. Remensnyder of New York City, and Rev. Frederick Lynch is serving as secretary.

Lay Preaching in Kansas

The unworked possibilities of lay service are brought out graphically by A. M. Brodie in The Continent (Presbyterian, Chicago) who gives an account of "An Epidemic of Lay Preaching in Kansas," to use the headline of his remarkable story. Under the magnetic spell of a business man, Tom Blodgett of the wholesale firm of Cox-Blodgett, of Wichita, about twenty-four "gospel teams" of lay preachers have in one year effected the conversions of 1,913 men and boys within a radius of 250 miles of Wichita. As one team leaves a town, a local team is formed which reaches others around its center with the gospel. These gospel teams, inspired by Tom Blodgett, are formed of all sorts and conditions of men.

The New Baptist Feeling for Unity

A few weeks ago Rev. George E. Horr, D. D., president of Newton Theological Institution, delivered an address at Harvard Church, Brookline, Mass., under the title "The Baptists and Church Unity." In it Dr. Horr answers the question: "What will Baptists sacrifice for the sake of union?" as follows:

"It seems to me their answer is, 1. Northern Baptists by their union with Free Baptists have practically remanded the matter of so-called 'close communion' from the denomination to the individual church.

"2. We may properly countenance the public dedication of infants on the part of their parents to the Christian life with the insistence that the observance shall not be called baptism or in any way confused with it.

"3. We are showing by the organization of the Northern Baptist Convention and the increasing vogue of permanent councils that tendencies toward representative government are bringing us into closer affinity with more centralized communions.

"4. We may appropriately welcome a larger liturgical element in worship. This attitude on our part would do much to break down a bar to church unity that has been more serious than any suppose."

Northern Methodist Sunday School Figures

The Northern Methodists report substantial increases in all their annual Sunday-school figures just published, an encouraging sign of its vigor. The most encouraging features are the increase of 274,060 of scholars who are church members and probationers and the increase of 163,805 conversions, showing conclusively the relative merits in that church of both revivalism and the Sunday-school as an evangelistic force within the church. The claim is made that in its 381,069 officers and teachers the Methodist Episcopal Church has "the largest body of lay workers in the world." The Board of Sunday-schools gave out the following figures at its first annual meeting for the new quadrennium:

		Increase
Sunday-schools	35,644	342
Officers and teachers	381,069	8,475
Scholars of all grades not including Cradle Roll and Home Department	3,428,294	228,213
Average attendance of all grades	2,037,257	151,318
Members of Home Department	207,488	16,967
Members of Cradle Roll	255,413	14,498
Total enrollment in all departments	3,891,195	259,678
Grand total in all departments including officers and teachers	4,272,264	268,153
Officers and teachers who are church members or probationers	250,937	15,171
Scholars who are church members or probationers	1,409,102	274,060
Conversions	163,805	8,698
Current expenses	$1,937,434	$270,456

Co-operation by Federation at Park Ridge

The Central Methodist Episcopal and the First Congregational Churches of Park Ridge, Ill., a suburb of Chicago, have not organically united, but have definitely federated in a coöperative religious work under the pastorate of Rev. J. L. Dickson, formerly pastor of the Central Methodist Church, according to the Northwestern Christian Advocate (Chicago). At the present time, both church edifices of the former two congregations are being used by the federated churches, but a splendid church building to domicile the unique enterprise, is now being planned.

Park Ridge is a suburb of 2,500 inhabitants. The Congregationalists first possessed the land. The initiative in the new federation was taken by the Congregationalists. Committees of both churches conferred, and both committees then organized as a joint committee to begin work at once. This was last summer. In due course of time, federation, not organic union, was decided upon. A plan was proposed to be passed upon by the Coöperative Council for City Missions of the City of Chicago, consisting of representatives of the following churches: Baptists, Congregationalists, Disciples of Christ, Methodist Episcopal and Presbyterian. With recommendations of some minor changes the plan was approved by the Council, leaving the details to be worked out by a board of directors. This is now being satisfactorily worked out by the board consisting of an equal number of representatives from each of the bodies federated and of which the pastor is, ex-officio, the chairman. The preamble of the Park Ridge agreement is as follows:

"The churches named in the title to this agreement, in order to bear witness to the unity of the Church of Christ, to promote and to maintain her spirit and aims, to conserve and to augment her resources both spiritual and temporal, and to use those resources constantly in the ministry of word and deed, to form and to build Christian character, and for the glory of God and the good of men, do by the terms of this agreement establish a federation."

Union Seminary and the General Assembly

Ever since the memorable Briggs heresy case in the '90s, Union Theological Seminary, New York City, has been independent of the control of the General Assembly of the Presbyterian Church, U. S. A. But today committees on both sides are gravely discussing the reestablishment of harmonious relations. The seminary has appointed a committee and so has the General Assembly. These committees met jointly for the first time in New York City on March 13, and discussed hopefully the resumption of the former relation. Among the members of the seminary committee are President Francis Brown, Dr. Anthony H. Evans and Dr. Charles H. Parkhurst. The church's committee has Dr. John F. Carson as chairman. The other clerical members are Dr. David G. Wylie of Scotch Church, who introduced the original resolution before Assembly, John R. Davies of Philadelphia, Samuel S. Palmer of Columbus, Ohio; Frank C. Monfort, editor of The Herald and Presbyter. All the laymen on the committee are judges except Louis H. Severance. The judges are Warren E. Settle of Frankfort, Ky.; Henry B. Freeman of Chicago, and Elisha H. Perkins of Baltimore.

Church Sexton Buried with Honors

After serving as sexton for fifty-one consecutive years in the Second Presbyterian Church, Chicago, Edward L. Bradley died March 10. He had retired from active life only five months before his death. He was born in Dansville, N. Y., in 1842. After being dismissed from military service following the Civil War, he became sexton of the Second Presbyterian Church. Probably no other American has died with so unique a distinction in the kingdom of God—that of being a doorkeeper in the house of God for more than fifty years. It is said that Mr. Bradley had a custom of holding impromptu prayer meetings when things went wrong about the church and applied common sense that was remarkable for its obvious sanctification. Some years ago, Mr. Bradley became the author of a book, "Talks on Many Topics," said to be the only book ever written by a church sexton. At his funeral the elders of the church, wealthy and distinguished citizens of Chicago, acted as pallbearers, and a great concourse of people attended.

—The Chinese Evangelical Church of Chicago will be the name of the church to be erected in Chinatown and operated under the direction of the co-operative council of city missions. The council, which represents the Baptist, Christian, Congregational, Methodist and Presbyterian churches has elected officers. It is estimated that $50,000 will be required for the building and equipment which will be solicited from the denominations interested and from the Chinese.

—President Wilson has not decided on what church he will attend regularly in Washington. With a dozen or more Presbyterian churches located within easy reach of the White House the President has kept Washington folk guessing each Sunday as to the one he would select. There is a friendly rivalry among those who would have the President worship at a particular church all the time, but Mr. Wilson will probably not make a final selection, if at all, until he has attended all the Presbyterian churches.

—Rev. Robert E. Hill of the Trinity Baptist Church, Brooklyn, has been preaching a series of Real Life sermons—sermons that carry a powerful punch on such subjects as "The Old Folks at Home." Says Dr. Hill: "The religion of Jesus Christ is a religion of hope, of cheer, of optimism of inspiration. We don't find Jesus Christ expecting sons and daughters to fail because their parents failed. That boy or girl is already on the high road to a better life who, recognizing the fact that his parents are failures, registers a solemn vow to become an improvement on the old stock."

—Another of the brands plucked from the burning by that old-time life saver of Chicago's well-known Pacific Garden Mission, Harry Munroe, went Home last week. It was "Old Dick Lane," who years ago was a burglar with many bad years behind him and an awful hatred of society in his heart. He fell into the mission one night, as they say, some eighteen years ago and was converted by Mr. Munroe. "Well, I thought if religion could do that man Monroe any good it wouldn't harm me any—and, besides, I rather wanted a place to hide," Lane writes in his autobiography, "so I went inside." Harry Munroe pulls a stroke oar in a lifeboat that has pulled in many a floater tied only to a fast sinking spar.

Religious Education Association

The decennial convention of the Religious Education Association was held at Cleveland, O., during the second week of March. The general topic discussed was "Religious Education and Civic Progress." This was treated in ninety principal and sub-principal topics. Fully 160 speakers were assigned to discuss them. President Charles F. Thwing of Western Reserve University, Cleveland, who later in the convention was chosen its next president, welcomed the big gathering to the "second city of the lakes." Among the speakers were President Harry Pratt Judson of the University of Chicago, the successor of Dr. W. R. Harper, who founded the association ten years ago; President Robert A. Falconer of the University of Toronto; Doctor William C. Bitting, of St. Louis, Dean W. T. Sumner of Chicago, President Henry Churchill King of Oberlin, President E. Y. Mullins of Louisville.

One of the most interesting sections was that of Sunday-schools. Last year a special commission was appointed under the chairmanship of Professor Walter S. Athearn of Drake University, to consider the conflict of functions between Sunday-schools, young people's societies, missionary organizations and brotherhoods in typical American congregations. The commission had been asked to report some sort of a program to unify all such activities. Professor Athearn made the report as its chairman. His main suggestion was that every congregation should maintain a live educational committee, comprising representatives from every organization that attempt anything of an educational or training function. This report will be printed, and a wide circulation is predicted for it.. The officers for the ensuing year are as follows: President, Dr. Charles F. Thwing, Cleveland; first vice-president, Dr. Henry S. Pritchett, New York; treasurer, Charles L. Hutchinson, Chicago; executive board chairman, Dr. Abram W. Harris, Chicago; recording secretary, Dr. Charles M. Stuart, Evanston, Illinois; general secretary, Dr. Henry F. Cope, Chicago. New Haven, Conn., will be next year's meeting place.

The Church in China

Is there a Church in China? And if there is, what is that Church? It appears that the name Chung Hua Sheng Kung Hui (literally translated as "The Church in China") was the name adopted by missionary bodies of the Protestant Episcopal Church and the Church of England. Apparently, such an adopted name was bound to give rise to unfriendly criticism on the part of the missionaries of other Christian bodies. It did. The implications of such a name galled them. If "The Church in China" is exclusively Protestant Episcopal and Church of England, where did other missionaries stand and what were their converts members of? "Sincere regret" has been expressed by the Hunan Synod of the Wesleyan Methodist Church in a painful resolution. Here is a paragraph of such a resolution, showing which way the wind is blowing in China:

> "The adoption of the name which belongs to the whole 'congregation of faithful men' in China in which the pure word of God is preached and the sacraments duly administered according to Christ's ordinance in all those things that are requisite to the same by one part of that 'congregation' is improper.
> "Moreover the acquiescence of the remainder in such a use of the words would necessarily imply that those thus excluded acknowledged themselves to be unchurched and to be living in schism apart from the Body of Christ.
> "This being so, we resolve not to use the two names assumed by the Anglican section of Christ's Church in China. We deprecate the use of these names in any books or literature published in connection with the general work of missions in China.
> "We are convinced that if the action of the Episcopalians, which is as far as we know without any precedent in the West, is not reversed, the result must seriously jeopardize the cause of unity among missionaries and also among Chinese Christians."

OUR READERS' OPINIONS

CONCERNING CONVENTION SUGGESTIONS.

Some time ago there appeared a suggestion from Rev. George A. Campbell that the communion service at the Toronto Convention be held, not in one place on Sunday afternoon, but in the local churches where our ministers speak at the morning services. I have two points to note with regard to this very good suggestion.

First, it would be very difficult to make such an arrangement with the local churches in question. Our people are not widely known in Canada, and our motive would probably not be clear to the mass of the membership of these churches.

Second, the objectionable features in connection with this service, which have been sometimes quite apparent, will scarcely be possible here. Massey Hall is compact, well carpeted and cushioned with splendid acoustic properties. A fine pipe organ will render cornets unnecessary, and photographers will be quite out of the question. I believe this service will prove to be deeply devotional, the climax of the Convention, as it ought to be.

There is a suggestion which has come to me from one of our local men, that I trust may be considered by our brotherhood and by the Program Committee. It is that we give some time on the program to the recognition of the fact of one hundred years of peace between the two great English speaking nations, the United States and Great Britain. This is a fact of great political significance in the maintenance and promotion of the movement toward universal peace. It ought to be emphasized on our program by one or more speakers of the right calibre and prominence. "Peace Day" in our program would give our Convention real international importance. Our brotherhood will seldom have an opportunity of such timeliness to give the weight of our influence to the movement toward world-wide peace. C. O. Reynard.

EDITORS WILL COME AND APOLOGIZE GLADLY!

Editors The Christian Century: In your recent issue you state that Mr. Taft arriving, as has been a frequent custom of his, in Augusta, Ga., "was received by the entire city, which stood in one spot—that nearest the depot." Your implication is either a reflection upon the avordupois of Mr. Taft or the size of our city. In view of the fact that the last census gave us more than forty thousand and we have since annexed ten thousand more, the entire city could scarcely stand "in one spot" within our corporate limits. May I advise your readers that Augusta, Ga., is "no mean city": she is an ideal "spot" for winter tourists like Mr. Taft, Mr. Rockefeller, Mr. Carnegie and others who come annually, attracted by our charming winter climate and southern hospitality, though we never all stand in one spot to receive any of them. If "ye editors" will make us a visit I shall be on the spot to receive them and make them feel as much at home as do our other "noted men" of the nation. Howard T. Cree.

THINKS SCOTT NOT A GENUINE HERO.

Editors The Christian Century: In your issue of Feb. 27 appears an editorial entitled, "A Victory for Humanity," referring to the discovery of the poles. I at once made a slight change in the last word of your conspicuous title, and it has looked down from my paper-rack ever since as "A Victory for Inhumanity."

I thought that it must be the lack of the heroic or some other lamentable defect or twist in my nature not to appreciate the real issue of an article to which you had devoted the best page and an entire page of your space.

So I read again, only, however, to underscore that last word in its changed form, and—well, I must not read again or I shall probably conclude that your pen was possessed by the spirit of Mark Twain or Bill Nye.

The story is told of a stranger who happened into a political meeting in a small town. After one of those characteristic outbursts of vociferous applause he asked one of the patriots who had shouted himself hoarse in the excitement, "Sir, what do you really think of the issue?" who promptly replied, "I want you to understand I did not come here to think. I came here to holler." It is only in the frame of mind of this patriotic citizen that I can get my consent to "holler" with the Century on the subject of North Pole heroism.

It is certainly a question of values which must determine our judgment. And the Century's editorial asks in the outset, "What is the real value of the discovery of either pole? Merely this: The human mind having set itself to the task of conquering the globe will stop at nothing short of the full achievement of that perilous ambition. It is matching man's will and fortitude against storm, cold and hunger. The flags of the civilized nations float now over both poles."

My mind feels like simply putting a "What of it?" after each period and then wait a minute to see a real hero step out. It reminds me of the farmer who went to his fields one morning and as he heard the low rumbling of an approaching express train he stepped to the fence to see it go by. A large, long-horned Texas steer had just reached the track. When he saw the black object rushing towards him he raised his head and curled his huge neck ready for the attack. When the train had rolled by and the crushed and bleeding mass of flesh and bone had rolled down the embankment the farmer exclaimed, "Glory to your spunk but confound your judgment!" Was he mistaken? and should he have called it a victory for cattledom?

The editorial asks, "For after all what is the value of the discovery of either one of the poles?" The answer follows: "It is certain that no manifest practical benefit is to be derived therefrom." This statement would not have been disputed a hundred years ago. No one ever expected any beneficial results from the discovery of the poles. The whole wild scheme but recounts a long series of foolhardy adventures with a criminal sacrifice of life and fortune upon the altar of nothingness.

The awful and reckless waste of polar expeditions ought to be held up as a part of the very common and fearful tragedy of the failure to compute real values rather than as an achievement which merits the applause of right-thinking men.

DR. WILLETT'S MISSION TOUR

The Land of Korea

When we came out on deck about nine o'clock on the morning after we left Japan, the shores of Korea were plainly in view, and we soon came into the harbor of Fusan. This port has rapidly attained importance in the last few years as the southern terminal of the Korean Railway, that runs north and south from end to end of the peninsula.

For Korea is situated in much the same manner as Florida, a somewhat long tongue of land running south from Manchuria, between the Yellow Sea on the west and the Sea of Japan on the east. It is something like six hundred miles in length, about 150 wide, and has a coast line of more than 1,700 miles.

We had not left the ship before we were made forcibly aware that we were in a land strikingly different from Japan. The Koreans on the dock were not for a moment to be identified under any classification we had met. The men were dressed in white trousers, coat and usually a long overcoat, all of white, but not thick enough to seem a protection from the rather chilly weather. Yet this is the invariable costume of the people, save where dirt has changed the color. As far as you can see him, you can tell a Korean by this white clothing.

South Gate, Seoul, Korea.

Hats Are Distinctive.

But the hats are the peculiar feature of the make-up. They are of black thread or horsehair, tall like a silk hat, but so small in diameter as to sit high up on the head, with a rather narrow rim, and a strap under the chin. Within this hat the Korean usually wears a small round skull-cap of the same material, which he keeps on in the house. And under all he wears his hair done up in a knot, which is as characteristic of his race as is the queue of the older type of Chinese.

The women have a still more curious dress. There is a skirt, or pair of loose, baggy trousers, of the same white goods worn by the men. This ends at the waist in a belt of several folds of the goods. Over this is worn a very short, loose jacket, which comes down only half way from the shoulder to the waist, and when there is no movement of the body, just reaches to the upper border of the wide belt. But this is not usually the case, and there is often displayed a strip of bare flesh quite around the body, and when the arms are lifted in carrying burdens on the head, the breast is entirely exposed.

It would seem as if white should be the last color for such a people, for they at once make the impression of utter disregard of filth. A short trip through the streets of Fusan made it evident to us that here there were no daily baths in hot or any other sort of water. The dwellings are low and dirty, the children unwashed and scantily clothed, in spite of the cold weather, and the men and women distinctly unkempt. The men usually wear thin, stringy beards, unlike the shaven Japanese. There seems no attention to sanitation, and a sewage system is unknown.

Heavy Loads Carried by Men and Boys.

The thing that struck us all with astonishment was the size of the loads carried by the men and boys, and even by the women. They have a sort of rack, which they hang over the back as the basis and binder for whatever they are carrying. These racks are made of limbs of trees with a convenient knot projecting, so as to form a crotch, on which the load is placed. There seems to be no limit to the weights the people can transport with these contrivances.

But the population of Fusan is only in small part Korean. The Japanese have come pouring into the country at such rate in the last few years that in all of the cities and towns of importance they are the leading factor if not actually in the majority. Japan has need of just such an outlet for her crowded population, and she got control of Korea just in time to serve her purpose. The ship on wnich we crossed to Fusan brought a large group of Japanese, who had the appearance of newcomers who intended to stay. And I was told that every arrival from across the straits brings fresh consignments of the conquering race.

The train equipment from Fusan up through the country to the Manchurian border is excellent. There are two trains a day in each direction, with good, comfortable coaches. Then three times a week there is a so-called train de luxe, which has a make up equal to the best Japanese trains. This road is operated by the Japanese government, which is of course the master of the land. Probably these best trains are run at considerable loss, but they are regarded as a good investment by the officials of the state railway department, because they advertise the country, and stimulate the investment of capital there both by the Japanese and foreigners.

Korea Unlike Japan.

But the true character of Korea appears as soon as one leaves the vicinity of the city and traverses the country inland. The train moves through a land as different from Japan as could be imagined. It is very uneven, but has little of the picturesqueness of Japan. The hills and mountains have little of the forest beauty which is so abundant across the straits. It is a meager, poor, unkempt landscape that one sees.

The villages are squalid and for the most part composed of thatched mud huts. Only now and then is there a town of substantial structures. The fields are little, irregular bits of land, mostly used for the growth of beans and rice. In the latter case the water necessary for the crop is held in by low mud dykes around the patches, and is drawn off from one to another level through little openings. In the spring and summer one judges the land must be much more attractive, but at the autumn season in which we passed through it looked dreary enough.

The roads are nearly all paths, along which the white-clothed people were making their way in all directions. Far out across the plain we could see them walking singly or in companies, following single-file along the paths. Only rarely did there seem to be a road wide and smooth enough for one of the two-wheeled carts that can now and then be seen. These are drawn by bullocks, and carry loads of produce along their creaking way. But nearly all the burdens are carried by human beings. Human flesh is cheaper than animal. And even the cattle, which we began to see here, are more valuable for beef in the markets of Japan than for draft purposes on the highways of Korea.

It was an all-day trip from Fusan to Seoul, the capital city, where we arrived about nine at night. It was a cold, windy night, in striking contrast with the comfortable weather we had been enjoying in Japan. The porters from the Sontag Hotel met us, and took us to the line of waiting 'rikisha men who stood just outside the station, each carrying a paper lantern with the hotel name upon it. It was a ride of some twenty minutes to the hotel, and we were glad to reach the warmth of heated rooms after the chill of the streets.

Uncomfortable But Interesting Days.

The days we spent in Seoul were most interesting, though not the most comfortable one could wish. We were hardly ready for winter so quickly after leaving Japan. But the place was worth taking time to see. The walls of the city, that include not only the settled part, but as well a large open tract on the mountain side to the west, recount the story of earlier struggles with Chinese and Japanese invaders. The tradition of Hideyoshi's invasion of Korea is one of the classics of Japanese history, though the expedition brought nothing to Japan but glory, and to Korea only suffering.

The city gates are impressive, though the walls have been broken down near them to facilitate traffic, and the streets now run around rather than through them. These streets are wide and windy, and on the busiest of them the wares are set far out toward the center of the street in front of the shops. Now and then some enterprising merchant takes a bucket of water and sprinkles the road in front of his door, but usually the dust has free way before the wind.

In the center of the city stands the palace, surrounded by a wall. On certain days admission may be gained, though the time spent is hardly profitable. Seoul was once the capital of the country, but now is only the residence of the governor-general, who rules in the name of Japan. The old deposed emperor of Korea and his young successor, who first took up his place at the command of Japan, and later gave us his throne, likewise at the command of Japan, are pensioners of the Tokyo administration. Korea is a land without a ruler, an army or a hope of its own. It is bowed down under the dominion of Japan. It is a heart-broken country.

There is no misfortune comparable to a youth without a sense of nobility. Better be born blind than not to see the glory of life. —Theodore Munger.

Church Union in Canada

By C. O. Reynard

EDITORS' NOTE: Extraordinary interest attaches just now to religious movements and conditions in Canada. For the first time in their history the Disciples of Christ will be entertained in their annual convention by their brethren of the Dominion. They will find many features of Canadian Christianity worthy of emulation. It will surprise not a few to discover how far the sentiment of Christian unity has developed in certain of the communions where it might have been supposed the general conservatism of the people would inhibit its spread. When our first regularly organized "General Convention" meets in Toronto next October it will be difficult to repress the question in some hearts at least: Why do not the Disciples, whose essential business it is to practice unity, have a part in this movement which is the most ambitious departure from the denominational order yet undertaken on this continent? Mr. Reynard's painstaking and graphic tracing of the movement for our readers will whet their appetite to know more of it when they can talk face to face with their Canadian brethren.

The present day negotiations looking toward the organic union of the Presbyterian, Methodist and Congregational churches in Canada are the logical and almost inevitable outcome of the past history of these bodies. They have had practical experience of Christian union; they have found it profitable and statesmanlike; they believe that the application of the same principles among the denominations that they have found practicable within their own denominations, will work out on a larger scale the benefits that have come in the smaller way.

The Presbyterian Union.

The Presbyterian church in Canada is a great, aggressive, unified body with a communicant membership in 1912 of 295,935 persons. It is the result of a process of unification beginning in 1817. In that year the Synod of Nova Scotia was effected, uniting the "Burgher" Presbytery of Truro and the "Anti-burgher" Presbytery of Pictou. There were opponents, one Presbytery in particular. Other bodies of Presbyterians which were carrying names designed to distinguish them in particular from their brethren in general, entered into unions in the years 1840, 1860, 1861, 1866 and 1868. The result of these six unions was that in 1868 there were but four Synods, or organic bodies, of Presbyterians in Canada, from coast to coast.

Negotiations were entered into by men prominent in the life of these four Synods, with the result that in the early part of Tuesday, June 15, 1875, the supreme courts of the four negotiating churches met separately for the last time, in various churches in the city of Montreal. Each adopted a resolution to repair to Victoria Hall, there to consummate the union. From that day dates the union of all Presbyterians in Canada, under the name "The Presbyterian Church in Canada."

The roll of members of that first General Assembly showed the names of 623 ministers. In June of this year, 1913, will assemble in Knox church, Toronto, the thirty-ninth General Assembly of the Presbyterian Church in Canada, with a roll of 1769 ministers, and the one outstanding matter for consideration will be the ratification or rejection of the Basis of Union now proposed between that body and the other two already named.

The Methodist Union.

The Methodist Church of Canada has had a somewhat similar history. While in the United States there are sixteen differing kinds of Methodist bodies, in Canada there is one great Methodist church with a membership of 351,710 in 1912. This unity has not been brought about easily, or without opposition and friction; there are still a few Methodists standing aloof from the present day organization; but within itself Methodism is today a strongly aggressive body, putting its men and its money in a statesmanlike way into the new and growing West.

The present unified body is the result of two union movements. In September, 1874, there met in the Metropolitan Church in Toronto, a General Conference of the Wesleyan Methodist Church, Methodist New Connection, and the Conference of Eastern British America. This Conference effected the union of these bodies, which took the name "The Methodist Church of Canada." It was divided on geographical lines, into six annual conferences. In four years they reported an increase of 134 ministers, 20,659 members, 221 Sunday-schools, and 19,754 scholars. Union was seen to mean growth and economy.

In September, 1883, this union body was joined by the remaining Methodist bodies—the Methodist Episcopal, Primitive Methodist, and the Bible Christians. Since that time, Methodism in Canada has been one. Their leaders testify that "Pentecostal prosperity has followed the union." The evidences of the benefits are seen in every department of the work of the church: in evangelism, in Home and Foreign Missions, in Bible Schools and young people's work.

They are ready for the larger union that has been proposed, and are hastening it on. At a meeting of the Special Committee of the Methodist General Committee in July, 1912, the following resolution was adopted: "That in view of the urgency of the situation throughout Canada, especially in the West, due to the great inrush of new settlers, and to the desire of the people in many centers of population to secure actual union in their own localities, this General Conference Special Committee is of the opinion that if the union of the negotiating churches is to be brought about, it is in the interest of the Church and of the extension of the Kingdom of Christ that the said union should be consummated as soon as practicable."

The Congregationalists.

The third member of the proposed union is the body of Congregationalists. Their last year book reports ninety-six pastors and supplies, 197 churches and stations, and a communicant membership of 13,000. Included in this number is the membership of the United Brethren of Canada, which body entered into union with the Congregationalists in 1907. This relatively small body has shown admirable spirit in the negotiations for union. They were the first to vote favorably upon the proposed Basis of Union, casting a vote of 86 per cent in favor of the measure. It is doubtful whether the negotiations between the two larger bodies could have proceeded very far, without the presence of this smaller group which has acted as a kind of buffer between the larger groups. Their influence has been considerable in settling points of theological and executive difficulty.

A Larger Union Desired.

With these three bodies enjoying the benefits of union within themselves, it was but natural that the desire for a more comprehensive union should be felt. In 1899 the Presbyterians appointed a small committee "to bring about a more satisfactory state of things in our Home Mission Fields, so that the overlapping now complained of may be prevented." In 1902 the Methodists appointed a similar committee, and the two committees addressed resolutions to the men on the field advising coöperation and comity in their respective work. Meanwhile, a definite proposal for the organic union of the Presbyterian, Methodist and Congregational churches had emanated from the Methodist church. Their General Conference which met at Winnipeg, Man., in September, 1902, appointed a committee of fifteen, composed of the General Superintendent, seven laymen and seven ministers to act as a Committee on Union, backed by a strong resolution proposing the union. A part of that resolution is this:

> And whereas a definite proposal has been discussed to some extent in the press and elsewhere looking to ultimate organic union of the Presbyterian, Congregational and Methodist churches in Canada, this General Conference, in no spirit of exclusiveness toward others not named, declares that it would regard a movement with this object in view with great gratification, believing that the deliberate friendly discussion of the doctrinal, practical and administrative problems involved, with the purpose of reaching an agreement, would not only facilitate the finding and formulation of a Basis of Union, but would also educate the people interested into a deeper spirit of unity, and into that spirit of reasonable mutual concession on which successful consumation of such movements ultimately so largely depends.
> And this General Conference would further commend this movement to the prayerful interest and sympathy of the Methodist Church, in the devout and earnest hope that, if organic union of the denominations named be achieved, it may be accompanied with great blessings to the Church and to the nation at large and redound to the greater glory of God.

This resolution was presented to the Presbyterians and Congregationalists, and they appointed similar committees. The chairmen of these committees were: Presbyterian, Rev. Principal Caven, D. D.; Methodist, Rev. Dr. Carman; Congregational, Rev. Hugh Pedley. Their first joint meeting was in Toronto, Dec. 21, 1904. They met again in 1905 and 1906, and at the latter meeting addressed communications to the English church (called Episcopalians in U. S.) and the Baptist churches. The former replied to the effect that their coöperation would be possible only upon the acceptance of the "Lambeth Quadrilateral" including the "historic episcopate," and this the joint committee of the three churches felt unanimously obliged to decline. The Baptist Convention of Ontario and Quebec, in reply, set forth a statement of the distinctive principles of their church, and stated that because of these principles, they considered it "necessary to maintain a separate organized existence" and to "propagate these views throughout the world."

The joint committee held its last meeting in December, 1908, having finished its work, the preparation of a Basis of Union, to be submitted to the three bodies, and voted upon by them. All of their sessions, excepting the first, had been in the Metropolitan Methodist Church, Toronto.

The Basis of Union.

The Basis of Union is a lengthy document of about ten thousand words treating of I. Doctrine, nineteen articles; II. Polity, (a) the Church, (b) the Pastoral Charge or Circuit or Congregation, (c) the Presbytery (District Meeting or Association), (d) the Annual Conference (Synod or Union), (e) the General Council or conference, III. The Ministry; IV. Administration; and V. Law. Article XV, under Doctrine, has the following an Baptism:

"Baptism with water into the name of the Father and of the Son and of the Holy Spirit is the sacrament instituted by our Lord to signify and seal our union to himself and our participation in the blessings of the new covenant. The proper subjects of baptism are believers, and infants presented by their parents or guardians in the Christian faith. In the latter case the parents or guardians should train up their children in the nurture and admonition of the Lord, and should expect that their children will receive, by the operation of the Holy Spirit, the benefits which the Sacrament is designed and fitted to convey. The Church is under the most solemn obligation to provide for their Christian instruction."

The Basis of Union was submitted to vote, first to the highest courts, then downward to the local membership. The Congregationalists sent it at once, in 1909, to their local churches and membership; 50 per cent voted, 86 per cent voted Yes. They are ready for the consummation of the Union.

The Methodist Conferences were without exception for the Union. All thirteen Conferences voted for it. When it was submitted to the membership, however, there was found to be a pretty strong minority dissenting. The question as submitted was as follows: "Are you in favor of organic union between the Methodist, Presbyterian and Congregational churches, upon the proposed Basis of Union?" Answer "Yes" or "No." The vote was as follows:

	For	Against
Members of Official Boards	23,475	3,869
Communicants, over 18 years,	150,941	24,357
Communicants, under 18,	17,918	2,615
Adherents	42,115	7,234
Totals	234,449	38,075

This is a vote of 86 per cent in favor of organic union on the proposed Basis. The Methodists may be said to be ready for it. The West is overwhelmingly so; Montreal and Ottawa Districts show the strongest opposition.

The Presbyterians submitted the matter to their people in the form of three questions as follows:

1. Are you in favor of the organic union of the Presbyterian, Methodist and Congregational churches?
2. Do you approve of the proposed Basis of Union?
3. Have you any suggestions or alternatives to offer?

The returns were interesting. In the ministers' and elders' vote, representing the churches officially, the Presbyteries (groups of churches) voted 54 for to 14 against the union. But taking the Presbyteries as represented by the popular vote, the vote was sixty-seven to one (that one curiously enough the same Presbytery of Pictou in Nova Scotia which had been in opposition away back in 1817!) The popular vote on the questions, as numbered above was:

	For	Against	For
Question 1—
Elders	6,391	2,535	72 per cent
Communicants	109,577	49,156	69 per cent
Adherents	38,356	14,380	73 per cent
Question 2—
Elders	5,321	2,273	70 per cent
Communicants	82,090	38,265	68 per cent
Adherents	30,011	10,773	73 per cent

Question 3 brought forth some alternative suggestions; mainly in the line of church federation and coöperative work.

The vote of the Presbyterians showed too strong a minority to be disregarded. It was thought by many to put an end to the movement toward union. But the vote was found to be more favorable than those by which Presbyterianism itself has been unified. The last General Assembly of the church held in Edmonton, Alberta, in June, 1912, referred the vote to a much larger committee enbracing some of the strongest opposition leaders. It declared the Assembly in favor of the union and resolved "in view, however of the extent of the minority which is not yet convinced that organic union is the best method of expressing the union sincerely desired by all, the Assembly deems it unwise immediately to proceed to consummate the union, but believes that by further conference and discussion practically unanimous action can be secured within a reasonable time."

This committee has been interrogating the opposition, and are considering most carefully their position. It is firmly believed, however, by the leaders of the church, that in the next General Assembly to be held in Knox Church, Toronto, this year, June, the matter will be favorably considered by a largely increased portion of the Presbyterian church in Canada. The last barriers to organic union are being removed.

It will take some years to settle and adjust all matters of detail, but no one seriously doubts that the modern world's first experiment in organic union of three large Protestant bodies is close at hand in Canada.

How will the united church be named? There is nothing said on that point in the Basis of Union. But its opening words are these: "We, the representatives of the Presbyterian, the Methodist, and the Congregational branches of the Church of Christ in Canada"—

Church Union at Work.

But real church union does not wait for the formal acceptance of it. It is already on a working basis, to some extent, at least. The Home Mission Boards of these three denominations are working in close affiliation to prevent overlapping of their mission fields. A Joint Committee on Church Extension in Toronto decides upon the location of new mission points in that city. There is an increasing number of union charges in the West, where churches of these bodies are served by a minister of one of them. Even in conservative Ontario there are some of these. The Orangeville Presbytery has been redistricted, so that Methodist and Presbyterian preachers serve churches within easy reach of each other, without regard to previous denominational name.

In Montreal, the theological schools of these churches, and of the Anglicans beside, are all in affiliation with McGill University and their theological courses are very largely in common. This is

The Life Everlasting

By Washington Gladden.

The Christian faith which I am trying to confess is that the conscious life of the spirit does not terminate with the death of the body; that the physical organism is the shelter or the temple of the immortal life. There are those who suppose that science has undermined and overthrown this belief; that it has succeeded in so fully identifying the body and the soul as to leave no room for faith in any separate existence of the soul. This is a great error. Few of the great scientists of the present day make any such assertions; many of the greatest of them emphatically declare that there is not a particle of proof that the human intelligence may not exist apart from the body. "Biology," say Thomson and Geddes, "admits, through, probably, the majority of its experts, that the phenomena distinctive of life cannot, at present, be restated in the language of chemistry and physics." Prof. J. H. Muirhead says that psychology "vindicates, for the mind, a reality of its own, independent of the physical order."

Hope for Future Life.

There is no demonstration by science of the reality of a future life. But there are hints and suggestions of possibilities worth considering. It is noteworthy that many eminent scientific men who maintain that there is no proof of a future life, yet confess that they hope for it.

Death dissolves these physical organisms which we inhabit, but may there not be something untouched by this dissolution? Zimmern is of the opinion that electricity can exist, apart from matter. If that is possible, it cannot be incredible that thought should exist apart from matter. That mind, so far as the present order is concerned, has a physical basis, is not questioned; and death is the dissolution into atoms of this physical basis.

"But science," says Walker, "is now teaching that these atoms are not ultimate. What is ultimate, science is not yet able clearly to say. As far as it goes, it is ether in some form. Therefore, there may not really be that complete dissolution, even of the physical, which has been imagined." Under the atomic structure there is an ethereal base with which consciousness may be implicated. "May we not believe," inquires this scholar, "that when death dissolves the chemical basis of our life (and death can do no more), the ethereal basis remains untouched, and our life goes on in a higher world?"

These things are not set forth as scientific verities, or even as scientific probabilities; they are simply possibilities to which candid scientific men have opened their eyes. They do not warrant us in affirming that life goes on after the body returns to dust, but they do warrant us in saying that the denial of it is pure dogmatism.

Nature of Evidence.

If, however, we want to find reasons for our belief in the reality and permanence of the spiritual world, we shall be obliged to look for it somewhere outside the material world. If I wished to prove my friend's loyalty to me I would not think to obtain evidence by taking his temperature or counting his pulse or measuring or weighing him; I should look for it in other quarters. If I wanted to get the real value of Beethoven's Fifth Symphony I should not think to find it by counting the number of notes in the full score nor by estimating the number of foot-pounds of muscular energy expended by each of the members of the performing orchestra. Spiritual things are spiritually estimated. And we must not miss the truth for which the great philosophers of to-day, like Eucken and Bergson, so stoutly stand, that the spiritual nature has its own laws, its own standards, its own certainties.

The first word of the spiritual order is love—the affection by which one finds his joy in the well-being of another; the goodwill by which the gains of life are shared, and giving becomes more blessed than receiving. This is not a fact of the physical order. But if anything is indubitable it is that this principle is the highest thing in the universe. The universe comes to its fulfillment in love. Life, when it is finished, bringeth forth love. My faith in love is the deepest thing in me. Love, as the heart of the universe, is what I mean by God. And because I believe in a God of love, I believe in a future in which love can come to its completion, and in which the millions to whom life in this world has been but a melancholy failure may come to their own.

Power of Belief.

All this is belief; it is not knowledge. I think it is a reasonable belief. And we must not forget that most of the great interests of life rest on belief and not on knowledge. No man knows how his business enterprises are coming out; it is by faith that he is walking.

The pair who stand at the marriage altar do not know that wedlock will bring them happiness, but their faith is strong in each other and in the future. Even science is based on faith—what Huxley calls the great act of faith in the validity of causation. The fact that the conviction of the reality of the future life is based on faith need not lead us to regard it lightly. All our heaviest investments are made on the basis of probability.

The old theology confessed its faith in the resurrection of the body. There is no doubt that this phrase was generally understood to signify the re-animation of the identical body laid in the grave.

In the processes of thought this idea has been necessarily abandoned by intelligent persons, and a wholly new conception has been read into this phrase. We know that the bodies of our dead do literally return to the dust from which they were taken; that they mingle with the earth; that the elements composing them are taken up by plants and thus returned again to the kingdom of life, entering into grasses and grains and fruits which are the food of man, and thus passing by constant procession from life to death and from death to life.

Many of the same particles of matter which compose our bodies have belonged at death to other bodies, which have the same right to claim them. How, then, is it possible that the matter of which each body is composed when it is laid in the grave, shall be collected and re-animated for the use of that particular individual?

Composition of Body.

But what, after all, is the body—your body and mine? It is not the particles of matter which compose it, for these are constantly changing. The body which you inhabit to-day is no more composed of the same material of which it was composed a year ago than is the Scioto River down at the Broad Street bridge composed to-day of the same drops of water that composed it a year ago.

Nevertheless, we say truly that the bodies which we inhabit to-day are the same bodies that we lived in a year ago; they are of the same height (if we have reached maturity), the same features; a substantial identity is possessed in the midst of all the changes. What is it that abides through all these mutations? There is some co-ordinating force or principle by which our bodies are organized and the processes of life are carried on. The body is a building and there is an unseen builder always at work upon it, repairing, renewing, reconstructing, changing it in every part, yet building always by the same plan.

Death is the release of this invisible builder from his task of building with earthly materials, and the resurrection is the resumption of his work in another sphere of existence, where we may hope that with finer and more plastic substances he will build for the spirit a fairer and more enduring habitation. There is no room for dogmatic statements about a matter so far removed from human experience; and the hypothesis which I have suggested is only to be used as a possible explanation of the Scripture assurances of life beyond the grave.

Expresses His Belief.

We may sum up what we have said in these three propositions:

1. I believe in the continuance of conscious life after death.
2. I believe that this conscious soul will have, after death, a form of appearing; that it will be personalized in such a form.
3. I believe that this form of appearing will be the human form divine, in its ideal perfection.

It may be said that these are but hopes; are they therefore valueless? We are saved by hope, Paul says, and there is no other hope more full of saving power than this. When we confront these great possibilities hopefully it seems to us that life is worth living. Existence in this world becomes sublime when we think of it as the prelude of the life everlasting. Struggle, suffering, privation we may bear with patience if we believe that they are only the good discipline by which we are trained for nobler service by and by.

the first year of such an arrangement, and it may be discontinued later, but is proving very satisfactory thus far. Victoria and Knox Colleges in Toronto interchange classes and professors. The new $500,000 Knox College being built will in all probability be the theological training school for the ministers of the three churches in the union church when it is consummated. This interlocking of educational work is pretty far advanced all over Canada.

The united church will at the start have a combined membership of nearly 700,000, as compared with 200,000 Anglicans and 135,000 Baptists. No other denominations have very large memberships.

With organic union consummated in Canada, and church federation operative in the States, we may soon be able to prove experimentally, the merits of these two methods of "practicing Christian unity."

MODERN WOMANHOOD

Conducted by Mrs. Ida Withers Harrison.

Mrs. Harrison will be glad to receive communications from any of her readers offering suggestions concerning woman's welfare, criticisms of articles or inquiries concerning any matters relevant to her department. She should be addressed directly at 530 Elm Tree Lane, Lexington, Ky.

THE CHILD IN LITERATURE

The few times when children are mentioned in the Old Testament hardly comes within the scope of this article. The incident of the preservation of the infant Moses, and his adoption by the Egyptian premises, is told purely for its historic value—to show how the future leader and lawgiver of Israel was prepared for his work by his residence and training in the royal court.

The care of the child Samuel is more significant—asked of God, and given back to God by his devout and grateful mother. What light is thrown on the value the good Father sets on childhood by the fact that in those days when there was no frequent vision and the word of Jehovah was rare, of all the thousands of Israel this little boy was selected to receive the divine Message! But Samuel was an exceptional child, and neither can this incident be claimed as a recognition of childhood in general.

The Child in the Midst.

The first recognition of the beauty and meaning of childhood in literature was when Jesus set a little child in the midst, and preached that immortal sermon on the divineness of childhood, and the glory of humility. And the second was like unto the first:

"And they brought young children unto him, that he should teach them; and the disciples rebuked them; but when Jesus saw it he was much displeased (mark that rare and significant displeasure of the Master!) and said unto them,

"Suffer little children to come unto me; forbid them not; for of such is the kingdom of God. Verily, I say unto you, whosoever shall not receive the kingdom of God as a little child, he shall not enter therein. And he took them in his arms, and blessed them, laying his hands upon them."

Did you ever think that just two things are held up to us by our Lord as objects of imitation—himself, and the child?" Except ye become as little children, ye shall not enter into the kingdom of heaven."

No Child in the Heathen Religions.

We sometimes fail to note how epoch making was this attitude and these utterances of Jesus. In no religion but that of Jesus do we find the child. "Mahomet seemed to know nothing about children. The heathen nations found no place for the child in their mythologies; their gods are not born as children—they have none of the attributes of childhood." The seeming exception of the little god, Cupid, is no exception at all, for he stands for a passion that implies maturity.

With such religions, we are not surprised that heathen literature was a childless literature—that in their social conceptions, in their policy as states, the child had no rights. Even in a state with such elements of nobility as Sparta, the child stood for nothing but the possible soldier or statesman; if it seemed to have either physical or mental weakness that would unfit it for future service to the state, the father not only had the right to destroy the helpless little one, but he was commended for exercising it. The child had no rights of its own—the issues of its life and death rested with the parent, or with the master, if it were born a slave. And what was true of Sparta was true of other Grecian States, and of heathendom generally. Aristotle and Plato recommend that all defective and inferior infants shall be destroyed, and many Greek and Roman writers speak approvingly of the same cruel custom.

It was to such a state of society as this, that not only had the right to murder the weak and the surplus among its children, but whose religions often demanded the sacrifice of its helpless little ones to cruel Molochs, that the Bill of Rights of childhood was promulgated:

"It is not the will of your Father in Heaven, that one of these little ones should perish."

No Child in Early Christian Literature.

With the child thus exalted, not only as possessing the rights of other rational beings, but as an ideal of character toward which seekers after God should strive, we would have supposed that Christian literature would have had much to say about it—but such does not seem to have been the case. For many centuries, it was as silent concerning the child as had been the literatures of Greece and Rome. May this have been (and I suggest this diffidently) because the church itself helped to make these beautiful portions of the teachings of Jesus of none effect by its dogmas? Who could think of the child as a pattern of the kingdom of heaven, while the dark doctrines of total depravity, and the damnation of unbaptized infants obtained?

It is true, that when Art awoke after the long sleep of the Dark Ages, it gave us many pictures of the infant Christ—but mainly as an adjunct to the Virgin Mother. There seemed to be no recognition of the claims of childhood, no vision of its sacred and appealing charm.

In the literature of our own race, what name can you recall as having given us an immortal picture of childhood? There is no child among Chaucer's pilgrims, though they represent the motley and picturesque life of his day. The splendid pageants of Spenser, are of men and women only; and Shakeespeare's rich and varied world has but few children—the helpless Arthur in King John, who talks as maturely as a man, the young prince in Winter's tale, who hardly talks at all, the boy in the Merry Views of Windsor—these, and a few others exhaust the list of Shakespeare's children. Milton's majestic verse has naught to do with childhood—and what is true of these great ones is generally true of the lesser lights of literature of their day. And if the outburst of poetic and dramatic literature in the Elizabethan Age, and the lofty strains of Puritan poetry were all but childless, how much also could we expect the dissolute writers of the Restoration, or the artificial poets and prose writers of Queen Anne's day to concern themselves with the innocent and artless little ones. It is true, that Smollett and Fielding began some of their novels with the boyhood of their heroes—but merely from a purpose to begin at the beginning—not because there is any meaning in the childhood of Peegrim Pickle, or Roderick Random. The few chapters devoted to their boyhood, merely tell of overflowing animal life, finding its vent in pranks and practical jokes. To cut a long story short, I can recall no author in English literature, previous to the Nineteenth Century, who treated childhood with anything like insight into its meaning, or love as to its sacred significance. It seems a sweeping thing to say, (and I have never heard anyone say it, so I may be mistaken), but to my mind the first author who ever "set the child in the midst" for loving and reverent study, since our Lord throned the little ones in his arms, was William Wordsworth.

The Quest of the Tin Soldier

(With no Apology to Eugene Field.)

BY ARTHUR ROBB.

The Toy Dog awoke with a start, then stared in amazement. The Little Tin Soldier was rubbing his rusty gun with such energy that the clink of its barrel as it struck against his belt-buckle had disturbed the dreams of the Toy Dog and awakened him.

"Why, Tin Soldier, what are you doing?" exclaimed the Toy Dog.

"Cleaning my gun, can't you see? I have marching orders," gravely returned the Little Tin Soldier.

"Where are you going," asked the Toy Dog, his curiosity getting the upper hand.

The Little Tin Soldier ran his eye along the barrel of his musket. Seemingly satisfied he brought his gun to "order arms" and saluting the Toy Dog said: "I am going to find out where Little Boy Blue has gone." There was a tremor in the brave voice of the Tin Soldier, and his lips quivered just a bit. The Toy Dog blinked his eyes hard.

"Right shoulder, arms! Forward, March!" Rat-a-tat-tat, rat-a-tat-tat, rat-a-tat-tat-tat-tat; rat-a-tat-tat, rat-a-tat-tat, rat-a-tat-tat-tat-tat-tat. Out into the hall marched the Little Tin Soldier. Rat-a-tat-tat, rat-a-tat-tat, rat-a-tat-tat-tat-tat, down the stairs, through the vestibule, into the street, the sound of the falling footsteps dying away in the distance as the old clock on the landing struck two. The Toy Dog gave a sigh, turned around three times and lay down to sleep.

Down the street, opposite the park, at the fountain a little brown sparrow was fast asleep, his wee head tucked under a wing. He stirred uneasily in his sleep as from up the street came the sound of footsteps falling quickly on the pavement. Rat-a-tat-tat, rat-a-tat-tat, rat-a-tat-tat-tat-tat; rat-a-tat-tat, rat-a-tat-tat, rat-a-tat-tat-tat-tat-tat. Louder grow the rat-a-tat-tat. "Halt! Present arms!" The little brown sparrow nearly jumped from his feathers. The Tin Soldier saluted and spoke:

"Can you tell me where they have taken Little Boy Blue?"

"No, I don't know what you are talking about," crossly returned the sparrow; "I would like to know what you mean by disturbing honest folk this time of the night." And with that sparrow changed to his other leg and shut his eyes for another nap.

The Little Tin Soldier shouldered his musket and again started down the street.

Under the oaks in the park a little gray squirrel was making a banquet from the scattered crumbs of a picnic party of the day before. In the bright moonlight the shadows from the leaves made checkerwork on the green-sward, and like an animated pawn or knight on a chess-board, the gray squirrel hopped from shadow to shadow in enjoyment of his dainty feast. Suddenly he stopped and listened. His sharp ears caught an unusual sound borne down on the south-wind, the sound of footsteps falling sharp and quick, faint at first but rapidly growing louder as they approached. Rat-a-tat-tat, rat-a-tat-tat, rat-rel sat still and out of the moonlight came the figure of the Little Tin Soldier.

"Column left, march!" Across the green, through the delicate golden tracery of the shimmering moonlight on the grass came the Tin Soldier straight to where the little gray squirrel sat. "Halt! Present arms; little gray squirrel can you tell me where they have taken Little Boy Blue, I am trying to find him." The voice was brave and steady now.

The gray squirrel dropped the crust from his paws as he gently replied. "Little Boy Blue,—Little Boy Blue,—why that was the little boy who used to bring me nuts and cake a long time ago. Little Boy Blue,—Little Boy Blue,"—and the voice of the gray squirrel was so soft and low that the Tin Soldier bent forward to hear what he said. "They took him up that road across the bridge over there one day to the City of Rest and he never came back."

"Thank you little gray squirrel, I go on to find him. Present arms! Order arms! About face! Forward, march!" Rat-a-tat-tat, rat-a-tat-tat, rat-a-tat-tat-tat-tat-tat-tat. Down the street marched the Tin Soldier the sound of his footsteps again growing fainter in the distance. Rat-a-tat-tat, rat-a-tat-tat, on past the park, across the old bridge at the lake, thumpity-thump, thumpity-thump, thumpity-thumpity-thumpity-thump, his tread sounding clear and hollow on the old bridge. Rat-a-tat-tat, rat-a-tat-tat, up the hill-road to the gates of the City of Rest, the great White City sleeping in the moonlight. Between the tall columns that formed the entrance marched the Tin Soldier, on past the tall granite shaft with a soldier-boy leaning on his gun on its top, on beyond the little stone chapel until he came to a little hill at whose foot a well-worn path left the main roadway. With a knowledge born within himself straight and true marched the Little Tin Soldier along the path until he came to its end. And there under a graceful maple-tree that strangely reminded the Tin Soldier of another tree near the nursery window, stood a tiny white stone. A graceful honeysuckle vine clung to the white marble shaft and its fragrance sent a sweetness out into the summer night that made the Little Tin Soldier feel oddly queer. The inscription cut in the stone was partly covered by the clinging vine and the Little Tin Soldier could only read the last lines:

"Our Little Boy Blue
He is not here, he is risen."

Long did the Tin Soldier standing at parade rest gaze at the lines, then with a sigh that was almost a sob he shouldered his musket and up and down through the hours of that sweet summer night he marched and kept his lonely vigil, the sound of his measured tread carried away on the scent-laden night-wind to the Beautiful Land far beyond the City of Rest.

* * * * * * * *

The clock on the landing was striking four when the Toy Dog awoke. From down the street through the open window came the echoing sound of rat-a-tat-tat, rat-a-tat-tat, rat-a-tat-tat-tat-tat-tat-tat, rat-a-tat-tat, rat-a-tat-tat, and he knew the Little Tin Soldier was returning. Rat-a-tat-tat, rat-a-tat-tat, louder grew the sound but the footsteps were slow and weary. Rat-a-tat-tat, rat-a-tat-tat, up the steps, into the vestibule up the stairs, and into the room, rat-a-tat-tat, rat-a-tat-tat.

"Halt! dismissed!"

"Oh, Tin Soldier," greeted the Toy Dog, "did you find Little Boy Blue?"

"No," gravely and sadly answered the Little Tin Soldier, "no, but I have found where he has gone. I am tired now, and will tell you all about it after a while," and lying down on his gun the Little Tin Soldier was soon fast asleep.

When Alice came in to dust the room in the sunlight of the bright summer morning she exclaimed: "Why, somebody has knocked down the Little Tin Soldier."

But the Toy Dog standing guard over his friend kept his counsel.

Church Life

Sunday-school Teaching at the Nth Power.

The story of sixteen years of fruitful and faithful leadership of a great young men's Sunday-school class by Mr. Dwight N. Lewis, an attorney of Des Moines, Ia., is told in a local newspaper by Finis Idleman, pastor Central Church of that city. One hundred and sixteen young men were in attendance on Sunday, March 16. A picture taken in front of the church building is reproduced together with several other pictures to illustrate Mr. Idleman's article which fills the entire page. Names of well known business men in Des Moines are set down as having at one time been members of this class. Of Mr. Lewis, his pastor speaks this word, which every true teacher will recognize as a revealment and interpretation of his own ideals. "The central figure in the class is the teacher of the class himself. Dwight N. Lewis, assistant state commerce counsel, has been the only teacher the class ever had. No matter what the burden resting upon him personally might be, he always goes to his class with the same genial good cheer through sunshine and shadow. He counts it a disgrace to come to his class unprepared. One might not recognize the real force of his strength, for he has so successfully used class members in organization as officers and committeemen, that they seem to be performing the whole round of duty. But those who know the class best understand that all that is done radiates somewhere, some time in the vicinity of the teacher's personality. This mastering love for his boys has held them like Napoleon's soldiers to their leader. Patient with them in their failures, frank with them in their misdeeds, encouraging them in their nobility, rejoicing with them in their victories, he has revealed the true instincts of the moral leader. If you were to ask any of the young men whether any of the ethics of the Bible are practical in this generation or not, they would doubtless answer you in the light of the life of their teacher." Mr. Lewis' lay ministry to boys and young men in Des Moines represents Sunday-school teaching raised to the nth power.

Illuminated Cross on New Church House.

The new house of worship of Central Church, Atchison, Kans., which it is expected to complete next summer will bear aloft upon its dome an illuminated glass cross, probably the first instance of such a feature appearing upon a meeting house of the Disciples. The idea is that of the pastor, Jesse Bader, who believes that this symbol of Christianity ought not be allowed by Protestant churches to be monopolized by any section of the Church but that it should be utilized freely by all churches as a beacon and symbol of the gospel. The cross will be made of a translucent opalite tile which has the appearance of the whitest marble in the day time and at night lends itself to brilliant illumination by electric light bulbs placed within. The Atchison congregation is building a beautiful house of worship.

A Congregation's Rich Missionary Life.

First Church, Paris, Ill., has outlined a very substantial and comprehensive program for missionary activity during the year 1913. The following are some of the interests represented: The church supports the Sunday-school and other services of the Christian chapel in South Paris. The King's Daughters and Sons raised about $400 last year for local benevolence and will do even better this year. The church and Sunday-school support Fred E. Hagin, "living link" missionary, Tokio, Japan. The church contributes $500, the Sunday-school $100. The C. W. B. M. supports Dr. Martha Smith, medical missionary, Mahoba, India. The Y. P. S. C. E. aside from contributing to the general missionary funds of the church, supports an orphan at Damoh, India, and is making an effort to put in the church a missionry library of one hundred volumes. The Sunday-school helps the following causes: National Benevolent Association, Foreign Missions, Student Work at the University of Illinois, Illinois State Sunday School Association, Home Missions, State Sunday School work of the Disciples. The budget for Home Missions will be raised in the fall. The following causes will be supported: American Christian Missionary Society, Illinois Christian Missionary Society, The Church Extension Society, The National Benevolent Association, Christian Education, The Board of Ministerial Relief. This great congregation possesses a rich missionary life. H. H. Peters is pastor.

Roof Garden on New Church House.

The proposal to build a roof garden on the new church building to be erected by First Church, St. Louis, has created some stir in newspapers of that city. This congregation has recently sold its downtown property and will purchase a lot in the better residence section upon which it is intended to erect a building suitable for institutional church activities. John L. Brandt is the pastor. When the new church is established, with all its departments and accessories, it will, according to Mr. Brandt, offer every form of wholesome recreation and amusement and give its members educational facilities of many kinds. "I believe there are 400,000 persons in St. Louis who do not go to church at all," said Dr. Brandt. "Perhaps 150,000 attend church regularly, but I do not believe there are more than that. Thousands, of course, are kept away by illness, the nature of their employment and other considerations, but the majority stay way from church because they don't like to go. It is to the majority that we shall appeal with our institutional church. We will make it so attractive that they will want to attend. We will not force religion upon them but we will show them that religion is not something to be regarded with dislike. The roof garden on the new church will be used for moving picture shows and other entertainments, and possibly for Sunday evening sermons in warm, fair weather. In the airdome, illustrated lectures and sermons, travelogues and educational demonstrations will be given during the summer in addition to picture shows and dramatic entertainments. As education features the church will offer courses in bookkeeping, shorthand and other branches. A kitchen, containing several ranges and full equipment of all kinds of cooking, will be provided for domestic science classes. It also will be used to prepare meals and refreshments served at the church. In discussing the roof garden, Mr. Brandt said "Why should we waste all that space by a sloping roof? Of what use are massive domes and lofty towers? Will it not be better to have there a beautiful spot, where our members and their friends can rest and see pleasing and uplifting entertainments?"

Protestant Men's Non-Church-Attendance.

H. A. Denton preached to men in a Sunday afternoon service in his evangelistic meeting at Galesburg, Ill., on the subject "Why Men Are Not in Evidence in Protestant Meetings." In that sermon he undertook to go down to the foundation causes of Protestant non-church-attendance. He said that our Protestant religion was too much given to things artificial and arbitrary. That we were not candid and matter of fact in pronouncement. That there was too much cant and holy twang talk in church to suit the average man. That there was a disposition to stress things that did not mean much in the real struggle of life and too little effort to get at and help men in a genuinely constructive effort to make them better. He said the men of the church ought to run it and finance it and let the preacher be free to preach to it. W. E. M. Hackleman is assisting Pastor Denton by taking charge of the singing during the series of meetings.

A communication from A. D. Harmon, pastor First Church, Omaha, gives the following information concerning the effect of the tornado upon Disciples churches in that city. Eight families in First Church were unhomed. Some of them lost everything. In the North Side church, where H. J. Kirschstein is pastor, the loss was much heavier. About sixteen of his families were unhomed. In some instances the loss was complete, the people escaping with only the clothes they had on. None of our members was killed. Many were hurt, but it is thought none fatally. The church property is unharmed.

Dr. J. H. Garrison, editor emeritus of the Christian Evangelist, addressed a mass meeting of the Disciples of Los Angeles County, Calif., in First Church, Los Angeles, on Wednesday evening, March 19. Dr. Garrison's subject was: "Is the Plea of the Disciples Able to Adapt Itself to Present Problems, Social and Religious?" Dr. Garrison answered with an emphatic yes.

Finis Idleman, pastor Central Church, Des Moines, has taken up the cause of an unfriended woman who was lodged in jail under charges of which Mr. Idleman believes she is absolutely guiltless. He has given bond of $1,000 for her appearance in court and has provided her with a capable attorney. The case of the woman has stirred the sympathy of the community.

Dr. W. E. Garrison, President of the New Mexico College of Agriculture and Mechanic Arts, after having made an extraordinary record for his institution during his six years of incumbency, now retires from its leadership. It is suggested that small politics rendered the situation uncongenial to Dr. Garrison. He will probably return to the East.

Myers Hall, the new home for the Kansas University Bible Chairs, at Lawrence, Kan., was dedicated this week, Wednesday, April 2. The "Chairs" were established by the Christian Woman's Board of Missions twelve years ago. Professor Wallace C. Payne has been the instructor since the Chairs were founded.

Ninth Street Church, Washington, D. C., will celebrate its twenty-second anniversary next Sunday by raising the remaining portion of the church debt. E. B. Bagby, of Baltimore, former pastor, will be present and assist.

The annual meeting of the College Association is being held this week at Christian University, Canton, Mo., on Friday and Saturday. No doubt a number will go from the Congress at St. Louis to Canton.

A new Sunday-school building on the recently purchased lot adjoining the church edifice is the objective toward which South Side Church, Lima, O., is bending its efforts. F. C. Lake is the pastor.

Disciples and Baptists by an opposing vote rejected a plan for uniting three congregations at Colville, Wash., the Congregationalists having voted in favor of the union by a decided majority.

Jackson Boulevard and Sheffield Avenue Churches in Chicago have each been enjoying a week's series of meetings at which city pastors of other congregations preached.

The Southwest Iowa District Convention was held at Chariton last week.

last year. There are twenty states in which the offerings to date are smaller than they were for the corresponding period of last year. The aggregate loss in these states being $1,139.79. Notably among the states reporting loss are Kansas, Nebraska, West Virginia, East Washington, North Carolina, Alabama, Massachusetts and Texas. "We certainly do not like these backward steps," the secretary says, but in spite of these losses he reports that the offering is making a splendid gain due to the fact that 566 schools have sent offerings this year from whom no offering was sent last year and 785 schools have increased their offering over the preceding year. In the first six months the offerings received equal the total contribution for the entire twelve months of last year.

Toronto Notes

Wychwood Church, D. Munro, pastor, has recently enjoyed a series of meetings, led by Wilmer Monroe, of the Keele Street church. There were six additions, and a general enlargement of vision for the whole church.

Keele Street church is enlarging and redecorating their basement, preparatory for larger Bible School work. The superintendent, Mr. D. Sinclair, is enlisting the support of a fine body of teachers, and the school is feeling the result in growing numbers and enthusiasm.

Cecil Street church has closed a series of two weeks meetings, led by the pastor, C. O. Reynard, assisted by volunteer workers from the local membership. There were ten baptisms, and four additions by letter and statement. This church will continue to support their Living Link missionary, Miss Mary Lediar, Tokio, Japan.

We are already receiving requests for reservation of rooms for the convention. Hotel accommodations in Toronto are good, but "The early bird—".

The Toronto brethren are preparing to entertain the Convention after a good fashion. Our visitors will be delighted with the trip hither, especially if it is made by way of Niagara and across Lake Ontatrio. Toronto is a beautiful city with many attractions. You will enjoy a trip to Canda. Toronto is the cream of it all. (Apologies to Winnipeg.)

Toronto Disciples are saddened by the death of Mrs. Harlan. She visited Toronto quite recently in connection with Convention arrangements. Our people were delighted with her kindly personality. We feel her loss keenly.

C. O. Reynard.

Foreign Mission News

Last week the Foreign Society received an annuity gift from a friend in West Virginia. This is the third gift from this source. The Foreign Society has friends that have made as many as a dozen different gifts on the annuity plan. Another annuity gift of $500 from a friend in Denver, Colo., has just been received.

The church at Highland, Kans., raised about $100 more this year in its budget than last year. They raised $850. E. Ellsworth Day, the minister, says "Our aim now is two Living-Links by 1915, or for every dollar spent at home or on the home-field another dollar spent away from home for the Lord's program."

The church at Colorado Springs, Colo., becomes a Living-Link in the Foreign Society. S. E. Brewster is the minister. There will be still other churches of this class before the year closes. We are hoping some of our larger Sunday-schools will reach this rank on Children's Day.

Our brotherhood in Australia publishes a monthly magazine in the interest of Home and Foreign Missions. It is called "Missions" and F. Collins is the editor. It is a very creditable publication.

N. S. Haynes of Decatur, Ill., is writing the history of our people in that state. He is a devoted missionary man. He has never served a church during his long ministry that did not contribute to the work of the Foreign Society.

The Waseda University in Tokyo, Japan, has 8,000 students. Three hundred and fourteen of these are reported as Christians.

"The Congo Mission News" is a monthly publication of sixteen pages, the "organ of the General Conference of Protestant Missionaries in the Congo." It is published at Balobo, Upper Congo. It has much to say about the workers and work of the Foreign Society on the Congo.

Six of our missionaries in the Congo spread the Lord's table at Bosongate, on the Lomela River for the first time at that place. The "Oregon" is busy as usual. A. F. Hensey speaks of taking on forty tons of freight at one place. The little steamer does her best and is doing wonders in Africa.

A. F. Hensey reports 25 baptisms on the Congo. The missionaries are rejoicing to hear that they are to be reinforced soon.

Statistics in Canada

Bulletin number XII. of the Fifth Census of Canada has just been issued from the Census and Statistics Office at Ottawa giving the religions of Canada for the year 1911. These statistics make interesting reading, especially as setting forth the conditions among the Disciples of Christ. Unlike the statistics gathered by the United States Census Bureau, these figures are not dependent upon reports issued from the

A GREAT AND POPULAR CHURCH MUSIC BOOK
The New Praise Hymnal
By GILBERT J. ELLIS and J. H. FILLMORE
The New Praise Hymnal comes as near being the ideal church hymnal for the present day as could well be conceived. It is a handsome book, dignified in appearance and make-up. It embraces in its contents as nearly everything demanded to-day as could be gotten into a book of 600 pages.
The New Praise Hymnal is practical in every way; everything in it is available for use in the average congregation. It contains what is used by the most advanced churches. The setting of the hymns and music is engaging to the eye and pleasant to read and sing.
It is a book that grows in favor as it is used. New beauties are discovered from time to time as its pages are tested. The hymns and tunes of the church universal are found in The New Praise Hymnal, also the best available Gospel Songs that the modern church has found to be necessary to its various activities.
The sales of The New Praise Hymnal are larger now than they have ever been. The sales are increasing day by day. This means that it meets the demands better than any other book. Sample Copies mailed for examination.
Prices: Silk Cloth Sides, Leather Back, at $70 per 100; Vellum Cloth, at $50 per 100.

various denominational headquarters, but are secured by the enumerators as they canvass from house to house under the direct supervision of the Government office. They show that out of a total population of 7,206,643 there are only 32,490 without specified religion as compared with 43,222 in 1901 out of a population of 5,327,224.

In a foot note the Bulletin states that the terms Christian, Christian Church and Disciples are often used to designate the same religious body with minor distinction, especially in the United States, and that they are local terms and may not have the same application in all parts of Canada. This note should be borne in mind by those examining the Bulletin. In addition there is listed the Church of Christ, which, undoubtedly, in Canada as in the United States, refers to the more conservative Disciples.

We give here by provinces the total figures for the three designations as mentioned. While the "Disciples of Christ" report an actual loss of 3,571, or nearly 25 per cent, by uniting the reports of Christian, Christian Church and Disciples, there is a gain of 6,437.

The Disciples of Christ including the conservative Disciples are outnumbered in Canada by adherents to Eastern religions. The report shows that there are in Canada 10,012 Buddhists, 14,562 Confucians, 797 Mohammedans, 1,289 Shintòs, 1,758 Sikhs and Hindus, and 11,840 Pagans, most of the Pagans being Indians not yet reached by the Gospel. This makes a total heathen population of 40,259 which, it will be noted, is considerably more than the total number of Disciples including the members of the "Church of Christ." All of these heathen cults are growing with more or less rapidity except those listed as pagans where a material decrease has been made in the past decade. This total does not include 15,971 Mormons nor those listed with no religion, nor 68,507 members of the Greek Church, nor 2,833,041 members of the Roman Catholic Church, nor 74,574 Jews, nor those listed as agnostics, Christian Scientists, Socialists, Spiritualists, Theosophists and a number of others that may legitimately be considered as being sorely in need of the Gospel of Jesus Christ.

Canada presents a very inviting field for missionary activity. The Disciples of Christ rank from eleventh to eighteenth among the churches according as the divisions are made as indicated above. There are 79 different denominations and bodies listed as compared with 57 reported in 1901. There is evidently great need for continued emphasis on the plea for Christian Union. The stronger bodies rank as follows: Roman Catholics, 2,833,041; Presbyterians, 1,115,324; Methodists, 1,079,822; Anglicans 1,043,017; Baptists 382,666.

It will be a disappointment to learn that the Disciples of Christ are losing ground rather than gaining particularly in the Eastern provinces, that they are outnumbered by pagans and that there are nearly three adherents of Eastern idolatry to every Disciple in the Dominion. We must not only go humbly to the Convention in Toronto,—our first in the Dominion of Canada,—but we should also make possible through the home missionary offerings a vast increase in the appropriations made for the enlargement of the work in all the provinces.

PORTABLE STOVE COOKING —AND— HEATING

Saves Fuel Bills, Saves Dirt, Work and Drudgery.

SIMPLE IN CONSTRUCTION, DURABLE, AND ABSOLUTELY SAFE

COMBINES ECONOMY, COMFORT and CONVENIENCE

COMBINED COOKING AND HEATING—The Portable Stove will boil, bake, fry, roast—cook anything. Ideal for quick meals, washing, ironing, hot water, hot milk, canning fruit, camping. Summer or Winter Stove. Oil automatically turned into gas furnishes a steady, intense heat, passed into radiator and distributed throughout the room; or condensed under cooking vessels the heat is absorbed by articles being cooked.

Two-Burner with Oven

Heat under control. Not dangerous like gasoline. No valves. No wicks—all parts open—nothing to clog, close up or get out of order.

THE PORTABLE STOVE

is simple in construction. No complicated machinery to get out of order. The oil flows from the reservoir into the open steel burner bowl, where it is converted into a heavy gas. This gas is carried into the open-air cylinder, where it is superheated and given the required amount of air to make combustion and give the greatest amount of heat for the smallest use of oil. As will be seen, all parts are open—the burner bowl, air mixer, the cylinder or chimney. Nothing to clog or close up. The stove furnishes its own heat to generate the gas

CHEAP FUEL

Kerosene or coal oil, is recognized the world over as providing economic fuel. The difficulty has been in securing methods that would use it both economically and satisfactorily. The Portable Stove solves the problem. It furnishes the family need. it burns this common fuel, giving an intense heat, but concentrated under cooking vessel, absorbed by articles being cooked—not thrown out to overheat your kitchen. In every section of country coal and wood are getting higher in price. The continual discovery of new oil fields in different parts of the country has furnished oil in abundance. The Portable Stove is a practical method of using this fuel. It also saves work and dirt. The intense heat provides quickly cooked meals.

EASILY REGULATED

The flow of oil is easily controlled by the adjuster on the end of the reservoir. Each burner has its own reservoir and adjuster, The height of the flame is easily lowered or raised with this adjuster. More oil—higher flame. Less oil—lower flame. No oil—flame shut off.

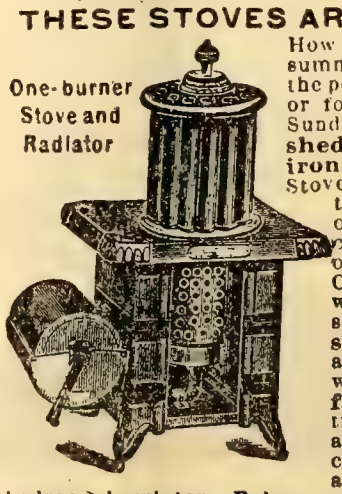
SAFETY

Coal oil or kerosene not dangerous like gasoline. There is no longer excuse for using dangerous gasoline stoves, thus causing mothers and children to run daily the chance of losing their lives. One can hardly pick up a newspaper without seeing an account due to the use of the deadly gasoline. Coal oil burned in the oil-gas stove is a safe fuel. The Portable Stove is safe for every day family use.

CONVENIENCE

Every woman will be glad to get rid of the coal or wood, dirt, ashes and all the nuisance that goes with the ordinary cook stove. The Portable Stove will save trouble, anxiety and annoyance, without any additional fuel

THESE STOVES ARE PORTABLE



One-burner Stove and Radiator

How convenient on a hot summer day to take out on the porch for a quick meal, or for coffee on a warm Sunday night, or in the shed for washing or ironing. The Portable Stove can easily be carried to a church for a social or to picnics or to camping grounds. One of our customers, Chas. Schaufler, Calif. who is a railroad man, said he used their stove on a caboose and was able to cook with the hard and fast running of the train. We cannot imagine anything more convenient for heating a cold dining room or bedroom in winter. Being portable they can easily be moved to any part of the house and are always ready for instant use. The new Model 1912 contains many valuable improvements, which add greatly to the efficiency of the stove.

DURABILITY

They are made of steel throughout, thoroughly tested before shipping. Sent complete, ready for use as soon as received. Nicely finished with nickel trimming, and they will last for years.

OVENS FOR BAKING

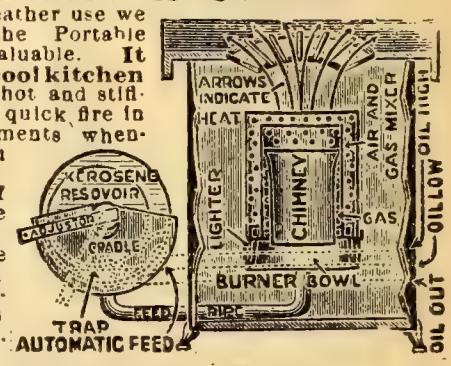
The ovens furnished with the Portable Stove are splendid bakers, handsomely finished throughout, made of sheet steel full lined with tin plate, removable shelves.

RADIATORS FOR HEAT

The radiators are placed over the burner. The heat of the stove is thrown from the surface of the radiator, giving a cheerful heat. It is convenient size and when not in use can be laid to one side.

SUMMER STOVE

For hot-weather use we consider the Portable Stove invaluable. It means a cool kitchen instead of hot and stifling; a hot, quick fire in a few moments whenever you want it. Think of the time wasted in starting the old cook stove before it gets hot enough to cook, and the overheated kitchen after it is started REMEMBER this stove consumes no fuel except when in use. Put this stove in your home—you will find it convenient and a delightful stove to use in summer and winter.



WHAT USERS SAY

"It is so convenient and economical." Rev. P. V. Hawkins, Ohio. "It is clean, convenient, no trouble, burns steadily; perfect baking." Henry Schilling, Ill. "For baking it has no equal." V. E. Bostwick, O. "Bakes pies, cakes, bread; never saw nicer baking done." Mrs. O. Thompson, O. "Never cooked meals so quick and easy." James Newark, Mich. "Baked, cooked, washed, ironed—can do anything my range does." Mrs. M. E. King, Ky. "Cooked for a family of 6 for 5 days with 3 quarts of oil; they are great time and fuel savers." H. M. Irey, Ia. "Heated a room when the temperature was 10 degrees below zero with one radiator." Wm. Baering, Ind. "With the radiator it soon warms up our dining room." J. F. Lisson, Calif. "We are using it to heat our office." McPherson Co., R. I.

ECONOMY—E. N. Helwig, Ont., "Only used a half gallon of oil last week for cooking, baking and ironing" F. G Boylston, S. C. "Cooked for a family of six five days—only three quarts of oil." Wm. Stapley, Ariz., "Your oil-gas stove was just as expected it to be after reading your description. With one gallon of oil we did the cooking for a family nine persons, six of them grown, for three days and one meal, besides doing the small ironing. The oil cost 35c. Wood cost $6.00 per cord here." Fred Hadder, Wis., "Moved my old cook stove in the wood shed. You won't catch me sawing or carrying any more wood. This is a snap for me."

SAFETY—Mrs. E. R. McClellan, Ills., says "It is safe and clean as a lamp, and children that can be trusted with a kerosene lamp can be trusted with this stove." Mrs. P. P. Leherer, Mich. "Easy to run quick to heat—no danger of explosion. D L. Dennis, Ind., "Makes no dirt, no trouble to operate; takes very little fuel; no danger possible; makes plenty of heat. H. N Flora, O., "Perfectly safe, a person can operate them without constant worry of danger.

CLEANLINESS—Mrs. S. R. Croft, speaks of this when she says: "There is no smoke, dirt, or ashes to bother with. It is easy and simple to operate, very clean and safe to handle; is away ahead of coal or wood fire." E. J. Free, Me. "It don't smoke, is easy to operate, and we find it clean." Wm. Irsh, Mo. "A splendid baker and cooker, although we use the cheapest grade of oil. For good work, simplicity, economy and cleanliness, it is simply perfection itself." Mrs. J. F Hascall, Fla. "It does not leak at all; it is a great comfort. The oven is a beauty and bakes fine—not heavy to move from place to place, and convenient in size and shape. W. O. Poe, Mo. says: Can cook a meal in 20 minutes; baked biscuits in 4 minutes." Mrs. Ella Holleman, Tenn., "Takes less oil to cook a meal than is often used to kindle a fire in the old stove. Cooking was a burden because of heat. This oil stove is a pleasure." DON'T FAIL to write today for full information. The price of these stoves is remarkably low—only $3.25 up, any number of burners. No sold in stores. See catalogue with testimonials from hundreds of patrons, sent free; also full information regarding our Portable Stove.

AGENTS MAKE MONEY

Quick, Easy, Sure.

Show stove MAKING GAS—people stop, look, excited—want it—buy. B. L. Huested, Mich. "Was out one day—sold 11 stoves.." W. E. Baird. S. C. "You have the best stove on the market; sold 9 in 2 hours; I do not fear competition." (first ordered 1—200 since) Chas. P. Schroeder, Conn., bought 40 stoves one order. Head & Frazer, Tex. write "Sell like hot cakes; sold 50 stoves in our town." J. W. Hunter, Ala., secured 1—tested it—ordered 100 since. J. G. R. Gauthreaux, La., ordered 1; 100 since. So they go. These men MAKE MONEY. You have the same chance. You should make from $10. to $15 a day. Write for our selling plan. Do it today. Send no money.

Disciples Publication Society

THE DISCIPLES PUBLICATION SOCIETY is a corporation chartered under the laws of Illinois. It is organized for the purpose of publishing books, Sunday School literature and a weekly religious newspaper. It has no capital stock. Its profits are not to go to individuals but to be appropriated to advance the cause of religious education, especially the higher education of the Christian ministry. The term "religious education" is regarded as an ideal common to Sunday Schools, missionary societies, colleges, seminaries and universities, and other organizations that promote Christian progress through Christian education. The Society through its trustees has purchased the entire assets and good will of the New Christian Century Company (including the subscription list and good will of The Christian Century; a contract of participation in the interdenominational syndicate for publishing the Bethany Graded Lessons; a contract of membership in the United Religious Press; all books, Sunday School supplies and other stock on hand; all accounts and bills receivable; besides assuming liability for all accounts and bills payable), for $16,000 and has executed its notes to that amount which have been accepted by the stock-holders of the New Christian Century Company in payment for their property. To provide capital for enlarging the business the trustees are issuing 5 per cent bonds in the amount of $50,000, retirable after five years, to be sold to persons interested in the ideals of The Christian Century. It is believed at the present time that not more than $25,000 of these bonds need be sold in order to put the Society on a sound profit earning basis. Subscriptions for the purchase of these bonds are now being solicited by C. C. Morrison and H. L. Willett, editors of The Christian Century. During Dr. Willett's absence in the Orient correspondence may be addressed exclusively to Mr. Morrison. Full information as to all details will be given upon inquiry. The essential purpose of the transaction and proposals herein described is to provide a way for the general brotherhood of the Disciples of Christ to buy The Christian Century and its publishing house and to pay for them by patronizing them. The bonds and notes are to be retired out of the profits earned by the Society. The purchasers of bonds, therefore, will stand, with the holders of notes, in the position of sustainers or supporters of the enterprise while the brotherhood's patronage is paying for it and increasing its value. The question of defining the membership of the Disciples Publication Society is still open, and upon it the organizers will be glad to receive suggestions. It is the purpose to make it thoroughly democratic and representative. The five trustees named by the charter will act for the Society until the basis of membership has been determined and the members elected.

General Booth Enters Heaven

Now here is a poem which perhaps you will not like. If so, read it again. It is a kind of post-impressionistic poem. It lays on thick paint with a large brush. Its contrasts of light and shade are strong. It comes from that new little magazine called "Poetry," of which Miss Harriet Munroe is editor. It is a bold and strong piece of verse. It presents a picture to the imagination which gives one conflicting sensations. It is at once grotesque and sublime. It shows us General Booth, attended by a motley rabble, leading his procession into heaven, and marching noisily around the great court-house square. His gray beard is flying; his nose like an eagle's beak points straight forward; his sightless eyes do not yet see the King in His beauty, but his ears hear the boisterous music and discordant praises of those who follow him into the holy city. And all through it as you read, you must hear the banging of the banjo, and the jingle of the tambourines, and the boom of the big bass drum. And you must hear the Salvationists singing, "Are you washed in the blood of the Lamb?" Now read the poem; for here is verse quite out of the ordinary:

General William Booth Enters Into Heaven.
By NICHOLAS VACHEL LINDSAY.

(To be sung to "The Blood of the Lamb" with indicated instruments.)

Booth led boldly with his big brass drum.
Are you washed in the blood of the Lamb?
The saints smiled gravely, and they said, "He's come."
Are you washed in the blood of the Lamb?

(Bass drums.)
Walking lepers followed, rank on rank,
Lurching bravos from the ditches dank,
Drabs from the alleyways and drug-fiends pale—
Minds still passion-ridden, soul-powers frail!
Vermin-eaten saints with mouldy breath,
Unwashed legions with the ways of death—
Are you washed in the blood of the Lamb?

Every slum had sent its half-a-score
The round world over—Booth had groaned for more.
Every banner that the wide world flies
Bloomed with glory and transcendent dyes.
Big-voiced lasses made their banjos bang!
Tranced, fanatical, they shrieked and sang,
Are you washed in the blood of the Lamb?

(Banjo.)
Hallelujah! It was queer to see
Bull-necked convicts with that land make free!
Loons with bazoos blowing blare, blare, blare—
On, on, upward through the golden air.
Are you washed in the blood

(Bass drums slower and softer.)
Booth died blind, and still by faith he trod,
Eyes still dazzled by the ways of God.
Booth led boldly and he looked the chief;
Eagle countenance in sharp relief,
Beard a-flying, air of high command
Unabated in that holy land.

(Flutes.)
Jesus came from out the Court-House door,
Stretched his hands above the passing poor.
Booth saw not, but led his queer ones there
Round and round the mighty Court-House square.
Yet in an instant all that blear review
Marched on spotless, clad in raiment new.
The lame were straightened, withered limbs uncurled,
And blind eyes opened on a new sweet world

(Bass drums louder and faster.)
Drabs and vixens in a flash made whole!
Gone was the weasel-head, the snout, the jowl;
Sages and sibyls now, and athletes clean,
Rulers of empires, and of forests green!

(Grand chorus—tambourines—all instruments in full blast.)
The hosts were sandalled and their wings were fire—
Are you washed in the blood of the Lamb?
But their noise played havoc with the angel-choir.
Are you washed in the blood of the Lamb?
Oh, shout Salvation! It was good to see
Kings and princes by the Lamb set free.
The banjos rattled, and the tambourines
Jing-jing-jingled in the hands of queens!

(Reverently sung—no instruments.)
And when Booth halted by the curb for prayer,
He saw his Master through the flag-filled air.
Christ came gently with a robe and crown
For Booth the soldier while the throng knelt down.
He saw King Jesus—they were face to face,
And he knelt a-weeping in that holy place.
Are you washed in the blood of the Lamb?

—A united missionary campaign, in which practically all denominations will join, and which is defined as "a comprehensive and sustained effort to lead the whole church to the discharge of its total missionary duty," will be conducted next year through the coöperation of the Foreign Missionary Boards of North America and the Home Mission Council, embracing the Home Missionary Boards. A nation-wide simultaneous campaign for both home and foreign missons will be undertaken in March, 1914, preceded by a series of interdenominational conventions and conferences throughout the United States and Canada. The Laymen's Missionary Movement will be in charge of this work.

Goodness Must Be Published

Several years ago a New York minister preached a sermon from the text, "He could not be hid." He declared that such goodness as was resident in Jesus Christ could not permanently be concealed. He believed that truth once made known to men would be seen to be so inherently desirable that humanity would never thereafter lose sight of it. He held that the demand for real excellence is so great that the supply has but to be produced, and the world will surely become a consumer of it. He showed that whatever of good once gets into life becomes a permanent asset of the human race.

There is much to be said in favor of such a doctrine, and the sermon was so well liked that this same minister repeated it later to a great assembly at Chautauqua.

The sermon contained one sentence which has afforded a test of some aspects of the teaching of the sermon itself. Here is the sentence:

> "If you write a better book, or preach a better sermon, or build a better mouse-trap than your neighbor, though you build your house in the woods, the world will make a beaten path to your door."

The subsequent history of this sentence affords a singularly interesting illustration of the fact that the teaching contained within it is not always true.

The sermon in which this sentence occurred was doubtless a better sermon than the average of those preached by the neighbors of Rev. John Paxton on that particular Sunday. Did the world proceed at once to wear a path to the door of his church?

It did not.

And he did not live in the woods, either.

He continued his able and efficient and successful ministry, and did good. But so far as is known the West Presbyterian Church in New York did not find it necessary to renew the pavement on account of the crowds that came seeking the author of that fine sentence, and the excellent sermon of which it was a part.

They wore a path to Emerson's door.

Emerson was dead by that time.

Probably a thousand orators, great and small, quoted the sentence and attributed it to Emerson.

Comparatively few people read Emerson, but most people like to quote him, and now and then some one who quotes him looks through his essays to see from which one of them a quotation is made. So it may have been the thousandth orator who quoted it, saying,

"As Emerson has so well said, 'If you write a better book, or preach a better sermon, or build a better mouse-trap than your neighbor, though you build your house in the woods, the world will make a beaten path to your door,'" to whom it occurred to look the matter up. And he searched through the published essays of Emerson and could not find it.

Dr. Edward Emerson replied, in answer to questions, that it sounded like his father, but he could not find it in his writings.

The world was disappointed. The path to Emerson's door was a blind alley.

Then the world made a beaten path to Elbert Hubbard's door. That represents the range of some peole's literary imagination—if Emerson did not say it, Elbert Hubbard did. Elbert Hubbard has said a good many things that Emerson never said or would have said. But when the world beat a path to Elbert Hubbard's door, and asked him if he wrote that verse, he blushed modestly and admitted that it was his. He said he evolved it out of his "cosmic consciousness." He sometimes gets things in that way.

So we see that Dr. Paxton's fine sentence intended to illustrate the theory that the world will surely discover the author of a really good thing came very near to showing that sometimes it does not happen so. The world may make a path to the shop of a skillful advertiser, while grass grows in the highway leading to the real author. Though he live and preach in the heart of a crowded city with a main thoroughfare passing his door, he might as well take to the woods so far as the honor due him is concerned.

In fact, Dr. Paxton was only partly right. If you write a better book than your neighbor, you must put it into the hands of a hustling publisher; and his ability to put the work in the list of the six best sellers is by no means proof that it is one of the six best books. If you preach a better sermon than your neighbor you must advertise special music to accompany it, or you will miss some faces you had hoped to see in the congregation. If you build a better mouse-trap than your neighbor, you must buy pages in the advertising section of the magazines to let the world know of your invention, or the mouse-traps will accumulate on your hands, and the mice will multiply in the homes of your customers.

The time has not come, and probably it will never come, when the demand for goodness will so far exceed the supply that we can afford to stop pushing it. We cannot trust the world to go in pursuit of hidden goodness. We cannot leave the good to go forward to its destination on the momentum it has gained in the past. Goodness is advertised by its loving friends. And it needs the advertising.

By all means build a better mouse-trap than your neighbor if you can; and then, though you build it in the woods, come out and distribute it.

Joshua and Caleb: The Audacity of Faith

The faith of Joshua and Caleb was tested by enemies and by friends. The enemies were strong and confident. They had the advantage of well fortified cities. They knew the land where the fighting was to be done. It was not a holiday undertaking to go against them. Joshua and Caleb knew something of the horrors of war. They had both been in battle and had learned that the reality was somewhat different from the poetry of killing. But there was something to be gained and they were willing to incur the risks of the battle field.

The cowardice of friends was the severest test of faith. At a time when heroism and united action were needed, fear and confusion prevailed in the camp of Israel. There was general agreement only in the belief that nothing could be done. It was even suggested that a return to Egypt was desirable. No one seemed to realize that it was better to die in the fight for freedom than to remain slaves, however secure and comfortable. It was an act of faith to oppose the mob and urge the necessity of calm and courageous action.

There are strong enemies in the way of progress to the promised land of personal and social salvation. Those who would enter must fight. The land is beautiful. It is an attractive place to all aspiring souls. But it is not offered to cowards. The fortifications of special privilege and selfishness stand in the way. Vice is organized and determined. Greed threatens the prosperity and reputation of any who may attack her strongholds. Mr. William Marion Reedy, editor of the St. Louis Mirror, is quoted by Rauschenbusch as saying to the country editor who attempts to tell the truth: "He will find that all the machinery for the making of public opinion is in the hands of people whose interest is that public opinion shall in no way interfere wth their graft. He will find every mail burdened with printed slips from various publicity bureaus, which he can use free, and in every case he will find that the purpose and purport of this slip is to bolster up some private interest built upon public rights and property, or to discredit some man or movement proposing to put a check to the aggrandizement of such wealth by the restoration to the community of the rights which have been filched away from it through the connivance of corrupt representatives."

The patent medicine man who is willing to poison the people for the sake of money, the dealers in adulterated foods, the liquor traffic, the corporations whose business is legitimate but whose watered stock is a convenient and safe method of stealing from the public, the trafficker in human virtue, all these stand opposed to the principles of Christianity. The preaching of the gospel in the present age means the exposure of the wickedness of them all. There is danger to the preacher, especially as he must often be one who is not formally set apart to the work of preaching. It is men in business who have come face to face with evil conditions to whom falls the duty of exposing the sins of the age. Faith of the strongest kind is needed by them. They must face possible ruin in business. The assassins of character will follow them by day and by night. If they have a clear vision of the city of God that is to be upon earth as well as in heaven and have an unshaken conviction that God is with those who give their lives to the building of that city, they will not be terrified by the power and anger of the enemies. Like the ancient spies, they will say, "Let us go up at once, and possess it; for we are well able to overcome it!"

Has the church faith for the task of preaching the gospel to the non-Christian world? The call to the task has gone forth. The church stands on the border land. Christianity and the non-Christian religions stand over against each other. The followers of Jesus must either fight or surrender. They cannot escape the situation in any other way. They have talked about the universality of the religion they profess; they are now where their talk must be supported by action. The faith of those who have caught the vision of a world religion and who see the demands it makes upon them and their fellow believers will be put to severe tests by the cowardice of vast numbers of disciples of Jesus. Many believe in the army and navy more than in the gospel. They dare not take their chances before the world with a message of justice and good will. They wish to support civilization by the sword, and thus they proclaim to all men everywhere that they do not believe in the moral power of Christianity. [Midweek Service, April 16. Immersion No Hindrance to Practice of Unity

In a paper on "The Outlook for the Disciples" read by Rev. John R. Ewers, pastor East End Church of Disciples, Pittsburgh, at a union meeting of the Baptist and Disciple ministers of Greater Pittsburgh the following statements appear, referring to the Disciples:

> "Within the hundred years of history an ultra conservative wing has broken off, while within the past few years, on the other extreme, has arisen a company of 'progressives' who insist that baptism by immersion is not necessary to church membership. Immersion is thought by these to be the greatest obstacle to immediate union with all other Protestant bodies. However, the latter party remains loyal to the communion and undoubtedly will so remain. For this party the future seems clear, for they believe that in time immersion will be made optional with the candidate and that then the way to union will be simple. The rank and file do not by any means hold this opinion."

These words come as a surprise. Mr. Ewers' statements are always worthy of complete respect but we cannot avoid the feeling that he spoke without due care in the paragraph quoted above.

Indeed we are more than surprised that it has been left to a newspaper usually classed as "progressive" to call attention to the inaccurate implication of his first sentence. The virtue of declaring "that baptism by immersion is not necessary to Church membership" certainly does not belong to "progressive" Disciples as a "company." What conservative Disciple is there who thinks that baptism by immersion is necessary to Church membership? The Disciples have always conceded that unimmersed Presbyterians, Methodists and others are members of the Church of Christ, as truly such as are immersed Baptists or Disciples. There may be some provincial persons belonging to what Mr. Ewers calls the "ultra-conservative wing" who hold otherwise, but certainly no representative of the main body of the Disciples holds otherwise.

Men who are classed as "progressives" (The Christian Century does not like these classifications and ordinarily does not use them, but in this instance it cannot be avoided) will hardly rest comfortably under the statement that they regard immersion as "the greatest obstacle to immediate union." The Christian Century cannot speak for the entire "company of progressives" but it knows not one who so regards immersion. On its own part, this paper holds a contrary view and teaches that the Disciples' practice of immersion only, in the administration of baptism, is a positive aid to the consummation of Christian union.

And by the same token there are few, if any, "progressives" who will accept Mr. Ewers' statement on their behalf that "they believe . . . immersion will be made optional with the candidate and that then the way to union will be simple." In none of the various proposals for the practice of Christian unity made by "progressive" Disciples has there been any suggestion looking toward making immersion optional. We have yet to hear the first "progressive" say that he is in favor either of omitting immersion altogether or making sprinkling an optional alternative of it.

If we take two typical instances of "progressive" procedure in the practice of Christian union—that at Berkeley, Cal., and that at Hyde Park, Chicago, it will be seen that neither procedure involves the slightest change in the Disciples' established practice in administering baptism. The Berkeley church practices immersion only, in administering baptism to all candidates for membership in the Church. It differs from established procedure not in its practice of baptism but in its practice of Christian union. It declares that it has no right to insist upon rebaptism as a condition of fellowship with one who is already a member of the Church of Christ. But in the case of one who is not a member but a candidate for membership it may insist and does insist that his initiation shall be solemnized by immersion.

The more radical plan in operation at Hyde Park, Chicago, makes a place in the "congregation" both for immersed members of the Church of Christ and for those who are not members of the Church at all. But all candidates for membership in the "Church" are here initiated by immersion. Neither Dr. Ames at Hyde Park nor Mr. Loken at Berkeley appears to regard the accepted practice of immersion as either negligible or optional in receiving candidates for membership. Nor does either appear to regard its practice as an impediment to Christian unity.

We make these comments on this paragraph in Mr. Ewers' otherwise very informing, and indeed, truly prophetic, address because we are convinced that the progressive movement for the practice of Christian unity by Disciples ought not to be confused with any particular theory of baptism. It is a larger movement. Its plea should reach the conscience of the liberal and conservative interpreter of baptism alike.

Even if, in the traditional Disciples' view, Christ commanded his Church to baptize its converts by immersion he likewise commanded them to receive all whom he had received, to live in union with them as he and the Father are united. He made it a sin for us to presume to select from the members of his Church those whom we would receive into "our" church and those whom we would not. This sin the Disciples, in common with Baptists and other denominations, continue to commit.

It is our duty to repent and turn from it. And happily our accustomed practice of baptism by immersion is not in the least in the way.

Interpreting the Strange Ways of God

A thousand ministers who thought they knew just what they were to preach about on the first Sunday after Easter changed their plans entirely, and preached on something entirely different. There is something to touch the imagination in the vision of these widely scattered men, all led by one common impulse to lay aside their plans and preach on The God of the Storm and Flood. Like the prophets in the olden times they could not rest content without attempting somehow to interpret to the mind and conscience of men the strange ways of God. Not all of these preachers are great men; not all of them spoke words of profound wisdom; but each in his own way attempted somehow to bring a moral lesson out of this calamity. Possibly it might have been better if some of them had not attempted it. Perhaps some of them were themselves submerged in their own futile philosophisings. Perhaps some of them darkened counsel with words without knowledge. Yet they did their best, as God's ambassadors, to represent Him, and to interpret for Him, things which they themselves understood only by faith. It would be easy enough to point out the weakness and folly of much that they said; but they did a brave act. They attempted a great undertaking. Yes, and in general they succeeded. Not in explaining the mystery of evil in the world of a good God; few of them attempted that, and those who did might better not have tried it. But they pointed the thoughts of men upward, and gave them a new sense of the reality of that which cannot be swept away by wind or flood. It was not an easy thing they undertook. All in all they did it surprisingly well.

Recent Events and Ancient Prophecy

"Do you think the tremendous struggle going on in Turkey, the momentous changes that have taken place in China and the possible outcome in Mexico were foretold in any part of the Bible?" That was the question fired at us on the suburban train. And our answer was prompt and clear, "Specifically, No. In outline, Yes."

The labored attempts which are made to discover in Isaiah, Ezekiel or Daniel direct allusion to the events we are permitted to see have never carried much conviction with us, but the magnificent optimism of the prophets and apostles is justified in our day if never before. The prophet was a poet—not a census-taker. It is said that no one ever painted trees as Corot painted them, with such absolute fidelity to nature; and yet Corot never painted a tree which could be distinguished as an oak, an ash or a maple. It was never a particular tree but it was nevertheless any tree in any landscape.

When the prophet of the captivity told his fellow exiles that Jehovah would "overturn, overturn until he should come whose right it was to reign," he expressed the great truth which a modern has put into the apothegm that "Nothing is ever settled until it is settled right." When the General Assembly of the Presbyterian Church, some years before the civil war, issued a solemn deliverance upon the question of slavery, wisely counseling the "fathers and brethren" to let the matter rest henceforth forever, Dr. Samuel Hanson Cox, that wit and orator without peer in his day, said to his neighbor in the pew, "Good, we have capped Vesuvius again!" He knew it was not in all the powers of all the ecclesiastics of all the world to settle any question until they settled it in accord with courage and equity. In 1878 the "Great Powers" propped up the tottering throne of the Sultan, handed him his scepter once more and declared an era of universal peace at hand. It hardly lasted till the diplomats reached home.

The spring is even now "coming slowly up this way." But just so surely as the warm sun returns the icy north will contest the advance, inch by inch; and so surely as it contests the coming of the flowers and harvests the states from Texas to North Dakota will be torn by cyclones. The stars in their courses are surely with the coming summer but before the harvest is gathered many a fair field will be strewn with wreckage of the storm.

Russia is just now tightening its grip on Persia and creeping stealthily toward Peking while at home the "Holy Synod" is imprisoning as never before "Dissenters" and "Old Believers." But what the Great Powers could not do unitedly Russia can not do alone. The Sultan, the Czar, a Diplomatic Council, may cap Vesuvius for a month or a year or a generation, but not forever. And God's process of overturning thrones and principalities and powers will not be stopped until, as the prophet by Chebar said, "He shall come whose right it is to reign." And then, in the sunshine of a millennial summer, the world will have peace. But not before.

Shall the Church Promote Marriage?

This is an interesting question raised by an article in The Churchman (New York City), written by R. Fulton Cutting, a very prominent banker and social worker, of New York City. Mr. Cutting seems to urge marriage "as an antidote to sexual vice." He plainly recommends the entrance of the Church "upon a systematic campaign to promote the practice of marriage, at the same time exerising herself to assure, as far as she may, the domestic happiness that should ensue." We clip a section of the article as good food for some high thinking:

"The Church should, then, directly teach its maturing girls and boys the advisability of well-considered marriage when undertaken as a divine ordinance. It should also provide opportunities for instruction in the ethics of marriage, its obligations, responsibilities, and privileges, and in the practise of domestic economy. In our larger cities a good deal of valuable training is now being given in housekeeping and cooking in our public schools, and wherever this is done the Church should insist upon its girls taking advantage of the opportunity. Instruction in the ethics of marriage and the common sense of the marital relation may very well be done by volunteers. No doubt there are respected and influential women in every parish who can give young girls the best kind of advice in the underlying principles of conduct in married life. No doubt also where instruction in housekeeping and cooking is not to be found in the public schools there can be discovered good housekeepers who would give girls about to be married elemental instruction in their own kitchens or under the oversight of their cooks.

"I know of one woman in this city who, a short time ago, before the marriage of one of her women servants, provided her with a full course of training in the New York Cooking School. She had not had the opportunity for acquiring this important qualification of a wife whose means did not permit the employment of a servant."

Protestants in Mexico

The Christian Intelligencer supplies some interesting information about Protestants in Mexico. Presbyterian, Episcopal and Methodist Churches have largest interest among Protestants. Five years ago a Presbyterian church in Mexico was established, with its own General Assembly. A church of 5,000 members resulted, with a considerable educational system. A mission press with newspaper is established in the City of Mexico. Episcopalians were once very strong, but for some years their work declined. Their Hooker Memorial School is one of the prominent institutions of the capital. Methodists have 7,000 members, with $700,000 in property, a large part of which is in orphanages and schools. In the City of Mexico is a mission press. The Y. M. C. A. has both a railroad and an ordinary association. The American Bible Society has Mrs. Frances B. Hamilton for agent. She has been in the work with her husband for many years. This enumeration does not appear to take account of the work of the Associate Reformed Presbyterian Church of the South. It has for some years carried on work in Mexico.

The Gideons' Great Bible Work

The Gideons are an organization of commercial travelers who try to carry their Christianity wherever they go with their sample cases. The other day the recorder of this observation had occasion to stop over night in a Nashville hotel. About the first thing he saw after turning on the electric light, was a plain-covered Bible upon a writing table in his room. He picked up the book, and there found the Gideon book-plate with ample directions to read particular passages for particular moods. He learned that every room in the hotel had a Gideon Bible. This Bible-in-every-hotel-room campaign of the Gideons has assumed national proportions. Already no less than 175,000 Bibles have been placed in as many hotel rooms throughout the country. Before President Wilson was inaugurated the Gideons made sure that every room in every Washington hotel had its Bible.

A Baptist's View of Open Membership

At a recent meeting of the Baptist Ministers' Conference in New York, the Rev. A. T. Fowler, D. D., pastor of First Baptist Church, Mt. Vernon, N. Y., read a carefully prepared paper on the present condition of the English Baptist churches. Among other observations Dr. Fowler stated that the Baptist churches of England very largely practice what is called "open membership," that is, the churches admit to membership persons who have not been immersed. The extent to which this rule is adopted is shown by the fact that, in the "open membership" churches, 34.3 per cent of the membership have not been immersed. English Baptist leaders take the ground that "New Testament baptism is not a church ordinance, but a matter of individual obedience." They state that "baptism should be the free spiritual act of the individual," and that "whom Christ receives the church ought not to reject." These open membership churches are the large and influential churches, while as a rule the close membership churches are small. The ministers who take this position are described as the "most spiritual and cultured." Dr. Clifford is quoted as saying that open membership has "aided the growth and increased the influence of Baptists in England. It is also declared that in the open membership churches many are led to study the command to be baptized and come to the acceptance of immersion as the New Testament mode of baptism. Dr. Fowler expressed the opinion that Baptists in this country were coming to the open position. In the discussion which followed the reading of Dr. Fowler's paper, it was said that there is not a Baptist minister south of Mason and Dixon's line that takes the English position.

Col. George Harvey Pricks Unitarianism

No less distinguished a citizen than ex-President Taft provoked Colonel George Harvey, editor of Harper's Weekly, into as brilliant a defense of orthodoxy as against Unitarian liberalism, as it has been our privilege to read for many a day. The following, entitled, "No, Mr. Taft," taken from Harper's Weekly, speaks for itself:

"On Sunday, March 2d, President Taft went to the Unitarian Church, where he has worshipped for the last four years, and addressed the congregation. The papers say that he said, among other things:

> 'It always has been a wonder to me why all the world is not Unitarian. I think all the world is verging in that direction. We preach the doctrine of sweet fellowship, of love of God, of love of Jesus Christ, and tolerance for every faith which depends upon the great principle of liberal Christianity—and that makes for progress toward morality and higher religion. The one trouble we suffer from—if it be a trouble—is that there are so many Unitarians in other churches who do not sit in the pews of our church. But that means that ultimately they are coming to us.'

"No, Mr. Taft, you are going to them. The Unitarian churches throve best when the other folds were uncomfortable. The Unitarian company has ceased, we believe, to gain in membership. The American people, Mr. Taft, have a great and just regard for you, but they never would appoint you a committee of one to go out and ascertain which way the tide is running.

"We will not say, Mr. Taft, that if St. Paul had been a Unitarian, Christianity would have been known in history as a sect in Cappadocia. But we will say that if St. Paul had been a Unitarian, it would not have been necessary to collect his epistles. There would never have been enough market for them to warrant it."

Presbyterian Administration Not Extravagant

Embarrassing charges have appeared in the daily press to the effect that the Board of Home Missions of the Presbyterian Church, U. S. A., has taken $256,093.89 to disburse $381,212.54 plus the income of a $4,500,000 endowment. Dishonesty has never been even remotely intimated. The charges are only that bad economy is practiced. Now comes Dr. Charles L. Thompson, Secretary of the Board, over his own signature in a letter to the editor of The Continent (Chicago), and maintains that only $51,649 is charged to office expense. Dr. Thompson says: "As on this expense the board is administering over a million dollars annually it is apparent that the 61 per cent charged by Dr. Weaver drops down to about 5

Dr. Thompson's letter reveals the source of the widely printed charge to be Rev. Joseph L. Weaver, D. D. of Colorado. Dr. Thompson proceeds to tell exactly why the board has been attacked. He says:

"If anyone should inquire why anyone should desire to promulgate such a charge the board is obliged to say:

1. That a year ago the board declined to grant aid from its treasury, on the request indorsed by Dr. Weaver, to support a Presbyterian church in a community of 565 inhabitants, already occupied by three denominations, two of which presented urgent protest to the entrance of another denomination. Brought by Dr. Weaver to the attention of the Presbyterian General Assembly last May, the matter was referred to a committee which sustained the refusal to grant Presbyterian home mission money for the field.

2. That, notwithstanding the Assembly's unanimous decision, the request for this aid was repeatedly renewed during the recent months, accompanied by the threat from Dr. Weaver that if the board declined to do as he wished he would see that its work was discredited and its officers humiliated by the General Assembly next May."

Shall Church Treasurers be Bonded?

This is an interesting question raised by one of the diocesan papers of the Protestant Episcopal Church. The Churchman (New York) prints the following:

> One of our diocesan papers in a recent issue has some apt words on the bonding of treasurers. The question has been a live one in many of our dioceses. Some years ago the convention of the diocese of Chicago recommended to the different parishes and missions that their treasurers should be put under bond. The article says: "There would seem to be no question that every treasurer of a church institution or parish, having charge of permanent funds, should give a bond at the expense of the institution or parish. This may not be so important in the case of treasurers of the parishes who are receiving and spending money constantly and making reports to vestries every month or two and having their accounts audited every year. But the more security that can be thrown about church funds the better. There ought to be no delicacy of feeling about it. Many men whose positions and records put them above the need of doing this give bonds and a good example to all the rest. Treasurers ought to suggest it themselves, not waiting for the suggestion to come from others, that so it may become the universal practice. There ought to be the greatest care in having all accounts of parishes or societies or institutions audited, and where any securities are held, to have them seen by competent men."

English Churches Opposing Church Census

The London Daily News the other day announced its purpose to make an accurate church census of the world's first city. For years it has been a newspaper privilege to count noses in the churches of London. Sir W. Robertson Nicol did much to popularize the idea. But imagine the jolt it must have given the managing editor of the London Daily News, when representatives of both the Establishment and Nonconformity came out openly in a statement, opposing the enterprise this year. Both the Bishop of London and Dr. F. B. Meyer, the well known Congregationalist leader, declared such an undertaking accentuated the material side of the Church at the expense of its moral and spiritual power. However, there seems to be considerable ground for the suspicion that the Daily News enterprise would have embarrassed the churches by showing up their paucity of attendance in the days of a Liberal administration headed by Mr. Lloyd-George.

Charles Stelzle's Ten Years of Service

On April 1 Charles Stelzle completed ten years of royal service as the head of the Department of Church and Labor in the Presbyterian Church, U. S. A. To him, more than to any other living man, American Protestantism is indebted for a Christian conscience on the subject of winning back to Christ and the Church the devotion and affection of the great labor army in America. He has done not only the Presbyterians good, but has been of indirect service to the social service commissions of every denomination.

Canadian Methodists and Missions

The Methodist Church of Canada is launching a "forward-looking" movement in the interests of missions. Canadian Methodists are asked to give five and one-half cents per week for missions, both domestic and foreign, during the year. Not less than $900,000 is announced as an imperative need, or about $2.60 a member. Last year the gross receipts were $612,894. This speaks well for the progress of our neighbors across the Canadian line.

Mammoth Bequest to Indiana Missions

It is getting common to pick up a newspaper or a religious weekly and read of munificent bequests to religious causes. This time we read of George B. Yandes, a bachelor elder in Second Presbyterian Church, Indianapolis, Ind., who died at the ripe age of seventy-five and left $500,000 to Home Missions and the Sunday-school work in the state of Indiana. The American Sunday-school Union also received $50,000 for work in the same state.

A CHURCH WITHOUT SERMON OR SONG

BY WILLIAM E. BARTON

IS IT NOTHING TO YOU, ALL YE THAT PASS BY? COME AND REST AWHILE,

COMMUNE WITH YOUR OWN HEARTS AND BE STILL.

JESUS CHRIST, THE SAME YESTERDAY, TODAY AND FOREVER.

London papers record in a brief but interesting narrative an account of the recent dedication of the Chapel of the Ascension. The service was conducted by the Bishop of London, who preached from the text, "Be still and know that I am God." It was a very fitting text, for the church thus dedicated is not intended for sermons, and though a choir sang unaccompanied at the service, it is not expected that there will be frequent or habitual service of song. The church contains neither pulpit nor organ. The gospel is preached by means of pictures, which completely cover the walls of the chapel.

With this announcement come also to this country the first copies of the new Life of Frederic Shields, the artist who created this singular chapel. It is published by Longmans, Green & Company, and contains a number of illustrations and a story of remarkable human interest. It is written by Mrs. Ernestine Mills, whom Shields regarded as a daughter, for he had no children of his own.

Shields was born in Hartlepool, March 14, 1833, and died in Merton Park, Surrey, February 26, 1911. He received his education in a charity school, and led a half-starved life while struggling to obtain recognition as an artist. When he was forty years old he married. His wife was a child of sixteen, uneducated, and was as ill fitted to be his wife as he was to be her husband. Theirs was a strange honeymoon, in which he left her mostly to herself, and the greater part of their married life they lived apart.

Shields developed no little ability as an illustrator, at first drawing sketches and humorous cartoons, afterwards illustrating "Pilgrim's Progress," and DeFoe's "Journal of the Plague Year." He attracted the attention of Ruskin, Ford Maddox Browne, and others of the pre-Raphaelites, but his closest friendship was with Rossetti. Hall Caine, too, was his friend and in his book, "My Own Story," speaks of Shields as "hysterical as a woman," a remark that to the present writer's knowledge pained Shields deeply and pained him more, perhaps, because it was true.

The present writer came to know Mr. Shields in the last years of his life, and corresponded with him until his death.

Robertson Nicoll, in a recent three-column article in the British Weekly, reviews Mrs. Mills' book and says of Shields that it is quite impossible to love the character which this book describes. And, indeed, Shields was a bundle of very strange contradictions, but he had a singularly lovable side and the present writer thinks of him with real satisfaction.

There are many things in this life story which appeal to one's sympathy and some that evoke real admiration. To the book itself the reader must be referred for the life story of the man. It is our present purpose to tell somewhat more of the work to which he gave the last twenty years of his life.

A church where no sermons are preached, or hymns sung; a church without a pulpit or organ; a church without minister, priest or choir; where no baptisms are performed or marriages celebrated or funeral services read,—this surely is an innovation! And it is not an inheritance from an obsolete past, but a strictly modern enterprise, quite new, and only within a few weeks entirely completed after twenty years of arduous, devoted labor. Should you like to visit such a church, and know something of the man who did it? Let us make our comfortable journey to London, by way of reading this article.

Call a cab anywhere in London, and ask your driver to take you to the Chapel of the Ascension, and he will scratch his head and say he never heard of it. But he knows where Hyde Park is, and Kensington Gardens, and the Marble Arch, and from there you can direct him. From the Marble Arch, along the north side of Hyde Park and Kensington Gardens, runs Uxbridge Road, containing some of the largest and most fashionable houses in London. A little more than a block down this road from the Marble Arch is the Cemetery of St. George, where Laurence Sterne, that writer of bright and bad literature, was buried, and from whence it is said his body was taken two days later and sold for dissection. In that cemetery, fronting the Gardens, was an old mortuary chapel, which, through the prohibition of interments in the cemetery, fell into disuse. Upon the site of this building, long devoted to the burial of the dead, Mrs. Russell Gurney erected in 1893 the chapel where in a silence not that of the grave but of quiet and reverence, the gospel may be preached to the multitudes of living men and women who daily pass its doors.

THE GOOD SHEPHERD—FREDERIC SHIELDS.
In the Chapel of the Ascension in London.

It was not the disuse of the old building that suggested the plan. Mrs. Gurney had been laboring for years to find a place where she could establish her sanctuary. She had searched London till she gave up that city and turned to other of the English centers of population, only to be thwarted again and again in her effort to find a location for her vision. She even advertised in the London papers, and obtained no response. When all her other efforts failed, this old building was suggested, and she was able to secure the privilege of erecting a new building on its site, and of making provision for its perpetual care. "The situation was perfect—on a great highway, just removed from one of the busiest convergent parts of London, and yet enough withdrawn from the noise and hurry to and fro to meet the central purpose, never abandoned, of fitness for rest and meditation, surrounded as it was by a green, silent God's acre.

The building is modest, but attractive. It was designed by one of London's best architects. It is enclosed by an iron fence, and stands well back from the street, with green grass between it and the street. The chapel is open each week day, in daylight only. There is no artificial light, so there is no evening service; and this strange church, in addition to its other unusual features, is open every week day and is closed on Sunday. Very restful it seems in the midst of London's bustle and din. One is glad to enter and rest.

THE STONING OF STEPHEN—BY FREDERIC SHIELDS.

On the left side of the door of the plain but attractive brick building is a stone tablet with this invitation:

* * * * * * * * * * *
* Passengers through the busy streets of London, *
* Enter this sanctuary for rest and silence and prayer. *
* Let the pictured walls within speak of the past, *
* Yet ever continuing ways of God with man. *
* * * * * * * * * * *

On the opposite side of the door is this inscription:

* * * * * * * * * * *
* Is it nothing to you, all ye that pass by? *
* Come and rest awhile, *
* Commune with your own hearts and be still. *
* Jesus Christ, the same yesterday, today and forever. *
* * * * * * * * * * *

The ante-chapel was the last work which Mr. Shields did before he died. The paintings there are intended as an introduction to those within, but also they are designed to make their appeal to the indifferent and thoughtless who merely stop for rest, and who do not penetrate into the inner sanctuary of silence. Beside the Good Shepherd, which was the first of the large paintings to be placed in the ante-chapel or vestibule, are now a number of others, forming with this a connected plan. There is a pair of paintings, one on Prayer, and the other on Meditation. There is a central panel on the left, "The Resurrection and the Life," which Shields borrowed from Blake, lamenting that Blake never lived to paint it upon a great scale; and this is balanced by a painting on the right, of "Christ Blessing Little Children." There is a painting in which the artist sets forth the symbolic relations of "Ignorance, Science and Wisdom." This is above the side door, and less conspicuous, but in it is much of the artist's faith. Ignorance is dark; Science dimly illumined by a crescent moon; but Faith is lit up by a glorious sun.

The two paintings which, next to "The Good Shepherd," are designed to catch and hold the attention of the casual visitor, are "Man Repels the Voice of Conscience" and "Man Harkens to the Voice of Conscience." In the first of these, Conscience, casting herself on her knees, holds up a mirror to Man, who is rushing forward toward a precipice. He has thrown away his hour-glass, reckless of time and coming ill; he is lured on by sirens, and seems bent on his own destruction. He is garlanded, and gay, and he refuses to look at his real self in the mirror of Conscience, but rudely repulses her. How many a London youth must see his own picture in this painting! The companion painting is opposite. The whisper of Conscience in the ear of the "pale delinquent" stays him in his downward course. He starts with sudden apprehension mingled with gratitude as her finger touches his heart. He looks at the scales in the hand of Conscience, wherein the butterfly, winged symbol of immortality, outweighs the world. The storm clouds in the distance are breaking. New light is coming. Man heeds, and will obey!

One can hardly imagine, unless he knows the story of the Chapel, with what tears and heart-felt earnestness Frederic Shields, painting on time that he borrowed from eternity, and kept alive only by the hope of finishing his task, left these as the closing accents of his message to coming generations.

The vestibule leads directly into the main hall of the Chapel of the Ascension. Directly before one as he enters is a painting of the Ascension of Jesus, filling the whole end of the building, and the walls are frescoed from top to bottom.

It is hard to imagine that many men will enter the ante-chapel without lifting the curtain and passing within. Once inside, a magnificent spectacle presents itself. The two great series of paintings that flank the chapel on either side almost bewilder the beholder, and whether by way of the Law or the Gospel, by the Old Testament or the New, the Story of Jesus or the story of the Founding of the Church—by whichever wall one makes his way toward the chancel—whether in the Goodly Fellowship of the Prophets or the Glorious Company of the Apostles—at the end he comes to The Passion and the Ascension. He sees it all the way as something to which he must come. The Cross is there, with red flame about it, the wrath of human sin, and one must face that; but high above the Cross and the Tomb, in a cloud of glory that still has in it some suggestion of the Cross, is the risen, ascended, triumphant Lord of Life. The Cross is not the dominant feature. The dead Christ is not the Christ whom this work exalts. High above death and all that has the power of death, is the regnant, and eternally living Christ of God.

On one side the paintings tell the story of the Life of Christ, and on the other the story of the spread of the gospel as related in the Acts of the Apostles. These scenes are interspersed, and in a way interpreted, by fourteen paintings of the Old Testament prophets on the one side, and on the other an equal number of the Apostles, with John the Baptist, Stephen and Paul added to the eleven. Above and beside the entrance is told the story of the Creation, Fall and Promise of Redemption; and the opposite end has the great painting of the Ascension, surrounded by scenes from the Passion and Resurrection, together with four graces, Faith, Hope, Love and Patience, and two scenes illustrating the Wise and Foolish Virgins.

CONSCIENCE REPELLED.

The paintings are all the work of one man. There are said to be but two other churches of which this can be said, one in Sienna, and one in Assisi, where Giotto told the story of the life of Francis the Monk. But both these churches differ in many and important particulars from this one; this is unique.

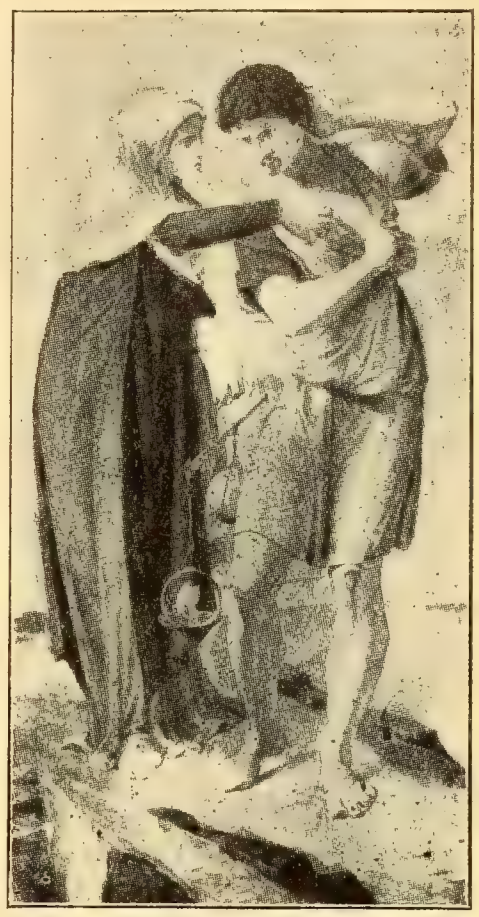
Above the entrance door is the Creation of Man. The beautiful body of man is still cold, but the breath of the Creator is entering his nostrils; and the Creator is the Christ, who also is the Redeemer. And when man is expelled from the garden, the very expulsion is an invitation to return, and a promise of Christ.

A painting which every visitor admires, is the Annunciation. The angel finds Mary on the housetop in Nazareth, in the early evening. She is beating out with a stone the small gleaning that shows her poverty. Her attitude as she hears the angel's message is one of modest and devout submission. The moon, setting over the hills of Nazareth, is at its first quarter; the almond tree in blossom tells of the expectant spring-time; in the sky above the milky way tells of the innumerable spiritual progeny which is to be hers through the Child that is to be born.

The paintings of the ministry of Jesus breathe an atmosphere of deep spirituality, and of tender solicitude for men and women. There is a beautiful picture of Jesus at Jacob's Well, acknowledging to a sinful woman his mission, and enabling her to behold a better way of faith than that of the mountain to which she points. There is one of Jesus with his arm about the sinking Peter, which has showed to more than one beholder, himself sinking in sin, the Power that can uphold and bring safe to shore.

Into many of the paintings enters an elaborate use of emblems and symbols, and these appear, too, in the decorative framework which surrounds the paintings. Jesus healing the Blind Man, shows the Saviour leading out of the city a blind man, who bears an ancient three-stringed harp for his "songs in the night." In the arched door of the city stand an aged Pharisee and his disciple, and these, too, are blind, the blind leading the blind; for the young Pharisee is drawn to follow the Saviour, but the older restrains him. And near the feet of the Saviour, a dog, emblem of false teachers, turns to snarl at Him, while her litter of blind puppies surround her. The time is toward evening, and in the distance a shepherd is seen, leading his sheep to the fold; these are not blind in their following of the shepherd; and the man who already begins to see is using his new sight to follow his Healer and Lord.

In all the post-resurrection paintings, the Christ is beardless. Mr. Shields gives as the reason something like this: Manifestly there was some change in the risen body of Jesus, so that the disciples recognized him with difficulty. A beard is the distinctive mark of sex; but in heaven there is no marriage, but those who attain to the resurrection are as the angels of God. May not this have been a part of the change in the face of the risen Christ?

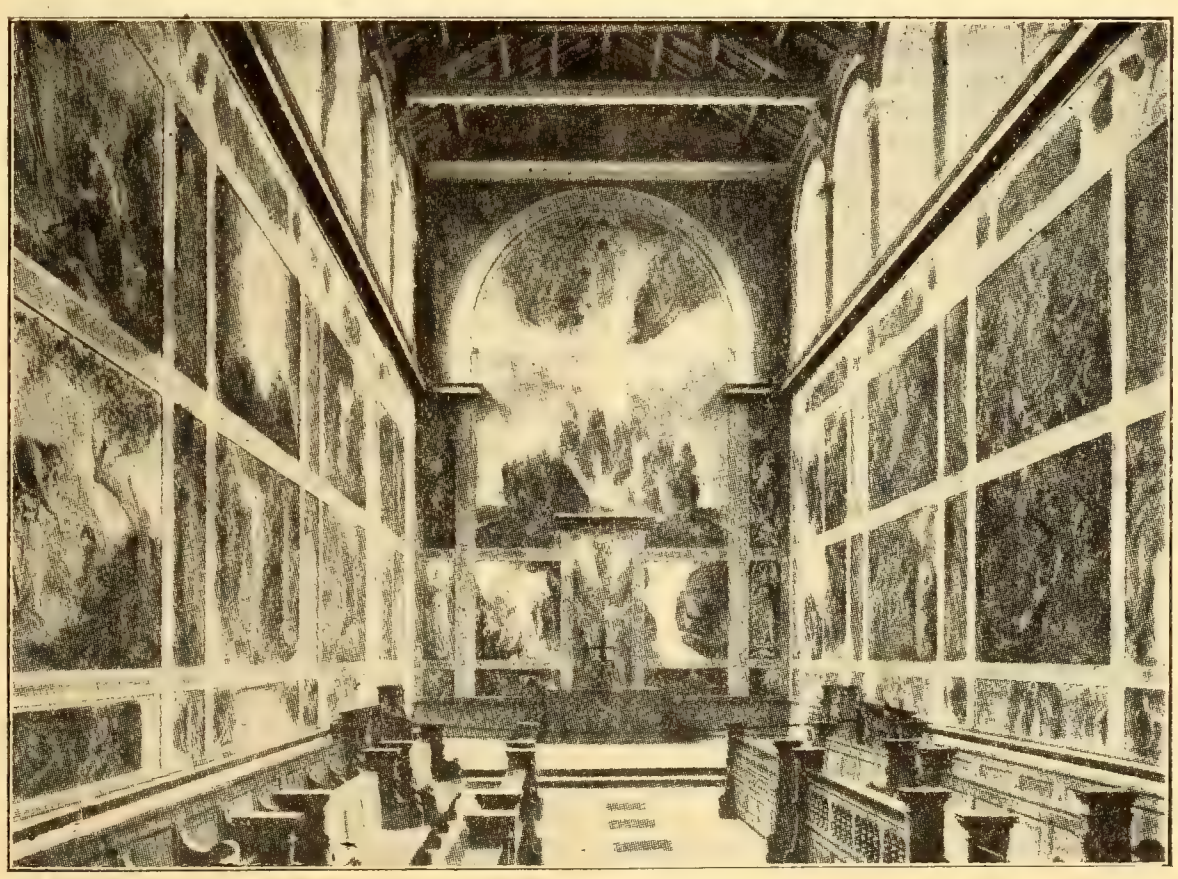


CONSCIENCE HEEDED.

To many this will seem far-fetched, but it will illustrate with what searchings of heart and effort to discover the truth Mr. Shields did his work. Into its every detail enters some reverent design, and it is not safe to pass any feature as accidental.

The paintings show skill in drawing, and artistic genius of high order in their grouping, as well as fine feeling in their brilliant coloring. But they are to be judged, after all, not so much as works of art, as pictorial sermons. The entire building is a sermon. The artist lived to utter his last word of the gospel's message through his paintings for its walls, and then entered into rest. May his benediction abide in the building, and may it proclaim the message of the gospel of Christ to the passing multitude, for many generations yet to come.

Mrs. Gurney died in 1896, living just long enough to see the chapel opened, and a few of its first paintings in place. The artist, Mr. Frederic Shields, lived to be seventy-seven years of age, and his last years were spent in great industry in the endeavor to complete this temple before he, too, passed away. He was a very earnest man, and had no time for merely curious visitors. To find him the writer of this article journeyed out from London by rail, and then took an uncertain bus that plies at irregular intervals between two suburbs. Mr. Shields lived in Merton Park, a village in Surrey, in an old house, built by one of England's kings for one of his favorites. It is surrounded by a garden, at the back of which was the studio.



CHAPEL OF THE ASCENSION—INTERIOR

Not without some reluctance did Mr. Shields lay by his brush.

"I am working, as you see, on the Conversion of Saul," he said. "I have some reproductions of paintings by the old artists, which I have been studying for suggestions. See this of Rubens; how wonderful it is in its dramatic power! No one will ever paint it as he did. But it is destitute of spirituality; Paul is converted by an explosion!

"You have seen the chapel, and want me to interpret its spirit to you? First, tell me what you find in it, and I will see if we find the same things in it. I seldom receive calls, and I never go out. I am working at my task to finish it while the light lasts, and I have no time for the merely curious. But if you are really interested, I shall be glad to talk with you."

Such a conversation as followed cannot be repeated; nothing can be told but the impression. Mr. Shields was a man of transparent sincerity, and of deep piety. He abhorred the spectacular in religious art, and criticized with considerable severity the type of painting found in Roman Catholic churches on the one hand, and the insipid creations of mere illustrators on the other.

"It is not a dead Christ the world needs," he said, "nor yet a Christ such as sentimental artists pose in a mere effort to make a pretty picture. The world needs the strong Son of God, who is with us alway, the same yesterday, today and forever."

The writer saw in its early stages, and afterward saw in place in the chapel, his "The Stoning of Stephen." "The moment which I have chosen for the painting," said Mr. Shields, "is that in which the false witnesses, stripped to the waist, are ranged with stones poised, to be instantly hurled upon the confessor of Jesus Christ. Behind the witnesses, the raging torrent of the mob, stirred to murderous rage by the chief priests and rulers, pours down from the city gates. It is sunset, and all these men and the guilty city are seen ensanguined under its crimson glow; but upon the martyr pours down the white glory of the opened heavens. A fanatic priest stoops to seize a stone; and nigh him is Saul, with the clothes of the witnesses at his feet. Saul is about thirty-five years of age. He stops his ears at what he regards as Stephen's blasphemy, but a ray of heavenly light darts upon him. In the distance you see some women issuing from the city. They are separate from the mob. These are the Grecian widows who mourn for Stephen, for he has ministered to them in their sorrow and need."

A painting in which Mr. Shields took great joy was "The Raising of Lazarus." He gave to the writer the first little sketch of this, a mere daub of paint on the cover of a cigar-box. He protested somewhat against giving away his sketches, for he did not complete his sketches; they were mere notes; he wrought out the painting on the canvas as he proceeded, merely sketching, sometimes with pencil for his groupings, sometimes with brush for a color scheme, but leaving the sketches rough and with no attempt to do his work twice.

On a subsequent visit to London the writer met Mr. Shields at the unveiling of a number of the later paintings. Arm in arm with the artist he walked about the sacred building while Mr. Shields explained in detail the meaning of them one by one. It was a rare privilege, and one few men have enjoyed, for Shields was nearing the end of his task, and he was eager to see it finished. Subsequently Mr. Shields was the writer's guest at his hotel in London, spending a merry evening with a group of light-hearted Americans, and carrying the memory of it happily through the lonely months that followed.

From this time on till his death, Mr. Shields wrote now and then to his friend in America, telling him of the progress of his work. He was writing a description of each painting as he proceeded, to be used in a handbook of the chapel. He sent to his American correspondent the original manuscript of a number of these descriptions, that he might know what paintings were approaching completion, and what they meant to the artist. Reluctantly he consented to the making of lantern slides, which he feared would rather misrepresent than convey his meaning, but in this he was mistaken. The lantern slides are beautiful.

At first Shields protested against any attempt to make his chapel known in America. He did not care to advertise it, he said; he was not doing this for fame, but for the glory of God. Yet later he came greatly to appreciate the growing attention which came to his work, in good part through interest awakened in America. More than once he wrote such words as this:

"Although I am so weak and ill that labor is an effort, and I sink exhausted after my day's toil, I must take a moment to write and thank you, my dear friend, for what you have written about the Chapel. To God be all the glory."

His letters told of weakness, weariness and pain. He was painting through the winter, and much of the work had to be done in the Chapel itself. He suffered from cold while at work. The London winter days were so short.

But at last it was finished. It was hardly a message of joy which he sent; he was too tired for joy. He dropped his brush and sank from exhaustion. He took but little interest in anything during the few weeks that remained. He did not live for the dedication. A few days before he died he received from his American correspondent a letter of congratulation. His housekeeper, who was also his nurse, read it to him, and he said, "Thank God," but he was too weak to write an answer. A few days later the weary spirit found rest, and his works abide.

DR. WILLETT'S MISSION TOUR

Christianity in Korea

It does not take long after one's entrance into Korea to discover that its religious atmosphere is far different from that of Japan. Instead of stray chapels here and there it is soon apparent that Christian churches are a common place of resort, Christian schools are at work in all the places of size and importance, and Christian sentiment is to be met among all classes.

On the morning after our arrival in Seoul there came a note from Dr. Horace G. Underwood of the Presbyterian Educational Institutions, saying that he would be glad to have us visit the Bible College and see the students who are preparing to preach among their countrymen. It was a drive of some two miles, behind a pony urged on by the doctor, who wielded a stubby whip with strokes that hardly seemed to disturb the placid feelings of the little beast. By the side of the cart there ran the white-gowned servant whose business it was to look after the conveyance when it was not under way, and he had no difficulty in keeping up with us.

Out through the city wall we went, and along the highway which crosses the mountains, till we came to the side road leading up the hill to the level ground on which the school is built. The morning was clear and cold. The road was dry and dusty, as the cold wind swept down from the heights above. It was only a little after seven when we left the hotel, for the chapel services are at eight, and after taking charge of the common exercises of the morning, and teaching two classes the following hours, Dr. Underwood had a busy day before him in other forms of mission work, and in other parts of Seoul.

Dr. Underwood's Work in Korea.

On the way out he told me something of his work in Korea, which is of course in part the possession of every informed student of missions. He belongs to the American family which is chiefly concerned in the manufacture of the typewriter of that name. But among the brothers of that group it was decided that one should go out as a missionary, and the rest stand responsible in some degree for the maintenance of the work. I asked him if he had hopes that the Underwood machine would make its way in the East, as Standard oil and Singer sewing machines have done. He smiled and said he was not a regular agent, but considering the close connection between the typewriter and missions in that particular case he should be glad to see the business grow.

It was in 1885 that he came out under the direction of the Presbyterian Board. In the previous year a physician, Dr. Allen, and his wife had arrived, but were almost at once involved in disturbances which arose out of the activities of certain revolutionists, and were for a time in great danger. The services Dr. Allen was able to render gave him a place in the confidence of the king and the people, and opened the way for permanent effort. The coming of Dr. Underwood soon afterward gave to the mission its first ordained preacher. New openings presented themselves, and the forces were augmented. Three years later Miss Lillias Horton came as a medical missionary, and was able to render important services to the women of the royal household, which won for her a confidence which was of the greatest value to the missions after she became Mrs. Underwood.

Progress Very Slow at Beginning.

For the first years progress was very slow. Dr. Underwood baptized the first convert in 1886, and the first communion service, at which only seven people were present, was held in his house a year later. At the end of ten years of patient effort there were only a hundred and fifty Christians in all Korea. The time of seed-sowing seemed long. But other missionaries came, sent by the same board, by the Methodists and by the Church of England, and missions were gradually pushed out in all directions.

None of these workers, however, dreamed of the wonderful awakening of the land to the Gospel which has transpired in the past five years. By an almost common impulse, and, as these earnest men believe, in answer to prolonged and absorbing prayer, there began a series of revivals in different parts of the land comparable to nothing in modern times, unless the great Welsh revival of about the same period be regarded as of equal significance. Small bands of Christians gave themselves to prayer and preaching with apostolic fervor, and apparently apostolic results.

Whole communities embraced the Gospel. Old prejudices, based on the unstable foundations of Shamanism, Buddhism or Confucianism, vanished before the flood-tide of Christian zeal. Churches were planted everywhere. Christian schools were started. Medical mission work, so much needed in a backward land like Korea, was opened, and industrial instruction took its place among the features of reconstruction introduced by missionary effort. Korea is not Christianized as yet, but is well on the way. Dr. Underwood assured me that there are not less than two hundred thousand Christians in a total population of some twelve millions, and that the prospects for even more rapid growth of the Christian community are very bright.

While he told me this story we had arrived at the school, where the students of the Bible training class, a group comprising both the youthful and the mature, greeted "Un Moska," which is their way of saying "Teacher Underwood." There were about thirty present, seated on the floor, with note-books and Bibles in hand. Dr. Underwood read a portion of Scripture, one of the native teachers offered prayer, and then there was a short address, interpreted by the doctor. A most serious and reverent behavior marked all the exercises.

We gave a most instructive day to the new hospital, which is being erected with money furnished by Mr. Lewis H. Severence of Cleveland, O. Dr. O. R. Avison took us over the place and pointed out with enthusiasm the admirable equipment they were installing. Not a feature had been omitted, it seemed. I congratulated the doctor and his colleagues, Dr. J. W. Hirst and Dr. A. S. Ludlow, the latter just out from Western Reserve University, upon the fine plant they were to have. But I could not help feeling that Mr. Severence was really the one to be congratulated upon the chance to put his money to so noble and rewarding a use.

Great Need of Medical Missions.

And surely Korea needs medical missions. The native doctors practice only the crudest forms of healing. Their resort is magic and fetishes rather than surgery and medicine. Demon possession is the firm belief of the majority of the people, and the only way to get rid of the pain-demon is to make him so uncomfortable that he will depart. Many curious and pathetic stories are told of attempts made to cure diseases by native practitioners.

One man came to the hospital suffering from a large ulceration resulting from the application of caustic potash by a Korean doctor for some trifling lesion.

The wife of one of the native Christians complained of severe pains and a lump in her abdomen. Laparatomy was performed and a mass of scar tissue was found in her internal abdominal wall, from which were extracted three copper needles. Three years before a Korean doctor had inserted the needles to cure indigestion.

A young man walked twenty-five miles to consult the missionary physician. He was suffering from an affection of the ear, for which a native doctor had inserted a castor oil bean, as a preventive of wind entering the brain.

A woman with an acute inflammation of the middle ear said she had suffered great pain for three days, and though she had eaten large quantities of fat pork on the advice of a Korean practitioner, was unimproved.

It is to save a whole people from such impostures that medical missions are needed in lands like Korea. And as the Severence Hospital is as well a medical school and dispensary, it offers both immediate help and the training of a group of young and intelligent Koreans who will be the expert medical practitioners of the future. And every one of them goes forth not only as a physician, but a Christian evangelist as well. For every day the chapel of the medical school is used as a school of the prophets as well as an inspiration to the best medical preparation. Dr. Avison is a teacher of Christian truth as well as medicine.

Work of the Author of "Korean Sketches."

One evening we went across the city, through cold that chilled to the bone, to visit the church over which Dr. J. S. Gale, author of "Korean Sketches" and other books, presides. He and Dr. Underwood are the veterans of the evangelistic force in Korea. His church is the largest in Seoul, and the claim is made that it has about the largest attendance at prayer meeting of any church in the world. We knew that the night we had chosen was no fair test, for the weather would have searched out the thin places in such slight garments as the Koreans wear.

Young Mr. Underwood, the son of the doctor, went with us. The church was a long, wooden structure, on a hillside, out beyond the business portion of Seoul. We heard the singing from afar, and knew we were approaching the place, even before we could see the lights, from our procession of jinrikishas. A youth at the door asked us to wait till the prayer was over, and in the cold of the night it seemed a long time.

When we entered we found ourselves in a long room, which seemed longer because it was divided down the center by a curtain which separated men and women. The platform was at the further end, and commanded a view of both halves of the congregation, though they could not see each other. There were no seats, save on the platform. All sat on the floor, around four large stoves, two on a side. Many of the people had lighted lanterns on the floor by their sides, which helped out the heat of the stoves, as well as the light of the swinging coal oil lamps above.

Apologized for Small Attendance.

There were about two hundred women and a hundred and fifty men. At the close of the service they apologized for the smallness of the attendance, saying that the very cold weather kept some away, and moreover it was the week on which they made the annual supply of "kimshi," a sort of pickled vegetable, which seems to be the main staple of food for most of the people.

The native pastor of the church conducted the opening services which remained after our entrance. The hymns were accompanied by a small organ, hardly larger than an old fashioned melodion. Everyone sang, though not all in key. Then an address was made by a native speaker, whom we understood to be a visiting preacher. It was long, but close attention was paid. If any in the congregation felt inclined to sleep, it was easy enough to lie forward on the floor, as some did.

At the close of the address another song was sung, and then a season of prayer followed. One after another those men and women poured out their hearts in earnest speech. We had heard of scenes of excitement and high emotion at the prayer meetings among the Koreans, but there was nothing of the sort. During the prayers all present, men and women alike, leaned forward with their faces to the floor. After fifteen or twenty minutes of this devotion the meeting closed. I regretted that it had not been a prayer meeting pure and simple. But as Dr. Underwood later remarked, the tendency to make speeches is strong in the hearts of Korean Christians as well as among Christians elsewhere, and the prayer meeting, that would never lack enthusiastic participation among these whole-hearted confessors, suffers somewhat.

Presbyterian and Methodist Work Praiseworthy.

Of the other work in Seoul, conducted by the Presbyterians and the Methodists, it would be a pleasure to speak if space were given. The John D. Wells Training School for Christian Workers, the Ewa School for Girls, the Woman's Hospital and other foundations of the two denominations are doing a noble work in the capital city. Nor must one forget the Y. M. C. A. to which Mr. John Wanamaker has given a fine building, where Mr. Philip L. Gillett carries on efficiently his secretarial work for Seoul and all Korea.

And if the story of Seoul is interesting, not less so is that of Pyeng Yang, on the Ta-tong River, fifty miles from the sea, the ancient capital of the country, and next to Seoul the most important city of Korea, with a population of 60,000. Here under the leadership of Dr. Samuel A. Moffett and his colaborers a work of wonderful impressiveness has been accomplished.

Not without suffering have the missionaries wrought in this land. Not without suffering has the native church reached its present estate. And yet with the suffering there has come deep joy, and the conviction that the same earnest efforts in the future will bring to pass the hope of those servants of God who have given their lives to this people, that Korea may be completely Christianized within the century.

The Orthodox Church

By W. J. Lhamon.

The Balkan war has brought a number of old peoples and their problems to the front. Not the least interesting among these problems is the religious one. We are accustomed to distinguish hastily and broadly between the Roman Catholic Church and the Greek Catholic Church, but what is the difference? Who is not hazy about it? What is the Orthodox Church?

About the middle of the eleventh century there came the rupture between the east and the west that had long been anticipated. Rome and Constantinople were the two proud and ambitious centers of century-long movements both politically and religiously. They furnished the geographical centers for the divided church, and measurably they so continue to do. The division resulted in the Holy Roman Catholic Church and the Holy Orthodox Church. The full title of the latter or Eastern Church is "The Church of the Seven Councils, Ecumenical, Holy, Catholic, and Apostolic."

The bond of union in the Roman Catholic Church is a governmental one culminating in the Pope of Rome, an organization military in its precision and rigid discipline. The bond of union of the Orthodox Church is doctrinal, its various branches accepting the doctrinal deliveries of the ecumenical councils.

Its points of difference from the Roman Catholic Church are stated as follows by Dr. Bliss in his recent book entitled, "The Religions of Modern Syria and Palestine."

1. Procession of the Holy Ghost from the Father alone. 2. The necessity of triple immersion in baptism. 3. The use of leavened bread in the mass as against the unleavened loaf of the Roman Church. 4. The form of the invocation of the Holy Spirit upon the worshipers and upon sacramental gifts. 5. Communion to the people in both kinds. 6. The denial of indulgence and purgatory, though disbelief in the latter is held to be consistent with prayers for the dead.

The many branches of this Eastern Church share in common with each other and with the Roman Catholic Church belief in the seven sacraments—baptismal regeneration, confession and absolution, the sacrifice of the mass, apostolic succession, ecclesiastical orders, the intercession of Mary and the saints.

In points of polity they differ widely from the Church of Rome. Territorial church units are coterminous almost wholly with political boundaries. This will appear in the following partial list of patriarchates:

1. The Patriarchate of Constantinople, dating back to 381 A. D., and embracing at present in one diocese Asia Minor, Crete, the Aegean Isles, and European Turkey.
2. The Patriarchate of Alexandria, 67 A. D.
3. Of Antioch, in Syria, dating from the days of Paul.
4. Of Jerusalem, 451 A. D.
5. The Church of Russia, governed by The Most Holy Synod in St. Petersburg, dating from Peter the Great, 1700 A. D.
6. The Metropolitan Church of Cyprus, 431 A. D.
7. The Church of Greece directed by the Synod of Athens.

Doctrinally our western Protestantism is as far afield from the great Eastern Church as from the Roman Church. We differ by the whole breadth of the seven sacraments, for even baptism and the Lord's Supper are not to us what they are to our eastern brethren. And we differ also by the whole of the long road that lies between Aristotle and Bacon, between metaphysics and physics, between deduction and induction, between dogmatism and science. We fail to find interest in a speculation or a dogma relative to eternal procession. We insist on finding Christ the Brother in mine and factory and class-room and cabinet, and we are concerned in discovering the fruits of the Holy Spirit rather than the procession of the Holy Spirit.

Church Life

A Sociable Personality Capitalized for Unity.

That sociable soul, Howard T. Cree, capitalizes for the cause of Christian unity the friendships which a ten years' ministry in Augusta, Ga., has established. Mr. Cree is looked upon as the "dean" of the Protestant ministry of his city, having served a longer period than any of his colleagues. He is constantly called upon to co-operate with the other churches and seizes each occasion as an opportunity to cultivatte tne spirit of Christian union. Recently he delivered one of the addresses at the opening of the parish house of St. Paul's Episcopal Church, the oldest congregation in the city, and was presented by the rector as "Bishop Cree, who did more to encourage me in the building of this parish house than any other man in the city." Even with the Roman Catholic church he also enjoys the most fraternal relations and just recently received an invitation to be present at the fiftieth anniversary of St. Patrick's Church to which he replied as follows: "I exceedingly regret that the demands of my own church work will deny me that pleasure. However, allow me to congratulate you upon the splendid occasion and wish for you and your congregation long years of yet further usefulness in our common cause. May I venture to express the hope that the kindly relation which has existed among all the churches in Augusta may continue to the good of our community and the glory of our common Father." At times he has been the only Protestant minister at Catholic banquets and has even served as active pallbearer at a funeral in the cathedral. Such an expression of fraternity toward those with whom one ecclesiastically differs cannot but bring its reward. As further expressive of this delightful relationship which Mr. Cree fosters, a union service of all the central congregations was recently held at which the Disciples' Foreign Missionary team—Cory, Shelton, Dye and Cunningham—spoke to an auditorium full of representatives from every denomination in the city. It was conceded on all hands that this was the greatest missionary service ever held in the community and the speakers were commended for their catholic presentation of the world wide task. Mr. Cree celebrates his entrance upon his tenth year of service of this church with a series of decision services at which Allen R. Moore of Savannah will do the preaching.

An Ozark Secretarial Tour.

Secretaries Grant K. Lewis, John H. Booth, and I. E. Reid made a tour of the Third District, in Missouri, holding church institutes. They were accompanied by J. H. Jones superintendent of missions for the district. The following places were visited. Nevada, Lamar, Joplin First, Joplin South, Joplin Villa Heights, Carthage, Alba, Smithfield, Carl Junction, Webb City, Neosho, Aurora, Springfield, Marshfield, Lebanon, Salem, Rolla, St. James, Newburg, Richland, West Plains, Mountain Grove and Osceola. A registration was kept of the sessions where all four workers were together showing an attendance of fifty-two Sunday-school teachers and workers, thirty-eight preachers and fifty-five elders and deacons besides other church workers. This registration did not include the Sunday visits when the company divided and each made two churches and sometimes three. Secretary Booth of the Church Extension Board was the John the Baptist of the company, going ahead and preparing the way, delivering addresses on Church Efficiency and Front Rank Church Buildings and setting forth the value of Church Extension. Secretary Lewis of American Society, spoke on the "Country Church Problem" and "Home Missions." Secretary Reid of Missouri Sunday-schools held conferences on Sunday-school work and Mr. Jones spoke on the Budget plan of missions. Every conference was interesting and it is felt that many people were given a more adequate standard of church work then they had before.

Indianapolis Churches and the Flood.

Five Disciple congregations in Indianapolis suffered more or less seriously from the recent high water. Most of these will be able to take care of their own unfortunate people. The Morris St. Church with about one-half its membership living in the flooded district, with its house of worship damaged by the high waters, with a debt of about $2,500 and with many of the members seeking homes in other parts of the city, is greatly crippled. Pastor Doney was canvassing the membership to find one hundred people who would agree to pay off the debt and had secured about half the required number when the high water swept away practically all the property the majority of these people owned. A communication from C. H. Winders, President Indianapolis Church Union and W. D. Bartle, President Christian Ministers' Association, says that the Indianapolis churches will help to refurnish these homes and repair the church building. "So many offers of assistance have come from the outside," their communication says, "that it has occurred to us there might be one hundred churches or individuals who would like to pay this debt on the little church and lift a great burden from the hearts of these faithful people." Any who may be so inclined, may send their contribution to Walter C. Howe, State Life Building, who will receipt for the same.

Philadelphia Disciples Entertain Commission.

Philadelphia Disciples made use of the occasion of the sitting of the commission on Christian union in their city recently to arrange a social dinner at the City Club. Of visiting guests there were present Peter Ainslie, E. B. Bagby and H. C. Armstrong of Baltimore, Finis Idleman of Des Moines, F. W. Burnham of Springfield, Ill., and Mr. Lipscomb of Washington, D. C. Irving S. Chenoweth, pastor of Philadelphia's First Church, was toastmaster while the visiting guests and others made speeches. First Church recently held its annual meeting, preceded by a dinner prepared by the women of the church. Reports from all the societies were read. The total amount raised during the year was $6,561.60, of which $1,829.57 was devoted to missions and benevolences. A new enthusiasm and hopefulness has been experienced by the church since Mr. Chenoweth became the pastor last May. Seven people were received into the church during March.

Morality and Religion Discussed.

The spiritual in contrast with the merely moral life was the theme of a sermon by Dr. H. O. Breeden on the evening of Palm Sunday at First Church, Fresno, Calif. The sermon was based upon the conversion of the Roman centurion, Cornelius, who was represented as a good moral man. In comparison with this man, who was described as a good, benevolent and prayerful man, in comparison with whom most men would suffer. Yet it was divinely deemed that he was in need of salvation, by which was meant the larger and more abundant life, brought to light in Jesus Christ. Character has three dimensions, said Dr. Breeden: Extension, breadth and height—longitude, latitude and altitude. The character of the merely moral man represents only extension and breadth. These are embraced in the Christian character, but do not fill it full—they commence but do not complete it. "If ye are risen with Christ seek those things which are above." "Spirituality is rising up into the higher life. The soul finds its correspondence in the kingdom of God. In Christ men come back into this correspondence. There was a vital thing that Cornelius lacked. Where he found it all must find it. If this be not true the mission and ministry of Jesus Christ were a work of superrogation." The moral man was given credit for his morality. He was conceded to be leagues nearer to life than the immoral man; yet he was warned that there still was a vital thing he lacked. That is the life that is attained through the new birth.

A Sound and Convincing Statement.

A leading article on "The Disciples of Christ" in the "Inter-Church Forum" of Spokane, Wash., written by J. E. Davis, pastor Central Christian Church of that city, states the position and history of the Disciples in an illuminating and original fashion. The article is thoroughly orthodox, unless the entire omission of any reference to baptism may be considered unorthodox. The article points the reader to essential principles of Christian unity and does not distract the reader's attention to consider points of ritual which, however important in their place, are obviously not so important as fundamental principles.

The Congress.

Not in the history of the Disciples Congress has there been presented a series of papers so uniformly adequate to the vital problems discussed as were those that made up the program at St. Louis last week. There have been larger attendances—although the visitors this year numbered about one hundred, thus surpassing many recent Congresses—but none more informing, thought provoking and reassuring.

Union Avenue Church and her gracious pastor, B. A. Abbott, entertained the gathering with a type of hospitality belonging to the older days rather than to the present custom. Delegates were taken into the homes of this and other Disciple congregations and entertained without the charge which in larger gatherings is nowadays necessary to make. Mr. Abbott was president of the Congress and Prof. A. W. Taylor secretary. Upon the secretary, according to custom, devolves mainly the task of constructing the program. The kind of a program which Prof. Taylor would make can easily enough be imagined by those who know the versatility and depth of sympathy with current movements in church and social order which characterize his mind. Problems peculiar to Disciples, problems related to Christian unity, problems of philosophic thought, problems of biblical interpretation, problems related to social ideals and tendencies—these were the materials out of which the secretary, with no doubt not a little suggestion from the executive committee, wove the most comprehensive and vital program which our Congress goers have ever enjoyed.

theme and so to present a balanced program and give various points of view a "fair representation" did not seem to dominate this Congress as it has previous Congresses. But a higher principle underlay the choice of speakers. The committee sought out speakers whose interests and equipment naturally fitted them for their several themes and left the question of "conservative" and "liberal" representation to take care of itself.

And it did take care of itself. Each paper was thoroughgoing. It rang with sincerity and authority. It provoked thought and stimulated discussion.

One paper, that by Frank W. Allen, Paris, Mo., frankly and fearlessly championed Socialism as in its theoretical aspect the solution of the social problem, while another writer, Prof. A. C. Gray of Eureka College, vigorously challenged the economic and ethical aims and implications of the doctrine. H. H. Peters of Paris, Ill., opened his earnest discussion of these two papers with the facetious remark that each paper had been so convincing that no course was left open to him save to go back home and continue being a Disciple and a good Democrat!

The social question came up in other sessions. One session studied the influence of the modern social movement on religious thinking and on religious activities. Prof. Silas Jones, of Eureka College read one of the papers and Prof. F. E. Lumley of the College of Missions, read the other. The same evening a thought stimulating paper on "Pagan Tendencies in Present Day Civilization" was read by Prof. C. A. Ellwood of the University of Missouri. Dr. Ellwood characterized our modern life as more pagan in its ideals and standards than Christian.

In philosophy Bergson and Eucken and James were interpreted by H. D. C. Maclachlan of Richmond, Va., and Pres. F. D. Kershner of Texas Christian University. The Revival came in for the most drastic examination it ever received among Disciples. "Its Use of Scripture and its Theology" was the title of a paper by W. J. Wright of Franklin, Ind., and "Its Psychological Aspects" the title of a paper by H. O. Pritchard of Lincoln, Nebr.

The opening session on Tuesday evening discussed a paper by W. F. Richardson of Kansas City on "The New Co-operative Ideals of the Disciples" and the closing session on Thursday found a good deal to talk about in Finis Idleman's paper on "What Policy Shall the Disciples Pursue in Planting New Churches?" Dr. J. H. Garrison led this latter discussion.

The next Congress will be held in Lexington, Ky. E. L. Powell of Louisville, was elected president and Prof. C. M. Sharpe, of Chicago, secretary.

The men of the Oklahoma Brotherhoods and men's Bible classes will hold four district conventions in Auril: First District at Muskogee, April 14-16; Second District at Enid, April 16-18; Third District at Clinton, April 21-23 and Fourth District at Lawton, April 23-25. These gatherings "will be storm centers of information and inspiration." Pastors are requested by A. R. Spicer, State President of the Brotherhood, to send in a list of their men's Bible classes to E. E. Elliott, of Kansas City for affiliation with the Brotherhood work. The men will then select delegates to the meeting.

The Brotherhood at Urichsville, Ohio, held a debate recently on the subject, "Resolved that a church may obtain better results from a special meeting with home forces than with an evangelist." Two speakers were chosen for each side and a space was left open for general discussion.

Dr. H. B. Robison, Dean of the Bible College of Christian University, will preach the convention sermon at the coming Sixth District (Mo.), Convention at Macon. May 12, 13 is the date. District leaders expect a good gathering. Alfred Munyon is pastor of the entertaining congregation.

It is announced that plans for the new Christian Hospital at Kansas City will be completed and work actually begun very shortly, now that the new site has been purchased and Mr. R. A. Long has returned from a prolonged absence in the West Indies and Panama.

The first five months of the missionary year, ending February 28, shows an increase in receipts from all sources of $2,629.87 for the American Missionary Society. This year ought to be the greatest in the history of home missions.

A GREAT AND POPULAR CHURCH MUSIC BOOK

The New Praise Hymnal

By GILBERT J. ELLIS and J. H. FILLMORE

The New Praise Hymnal comes as near being the ideal church hymnal for the present day as could well be conceived. It is a handsome book, dignified in appearance and make-up. It embraces in its contents as nearly everything demanded to-day as could be gotten into a book of 600 pages.

The New Praise Hymnal is practical in every way; everything in it is available for use in the average congregation. It contains what is used by the most advanced churches. The setting of the hymns and music is engaging to the eye and pleasant to read and sing.

It is a book that grows in favor as it is used. New beauties are discovered from time to time as its pages are tested. The hymns and tunes of the church universal are found in The New Praise Hymnal, also the best available Gospel Songs that the modern church has found to be necessary to its various activities.

The sales of The New Praise Hymnal are larger now than they have ever been. The sales are increasing day by day. This means that it meets the demands better than any other book. Sample Copies mailed for examination.

Prices: Silk Cloth Sides, Leather Back, at $70 per 100; Vellum Cloth, at $50 per 100.

Toronto Preparing for Convention

When Toronto "went after" the International Convention at Louisville it was considered by most Canadians fitting and proper that we should have our turn. So reasonable did our claim appear that we felt it would be the part of good neighborliness to grant it. The surprise we received was the readiness with which the request was granted. The cordiality of that response we have not forgotten. It set a new record. After this we shall call it "American." As for a welcome to our shores let us paraphrase Burns who declared a "Highland welcome" would be sufficient for heaven. We realize that it is "up to us" to provide a "Canadian" welcome.

Already in our papers we notice anticipations of "Toronto 1913." These signs are encouraging. Our American brethren are remembering us. They are surely coming. But lest some of them should be unwary of Toronto's attractions we shall print a few remarks occasionally, just as often as friendly editors have space. And, believe us, Toronto will be worth while.

Spring is breaking in our northern clime, so it is early to direct you to special attractions; but if we may begin on the weather we can pretty safely promise that Sept. 30 to Oct. 6 will see the first sheaf of a full shock of glorious autmun days gathered in. Summer clothing with an extra wrap or two, and there you are!

Having disposed of this prime essential let us say that the Toronto brethren have been concerned more than a little about "fixing up" to receive our many and distinguished visitors. We have taken time to get off to a good start. It is worth while saying emphatically that our brethren have picked as strong a Local Committee as could be found. Aside from the rank and file, to be known later, let us introduce our officers: Honorary President, Dr. Jas. H. F. McCullough; President, J. D. Higgins, and Secretary, Prof. H. F. Dawes, of McMaster University faculty, and all leading members of long standing of our first church of four in Toronto. Massey Hall, where the sessions will be held is practically ideal and deserves space to describe. Our secretary may be addressed at 600 Manning Ave.

REUBEN BUTCHART,
Chairman Publicity Committee.

Foreign Mission News

Last week a friend in Texas remembered the Foreign Society with an annuity gift.

Mrs. Alexander Paul, who has been at home in America with the children for a furlough, sails for Wuhu, China, her home, to join her husband on the S. S. Mongolia May 3. We are so short-handed for workers in China that Mr. Alexander felt impelled to forego his furlough for some years yet. This devotion to duty and downright sacrifice for the work's sake should be known and recognized.

The wide-spread floods reduced the receipts of the Foreign Society very considerably the last week in March. There was a loss of about 120 contributing churches in the one week and the loss in receipts was about $5,000. The mails were cut down for a time to a very small number of letters. We have confidence that the churches will yet rally and do their best in the support of the workers in the regions beyond. The total receipts for the month of March were $40,044, a loss of $5,971. We regret to report this loss. It would be more to our liking and to that of the friends of the work if it had been a gain. Let us now turn our faces to April and overcome the loss sustained in March. It can be done. We believe it will be done.

Liang Yuen is a prosperous outstation from Luchowfu, China. At a recent quarterly meeting held there five Chinese preachers were present, three teachers and two Bible women besides the local membership. One man in this community is anxious to go to the Bible College at Nankin to prepare himself for the ministry of the Word. An evangelistic meeting is being held at Luchowfu with success. Mr. Dziang of Nankin is doing the preaching.

W. H. Erskine and family have returned to Japan and are now stationed in the great city of Osaka. F. M. RAINS, Sec.

Ohio's Necessity

The great state of Ohio is sorely stricken. One thousand lives are the sickening toll levied by the flood. In Dayton alone government experts report 20,000 homes in the heart of the city ruined, 93,000 people homeless, and the property loss reaches $200,000,000.

Governor Cox says Zanesville, Piqua, Marietta, Hamilton and a host of other places are as hard hit as Dayton. Among the others are Middletown, McConnelsville, Ironton, Chillicothe.

The relief problem is greater than that which faced the Red Cross Association at San Francisco after the earthquake. The loss of life is greater; the devasted territory is wide in extent.

The Ohio Christian Missionary Society offers itself to the churches as the channel for cash relief contributions for our stricken brethren. Many churches suffered severely. The West Side church, Dayton, has only seventeen members not affected by the flood. The building had fifteen feet of water; seats carpets, pews, pianos utterly ruined. The pastor at Chillicothe lost all that he had. There are hundreds of similar calamities. The papers report the little church at Coke Otto, just founded, as wiped out completely.

Money for relief of suffering people will be received at this office and forwarded where need is greatest. What is done must be done quickly. Churches, individuals, societies and classes should give.

Friends should note also that in addition to individual relief there is imperative need of gifts many and large to our general funds. Appeals to save the life of churches are coming in upon us. It is a time of crisis. It is a time of tremendous opportunity. It is a time of blessed fellowship. "Remember them that are in bonds as being bound with them."

Send contributions to this office. Be careful to state whether it is for personal relief or for assistance to churches.

Home Mission Notes.

The wide-spread devastation caused by floods and winds in the last two weeks has ruined the prospects of our regular May offering for American missions. The wide area extending from Omaha to New York, and covering much of the lower Mississippi Valley, storm-swept and flooded, contains the churches most liberal in support of home missions. Many of these have been rendered dependent and are already asking for support.

W. G. Oram, pastor Second Church, Dayton, O., telegraphed the home office: "Church flooded with fifteen feet water. Great distress. All suffering."

A. R. Adams, pastor at Chillicothe, Ohio, writes this pathetic story: "We were in a splendid meeting here with nine additions, when the terrible storm struck our city. Wife and I lost everything, including household goods, books, clothing and money. Today we are penniless and being fed by the city, and the majority of our people are in the same condition. Fortunately, our church building still stands, and if we can get a little financial assistance, say, $25.00 per month for six months, we will stay by the work. Wife and I floated for thirty-six hours on the roof of a building without food or clothing before we were saved."

When the flood shall have passed, many pastors will find their people, on account of property loss, unable to support them in the work of the Lord. Shall those churches be abandoned? Not only will many churches be rendered dependent, but the usual resources of income to support our missionaries and evangelists in the field will have been swept away.

Great calamities teach great lessons. America has been made to realize, through this general disaster, the dependence of the people upon God. They have been taught anew the value of the permanent above the transient. The heroism of the people has been awakened anew, and the self-sacrificing and generous have improved the opportunity of feeding and clothing sufferers from this calamity. However, material things will not satisfy the souls of men and women hungering for spiritual food. The church will have a larger place in their thought than ever before, and the opportunity of the congregations which have not suffered to extend the help of the church is greater than ever before. This serious time calls for quick, earnest work on the part of pastors, to prepare for the May offering. Less than thirty days remain for such preparation. We call upon men of means to help the home society in this time of its struggle to meet the exigencies of the hour.

I. N. MCCASH, Secretary.

A SPLENDID OPPORTUNITY to Make Money, Both Men and Women. WRITE TODAY.

How often have many lady readers longed for the death of the old stove-heated sad iron and the hard, tiresome, hot days work it means to them each week—for the man that cut ironing day in two.

He lives—a genius of Cincinnati has invented a device that is proving a blessing to women folks. Made ironing day troubles all over—changed —there's a new way of ironing—astonishing but true. The family ironing can now be done in less than half the time—less than half the work, and with one-tenth the usual fuel expense. No running back and forth between stove and ironing board—iron where you please—you do not need to stay in the hot kitchen—iron in any room—on porch—under shade of tree if you wish. No drudgery—that is past. Goodbye to the old style stove heated irons. The easy way of ironing is here to bless our dear women.

SEE HOW SIMPLE, DIFFERENT, EASY

Light the iron; set it for the amount of heat desired. See how rapidly the hot iron slides over the damp clothes, ironing and pressing them quickly and easily, the smooth point in and out of the gathers, tucks and ruffles, drying them as it goes. Nothing to delay; it is hot, keeps hot, runs easily and smoothly. Iron on the table all the time, one hand on the iron—the other to smooth, turn and fold the clothes. It is a fast iron, you unconsciously move quickly to keep up with it. You can go as fast as you choose, and the clothes are ironed better and in one-half the time.

No waiting with this iron. Go right along, one thing after another. Irons all kinds of goods. No time wasted—iron right heat; regulate it to the required amount for any kind of ironing. If you want more heat, turn it on; if you want less heat, turn some off. Always ready for use when you want it. Just light the iron and go ahead, you don't need to build a fire in the kitchen range and wait for three or four irons to heat. With the Self-Heating Iron you have the iron when you want it, where you want it, and with the heat you want; whether you want to do a big ironing, or whether you want to press and iron only a few pieces. Sounds strange, may be hard to believe—but listen, the writer saw it demonstrated—it's all true. No experiment—going on daily. THOUSANDS ARE IN USE and customers are delighted. It not only irons white goods, finest laces, curtains, but anything that can be ironed by the old method. Saves time, fuel, health and money. Well and durably made, will last for years. Right size, right weight, right shape. Perfectly safe—anyone can use it.

HUNDREDS A WEEK

While at the factory in Cincinnati, the writer found that this invention has caused remarkable excitement all over the U. S. FACTORY ALREADY RUSHED WITH THOUSANDS OF ORDERS. Evidently the company's agents are making big money, as they offer big commissions to active agents, and will also send a free sample to those who mean business.

It will be noticed from the engraving that this iron is different from any other iron. Construction very simple—easily and safely operated by anyone, and built on the latest scientific principles.

It will be seen that the Standard Self-Heating Iron is complete in itself, simple and compact in construction. Carries its own fuel, makes its own gas, burns its own gas. The reservoir is placed above the iron and under the handle, convenient for filling, yet out of the way, does not interfere with the ironing. By an ingenious device, when lighting it is only necessary to open a small slide which can be again closed, thus retaining all the heat in the iron. With our new burner the flame is evenly distributed over the bottom of the iron, insuring a steady, regular heat. The valve for regulating the heat is on the outside, under the handle; turning this one way or the other gives more or less heat. No attachments, connecting pipes, no elevated tanks projecting to be in the way when operating.

The handle is of wood and requires no cloth or holder; the iron burns perfectly, standing on heel when not in use.

CUSTOMERS PRAISE IT

The writer was shown hundreds of letters from actual users of this grand invention, proving it a positive success and giving splendid satisfaction. The following extracts may interest our readers: Alex Stalker, N. Y. writes: "The Self-Heating Iron received some time ago and will say right here it is the most useful and money-saving device that was ever made. My wife has just finished a large ironing in two hours that usually took her half a day with the old stove-heating irons, and the house is cool. It is certainly just the only iron made. We want the agency." W. P. Farnum: After receiving your iron and giving it a thorough trial it will be a perfect success. My wife is enthusiastic over the work it does and the economy in its use." Mrs. J. E. King, Ill.: "Received iron yesterday in good shape. Well pleased with it. Want the agency." J. N. Newby, Ill.: "Find it to be all you claim for it." Mrs. Josephine Route, N. Y.: "Received the iron O. K. and did my ironing with it yesterday. I like it very much." A. E. Covert, N. Y.: "Have lighted it several times already and find I can do ironing so much quicker and cleaner than in the old way. Think it is the best thing I have ever had in my house." Miss Roxie Sheete, N.C.: "The 2 irons received and am delighted. Have turned off our regular ironer and will do the ironing ourselves, now. Sold the extra iron to the first lady I showed it to." Mrs. Watson C. McNall, N. Y.: "I am more than pleased with it and its work. It is not a bit clumsy. It is a delight to use it." Mrs. Cora Wright, Ill.: "I received the iron Saturday and like it fine." Mrs. C. M. Winstead, Ky.: "I received my iron about three weeks ago. Like it better than anything I ever saw in the way of irons."

This invention must, indeed, be wonderful, yes, a God-send, that cuts ironing-day in less than half and cuts fuel expense to almost nothing.

The writer personally saw this iron in operation and after using one in his own home is delighted with it and after a thorough investigation can say to our readers that the Standard Self-Heating Iron, made by the Cincinnati firm, seems to delight the users and the makers guarantee every one.

HOW TO GET ONE

It is not sold in stores. Write to the C. BROWN MFG. CO. 1076 Brown Bldg., Cincinnati, O. the only manufacturers of this grand invention. Send no money—simply your name and address, and they will send you circulars giving full description, and testimonials from users. The price of the Standard Self-Heating Iron, complete, ready for use, with full directions, so anyone can operate it, is only $4.50. If you prefer to order at once, do so—you won't be disappointed, as the makers fully guarantee every iron. They are reliable, have been in business for years, and do just as they agree.

Don't fail to send for circulars anyway.

EPISCOPALIANS AND DISCIPLES

A CONFERENCE ON UNITY

IS MODERN CIVILIZATION PAGAN

BY CHARLES A. ELLWOOD

CHICAGO

Disciples Publication Society

THE DISCIPLES PUBLICATION SOCIETY is a corporation chartered under the laws of Illinois. It is organized for the purpose of publishing books, Sunday School literature and a weekly religious newspaper. It has no capital stock. Its profits are not to go to individuals but to be appropriated to advance the cause of religious education, especially the higher education of the Christian ministry. The term "religious education" is regarded as an ideal common to Sunday Schools, missionary societies, colleges, seminaries and universities, and other organizations that promote Christian progress through Christian education. The Society through its trustees has purchased the entire assets and good will of the New Christian Century Company (including the subscription list and good will of The Christian Century; a contract of participation in the interdenominational syndicate for publishing the Bethany Graded Lessons; a contract of membership in the United Religious Press, all books, Sunday School supplies and other stock on hand, all accounts and bills receivable, besides assuming liability for all accounts and bills payable, to $16,000 and has executed its notes to that amount which have been accepted by the stock-holders of the New Christian Century Company in payment for their property. To provide capital for enlarging the business the trustees are issuing 5 per cent bonds in the amount of $50,000, payable after five years, to be sold to persons interested in the ideals of The Christian Century. It is believed at the present time that not more than $25,000 of these bonds need be sold in order to put the Society on a sound profit earning basis. Subscriptions for the purchase of these bonds are now being solicited by J. C. Mattson and H. L. Willett, editors of The Christian Century. During Dr. Willett's absence in the Orient correspondence may be addressed exclusively to Mr. Mattson. Full information as to all details will be given upon inquiry. The essential purpose of the transaction and proposals herein described is to provide a way for the general brotherhood of the Disciples of Christ to buy The Christian Century and its publishing house and to pay for them by redeeming them. The bonds and notes are to be retired out of the profits earned by the Society. The purchasers of bonds, therefore, will stand, with the holders of notes, in the position of sustaining supporters of the enterprise while the brotherhood's patronage is paying for it and increasing its value. The present is a favorable time for the organization of the Disciples Publication Society is well open, and upon it the organizers will be glad to receive suggestions. It is the purpose to make a thoroughly democratic and representative. The five trustees named by the charter will act for the Society until the basis of membership has been determined and the members elected.

Conference of Disciples and Episcopalians

[Editorial comment will appear in next issue.]

On March 28 and 29 a conference was held with members of the Commission of the Disciples of Christ, and members of the Foundation, of the Protestant Episcopal Church, last Easter Thirty-seventh street, New York.

The Foundation as Christ present were: Rev. Dr. Percy Grant of Baltimore, Rev. F. W. Burnham of Springfield, Illinois, Prof. Percy Gilbertson of New Haven, Conn., Rev. Dr. Walter M. Pendleton of New York, Rev. Edward H. Eckel, Rev. George C. Richardson, Rev. Francis M. Sheets of Baltimore and Mr. William T. Hipperson of Washington, D. C.

The members of the Foundation present were: Mr. Earl Dr. Courtland, president, Rev. Calvin Dwiggins, Rev. Dr. Grant, Prof. H. L. Willett, Rev. Dr. Lowrie, Mr. Francis C. Huntington and Mr. Orrell E. Ogden.

The Foundation has held several conferences with different religious bodies. At conferences with the Presbyterians and Congregationalists the resolutions passed in Louisville in 1909 and 1910, by representatives of the Church of England in Australia and the Presbyterians as a basis for reunion meetings, were taken up seriatim, and passed with some amendments.

At the conference with the Disciples after a paper by Dr. Lowrie on the Christian ministry as revealed in the New Testament had been read, the publication of which was requested by the Disciples of Christ, the following resolutions, as amended by the Congregationalists, were taken up and with slight alterations, looking rather to unity than uniformity, were unanimously passed by them present as a basis of procedure.

Resolutions.

1. We hold the holy Scriptures of the Old and New Testament to be the rule and ultimate standard of faith in all matters necessary to salvation.

2. We accept the Apostles Creed and the Nicene Creed as expressing fundamental features of the Christian faith, and as an adequate basis for any further ecumenical statement of Christian truth which may be needed.

3. We agree that there are two sacraments ordained by Christ Himself, Baptism and the Supper of the Lord—ordained with the use of Christ's words of institution and of the elements ordained by Him.

4. That the act of ordination, when regularly administered, confers power and the benediction of heaven.

5. With regard to ordination, the conference affirms the following to be essential conditions:

(1) Full membership of the Church.

(2) The inward and personal call of the Holy Spirit.

(3) The recognition by the Church of this call after due inquiry into worthiness and spiritual fitness.

6. The laying on of hands in ordination we understand to be a visible symbol of the bestowal by the Holy Spirit of authority and grace for the work of the ministry in answer to the prayer of faith.

7. The authority to perform an act of ordination rests [illegible] and the Father through Christ the Redeemer, by the Holy Spirit in the living power in the Church, and is exercised through the appointed officers of the Church.

8. Organic unity is sought by the establishment of a unity [illegible]

9. We recognize that living unity already exists up to the period of the Reformation. There was one ministry of orders, and that same one, into the practice of ordination has been continued, and the act of ordination has been performed: in the Anglican Church by a bishop and presbyters, and in the Presbyterian Church by a presbytery presided over by a moderator, and in the Congregational Church and among the Disciples of Christ by a council called by a local congregation.

10. That a union of the Church of England in Australia and Tasmania and the Presbyterian Church of Australia be effected and consummated by a joint action and under the authority and exercise of their churches, in which each church shall confer upon the ministers in the other all the rights and privileges necessary for the exercise of their office in the United Church, so that from the moment of such union all the ministers of each church shall have equal status in the United Church.

11. That while forms of individual responsibility and government, constitutionally exercised, is prevalent for the United Church, and that the authority of the United Church to exercise supervision shall be exercised by a solemn act of consecration duly administered on a person or persons with the laying on of hands, as the appropriate symbol.

12. That the person to hold the office of bishop shall be elected by the Church in accordance with regulations duly authorized by the United Church.

13. That a bishop, in his consecration, shall be subject to all duly enacted laws of the United Church.

14. That the length of period of office as a bishop before re-election shall be determined by the United Church.

15. That statement, while recognizing that the authority to perform an act of ordination is present in the Church, agrees that, as a matter of order in the United Church, all ordinations of persons as ministers of the word and sacraments shall be by a bishop and three ministers at least.

And further, that in the consecration of every bishop three bishops at least shall take part, and such ministers as may be appointed for the purpose.

16. That liturgical and non-liturgical forms of worship, the use of the Book of Common Prayer and additional forms of worship be sanctioned by the United Church.

17. That there be an order of deacons or deaconess, who are ordained to office who shall have such powers as shall be sanctioned by the United Church.

18. That there be an order of officers whose office shall be analogous to that of churchwardens and elders appointed to help in the pastoral oversight and the government of the Church with such powers as shall be sanctioned by the United Church, and that these officers shall be elected by the communicants of each several congregation, and may be set apart to their office by a form of ordination with or without the laying-on of hands."

Faith in the Average Man

The learned asked, concerning Jesus, "How knoweth this man learning, having never learned?" But their admiration of His learning did not make them followers of Him. The men who admired good deeds were compelled to acknowledge the reality of the benefactions which Jesus wrought; it was really very striking that those who found fault with these things did not deny their reality, but said "By the prince of demons casteth He out demons." But the very qualities of these men which ought to have made them competent judges and have predisposed them favorably towards the claims of Jesus, had their complementary limitations. It was the common people after all who were the best judges.

There is a present trend away from faith in democracy. Our faith in the judgment of ordinary men has received some rude shocks. But if mobs break the laws, so do corporations. If juries shock us by plain disregard of law and evidence, so does the Supreme Court, in its painfully expert straining out of gnats and swallowing of camels. There is no just criticism of the common people whose other pole is not equally just indictment of men in high position. And in the long run, the average judgment of the average man is sound.

We underestimate the value of the commonplace elements in our own lives. The daily task has a greater value in the development of character than we commonly suppose. We gloat over the hundred dollars we have saved, and count this deposit in the bank as constituting our wealth. But while we were saving this hundred dollars, we were spending a thousand, a vastly larger sum. And with it we purchased not merely food and clothing, but daily joy and experience. That is our real wealth.

The twelve apostles were commonplace men. The astonishing fact about the spread of the Gospel is that it was planned, so far as there was any human plan about it, and compassed, by a group of men who had no official position in church or state, no wealth or rank or exceptional equipment. They were not men of genius or of social or political standing; they were average men. Listen to these words of the apostle Paul, a pæan of exalted praise of the incomparable work of God through humble, commonplace men:

> For behold your calling, brethren, that not many wise after the flesh, not many mighty, not many noble, are called: but God chose the foolish things of the world, that he might put to shame them that are wise; and God chose the weak things of the world, that he might put to shame the things that are strong; and the base things of the world, and the things that are despised, did God choose, yea, and the things that are not, that he might bring to nought the things that are: that no flesh should glory before God.

Consider for a moment the life of the average man; in how many relations he stands before his God and his fellow men. He is a son; a brother; a lover; a husband; a father; a church member; a citizen. He earns a living selling his labor in the open market, and holding his job because he is worthy of it. He has this wonderful round of experiences. He secures an education, he finds employment; he wins the heart of some woman whom he loves; he suffers disappointment and pain; he labors for his children and for some cause he holds dear; he passes through anxiety, grief, joy, ecstasy. How wonderful is such a life! And this is the average life. This is the simplest possible outline of the experience of the average man. In it is material for romance and tragedy such as no writer of fiction ever wrote—the life of the common man.

Consider also how wonderfully the Gospel is adapted to the needs of this average man, in the inevitable round of his sorrows and his joys, his relations as son and father, husband and citizen, toiler and seeker after something better than he has known. How the Gospel finds him where he is, helps him to make the best of what cannot be helped, and encourages him to something better in everything that is possible! And how it interprets to him the plan of God in this wonderful cycle that makes up the sum of every humble life! Think of the ingenuity of God displayed in the life of every such man, and the limitless hope there is in every humble fellow-being!

We need more faith in the value of common men. We need to remind ourselves how society continually needs reinforcement from the rear. We need a new rendering in terms of peace of the principle of Lincoln's Gettysburg address. So far as war could settle the question there at issue, the war settled that question. But peace puts a greater strain than war on our theories of democracy. We now are in the midst of a great battle to determine whether our fathers were right or wrong in the faith they held in common men. We need again to dedicate ourselves to the principle which they counted fundamental. We need new faith in the people, and in the rule of the people in church and state. We need again highly to resolve that that principle of the worth of common humanity shall not perish from the earth.

LOT: THE VICTIM OF A BAD CHOICE.

In the narrative of Abram and Lot, the former is shown to be generous, reasonable, and conciliatory, the latter is selfish and ruled by the desire for immediate success. The religious man can wait. He lives in the present but into the present he brings the achievements and companionships of the future. What seems to others a prize that should be grasped immediately may appear to him almost worthless. His choices are made with reference to the whole of life. He has a body that needs food; he is therefore diligent in business. His heart needs human companionship; he governs his actions to the end that men may find him worthy of their confidence and love. Reason demands an explanation of life and its environments; he engages in the search for the secrets of nature and of human experience.

The irreligious man takes thought for a part of himself and a part of his environment. His day is without the enrichment that comes from careful reflection on the past and prophetic appropriation of the future. He lives to gratify appetite or a narrow ambition that leaves him a stranger to the thoughts and emotions arising from a disinterested love of truth and delight in human companionship. His idea of art is ignoble. He is interested in politics only as a means of advancing personal ends. In business his creed is that a man should get by power and cunning what he likes; compassion for an unfortunate neighbor is a sign of weakness. He chooses for companions the strong, not that he may by association with them become a good citizen and friend, but that he may become strong as the wolf is strong.

Religion is life. Men who think they are irreligious may have richer, stronger lives than some who pride themselves on their devotion to religious ideals. The man who recognizes all the demands made upon him by his own nature and his surroundings and endeavors to live up to the full measure of his duty is religious. His choices become significant as they lead him or do not lead him into better relations to men and into the depths of his own soul. His idea of God will reflect his life among men. The mean man will have an inadequate conception of God. The generous, reasonable man will worship a holy God to whom all souls are precious. He will discuss the great themes of justice, mercy, and faith. Quarrels over mint, anise, and cummin arise among men who think they are religious and are not.

Lot chose to associate with the wrong kind of people. Rather, he had the wrong motive when he chose his associates. Jesus had for his companions the outcasts and the narrowly religious and virtuous, but he admitted them to his companionship on terms that did not compromise his principles. Lot gave away his principles, if he had any, when he made his choice. Material prosperity, comfort, freedom from anxiety, these seem to have been the attractions that drew him toward Sodom. If John Wesley had gone to Sodom, he would have gone to preach holy living. There would not have been the slightest danger of his forgetting his morals and religion. Paul in Sodom would have called men to repentance and the life of faith. But Lot was thinking of other things than moral idealism. Of course he did not deliberately choose to throw aside all that he held sacred, but he did not think fine notions of living were to be allowed to get in the way of a good business enterprise.

The sorrow of Lot is that of a man who lives with base and sordid men and who feels himself being brought down to their level, and sees his children growing up to be like these same men and who yet cannot quite throw aside the conscience he acquired by association with a noble man. Lot did not become entirely base. The deeds of his neighbors were a trial to him. He doubtless hated the violence and crime that abounded in his city. Nevertheless, he knew that he had never done anything to improve the condition of his city. He is like thousands of men living today. They move where business calls them but they do not become known as advocates of civic righteousness. They are timid when moral questions are raised. They say to the agitator that he must not disturb sinners whose profits come from vice and from perverted human nature. The passion for righteousness is not in them. They are grieved when their children fall into sin but they have nothing in their own lives that is powerful to hold a child in the way of virtue. [Midweek Service, April 23. Mr. Kershner and Baptism Again

Upon reading certain recent utterances on baptism by President F. D. Kershner in the Christian Standard our editorial soul leaped to greet him as a fair and logical-minded writer who saw the issue plainly and would face it frankly in a discussion that would clear the air and bring substantial gain to the thought-life and practice of the Disciples of Christ.

Three points fundamental to our current problem were stated with unequivocal clearness and emphasis by Mr. Kershner. He declared:

1. That baptism does not mean immerse, but "a great deal more."
2. That baptism is a rite rather than a physical act.
3. That the members of other churches (no exception being made of unimmersed members) are "certainly and infallibly" members of the Church of Christ.

Upon these three presuppositions The Christian Century has found the minds of Disciple ministers and editors confused and uncertain. They had been indoctrinated with the idea that "baptize" in the New Testament means "immerse" or its equivalent. They had never become accustomed to regard baptism as a rite, a ritualistic thing, having its analogy and interpretation in the common ceremonies and rites to which mankind is accustomed. And it is only recently that a clean-cut and unqualified acknowledgment of the complete Christian status of unimmersed Presbyterians, Methodists and other such religious persons has begun to be made.

The timidity and evasion with which a succession of disputants have retreated from the discussion when they were brought face to face with the implications of these three theses had filled us with dismay. But in Mr. Kershner's appearance hope revived. It seemed that there had at last come forward one who would either walk bravely to his logical destruction or send to their destruction those who advocate the practice of a wider fellowship in our churches and the reformation of our doctrinal teaching on baptism.

But the last issue of the Christian Standard sets back our reviving hope. Mr. Kershner, perhaps fearful lest the Standard readers shall think the department for many years headed by the late Professor McGarvey has fallen into the hands of a "progressive," entirely evades the issues raised in our friendly review of his recent brochure on baptism and devotes his page to imputing to the Christian Century a view it does not hold and demolishing that!

It is no wish of ours to harry Mr. Kershner by calling attention again to the diametrical contradiction between his numerous statements in the book to the effect that baptizo may be adequately translated "immerse" and his statement in the Christian Standard that it cannot be so translated. Our esteemed friend has already been made aware of the heretical character of his newspaper utterance by the correspondence he has received in sharp criticism of it. These criticisms, he says, would fill many pages of the Christian Standard. We note that a newspaper of the reactionary wing of the Disciples devotes a two page editorial to it and expresses gaping wonder that an organ so sound as the Standard would even allow space for its contributing editor to suggest that the time-worn linguistic argument for the immersion dogma is invalid.

But Mr. Kershner's unconcerned dismissal of the parallel columns in which we set out his self-contradiction introduces a brand new distinction and his explanation calls for just a word. Let us recall one statement from each of the parallel columns:

In the book he says, "Baptism [in the New Testament] can always be translated 'submerge' without doing violence to its context."

In the Standard he says, "To render the New Testament baptizo into English as 'immerse' with the implication that the last-named word is a complete equivalent is a very decided error."

Now Mr. Kershner's explanation is that in the newspaper he was referring to the "action of the ordinance" while in the book he was referring to the ordinance itself. The subtlety of this distinction is too fine to detain us.

We tarry only to say two things: first, to suggest that it is difficult to conceive what the ordinance itself is if it is something other than its action or function; secondly, that Mr. Kershner gave no hint either in his book or his newspaper article that he had such a distinction in his mind; and thirdly, that the question is not what was in the mind of Mr. Kershner, but what was in the mind of Jesus and of Simon Peter when they used the word "baptize." When Jesus says, "Make disciples, baptizing them," he had in mind either the ordinance of baptism or "the action of the ordinance." If he had the ordinance in mind Mr. Kershner's statement in his book that "baptism can always be translated 'submerge' without doing violence to its context" is manifestly erroneous. But if our Lord had "the action of the ordinance" in mind Mr. Kershner's statement in the Standard that "to render the New Testament word baptizo into English as 'immerse' with the implication that the last-named word is a complete equivalent is a very decided error" is itself a manifest error.

No, Mr. Kershner, you are caught in the net of your own growing ideas on the baptism question. Your later utterance is the truer utterance. When you wrote your otherwise admirable brochure on baptism you did not see clearly what you later so clearly expressed in the Christian Standard. It is no more a humiliation to have found a new idea on the baptism question than on any other question. Our only regret is that your little book should continue in this late day to give circulation to the stupid linguistic error which has fixed a wooden and mechanical doctrine upon us.

There are two totally wrong constructions put by Mr. Kershner upon the statements of our editorial. He interprets us as saying that he approves the practice of receiving the unimmersed into Disciples' churches, and makes a long quotation from himself to prove that he does not approve their reception. This is inexcusable. The Christian Century did not say that Mr. Kershner favored receiving the unimmersed. We said that the admission by him that "it is certainly and infallibly true that Christian union demands our recognition of the validity of other churches' membership" will make it "pretty hard" for him "to give a good reason" for not receiving other churches' members into our congregations. We suggested that the logic of his emphatic utterance led to and justified receiving unimmersed Christians; but that is a very different matter from quoting him as explicitly in favor of doing so.

Mr. Kershner would greatly edify his brethren if he would answer this question:

On what authority can a church of Christ, consistently with its plea for Christian unity and its purpose to practice Christian unity, refuse to receive into its membership any person whom Christ has already "certainly and infallibly" received as a member of His Church?

Much the strangest portion of Mr. Kershner's article, however, is its major portion in which he devotes himself to a preachment on the danger of doing away with forms in religion. And—would any reader of The Christian Century believe it?—he finds his text for this homily in this paper's teaching on baptism! Referring to its editor, he says:

"He frankly acknowledges that the form of baptism is, with him, not even a part of the ordinance, but, to use his own expression, is the means of carrying out the meaning of the rite.' Baptism is thus separated entirely from immersion."

Again Mr. Kershner speaks of the "Chicago group"—whoever that may be, but evidently intended to include the editors of The Christian Century—as those "who read all external expression out of the ordinance and make it a hazy and inchoate idea."

Over against this "hazy and inchoate idea" of baptism Mr. Kershner puts the legalist's view which "takes all the spiritual and moral content out of the ordinance and reduces it to the empty form of a purely physical action." Then he expatiates on the "danger of extremes" and pleads for a via media. This will amuse our readers who have become acquainted with the whole, rounded, balanced, common-sense view of baptism which this paper advocates.

That the editor "frankly acknowledges that the form of baptism is not a part of the ordinance" as Mr. Kershner represents us, is the precise opposite of the truth. The Christian Century believes and teaches, and has never taught a syllable to the contrary, that baptism cannot be performed without a physical act or form. We believe and teach that the physical act is a part of the total baptismal act. No statement of ours can be quoted to give warrant to the silly reasoning Mr. Kershner imputes to us. What we object to is the immersionist habit of defining baptism in terms of the physical act by which it is administered. We insist upon defining it in terms of the spiritual, the moral, act which it involves. We insist that the essence of baptism is the spiritual act of conferring and accepting membership in the Church of Christ. We insist that the physical act is not of the essence of baptism but is incidental—indispensable, but still incidental—and accessory. The physical act—immersion or sprinkling—is the means by which the meaning—the essential purpose and intention—of the act of baptism is carried out.

We agree with Mr. Kershner's definition of baptism: it is the initiatory rite into the Church of Christ. It is not something that precedes becoming a member of the Church; it does not accompany the act of becoming a member; nor is it something that can be observed after becoming a member, as the Baptist denomination holds. It is the very act of becoming a member. Mr. Kershner calls it a rite. With that we agree. Baptism is the ritual of becoming a Christian. We insist that becoming a Christian is a ritualistic thing, just like becoming a President is a ritualistic thing, or becoming a husband is a ritualistic thing, or becoming a Mason is a ritualistic thing. Baptism is precisely analogous to other social forms—marriage, or inauguration, or initiation into a lodge. It is the act of initiating a properly qualified person into the body of Christ. Christ has commissioned his Church itself to perform that act. He did not commission his Church to practice immersion. It makes Jesus talk nonsense to put such a commission into his mouth. He authorized his Church to initiate into its organic community those who became disciples through its ministry. In the nature of the case the Church cannot perform that initiation without the use of some physical sign or form.

When, therefore, Mr. Kershner represents us as saying that "baptism can exist without its formal expression" or that we "would isolate the moral and spiritual content of baptism and render it valueless by denying the necessity of any formal expression," he misrepresents us.

When he represents us as saying that "baptism is something distinct from immersion" he does not misrepresent us, although if we were choosing the words we should prefer another in place of "distinct." But in so representing us Mr. Kershner puts us in the same class as himself. He also believes baptism is not only "a great deal more than" immersion but is performed without immersion. In our review of his book appeared a paragraph to which Mr. Kershner makes no allusion in his reply. We repeat its substance here:

Mr. Kershner gladly concedes that the unimmersed Episcopalians to whom he was addressing his argument are members of the Church of Christ—of both the "visible" and "invisible" Church. They became members of the Church by submitting to its initiatory rite: that is, in the terms of Mr. Kershner's own definition of baptism, they were baptized. They were buried with their Lord by their initiation into his Church. They arose as members of his Body to walk the new life. No doubt to Mr. Kershner's mind they were irregularly initiated, but he heartily concedes that their initiation was not invalid.

To Mr. Kershner, then, immersion is not essential to the initiatory rite. Baptism may be performed by some other form or action (to use his own term) than immersion.

Our gratitude to the Standard's talented contributing editor for introducing to the constituency of that paper a brand new point of view on baptism, and our appreciation of his courage in facing the bristling criticisms which his statements have already called forth, almost inhibit the publication of the foregoing. But we think we see with perfect clearness where the splendid position he has already taken is bound to lead him, and in order to facilitate and encourage his progress we wish to remove the misapprehensions of our own position which his courteous articles disclosed.

A Rare Compliment to Missionary Head

President Woodrow Wilson has been bringing every possible pressure to bear on Dr. John R. Mott to become the new minister to China. So far he has failed. Dr. Mott evidently will not leave his important work as chairman of the Continuation Committee of the Edinburgh Conference (1910); his herculean labors as head of the Student Volunteer Association; and his self-sacrificing labors as International Secretary of the Young Men's Christian Association, for the powerful and politically strategic position of Uncle Sam's representative to the Republic of China. While President Wilson has failed on Dr. Mott, yet he has more than ever intrenched himself in the hearts of Christians by paying so rare a compliment to Christian missions as is involved in the offer to this faithful advocate of that cause.

Religious City Planning

What is known as "city planning" has come to be recognized as a standard ideal in all municipal improvement and progress. The idea of a "city plan" is simply to combine beauty and utility, pleasure and efficiency in city topography, relating and readjusting the city map section by section, to take the place of the present haphazard developments of city building. Some of this idea apparently is at the bottom of the program of the City Evangelization Union of the Methodist Episcopal Church in the city of St. Louis. The idea is not called city planning, but a "forward movement," but at the bottom the idea is strictly the same, and we report it for its worth in the corporate minds of all city missionary organizations.

In St. Louis there are seventeen white Baptist churches, sixteen

Congregationalist, eleven Disciples, thirty-eight Presbyterian, twenty-seven Episcopalian and a total of fifty-four Methodist of all sorts and conditions, while the Roman Catholics lead with seventy-eight churches. And yet in the face of all this Christian force, probably fifty-two per cent of the population of St. Louis never enter a church door. Truly, in the face of such facts, nothing short of what we might call religious city planning can be considered at all. The Northern Methodists heretofore had a centralization policy at work in St. Louis, that is centralizing the strength of its constituency in two or three, possibly four, strong church centers. Naturally, in the hurly-burly of religious development in St. Louis, such a policy proved antiquated in a relatively short period. What was needed was simply a "city plan" in religious work. The need brought out the man. He is the District Elder, Dr. William T Wright. First of all, Doctor Wright captured the imagination of the business men of his religious district. Some of these business men knew all about the "city plan" idea in their club discussions, but Dr. Wright evidently showed them that the "city plan" idea must be carried out in religion as well as in civics. Finally, a program was projected. The program has taken the form of a campaign for $250,000, by means of which the city churches of the Methodist Episcopal Church in St. Louis will be relocated in some instances, strengthened in others and made efficient centers of larger parochial usefulness, and in still other instances pushed out into the advance columns of population. Colonization will take the place of centralization. We congratulate these brethren of St. Louis, and may it prove a wholesome lesson to other city associations for the promotion of the Gospel.

A Plucky Religious Weekly

The Religious Telescope is the United Brethren weekly publication issued from Dayton, O. On March 24 The Religious Telescope, as usual, had gone to press. Suddenly, Dayton, O., was under the raging waters. A cloudburst precipitated the deluge. The levees of Dayton proved eight feet too low, and the Miami River simply buried the ill-fated city as its torrents rushed over the levees. The United Brethren publishing house suffered with the rest. As remarked, The Religious Telescope went to press on the afternoon of March 24. Six days later, March 30, The Telescope was still on the press, but under not less than seven feet of flood waters. The building has stood the strain, however. But the actual loss of the United Brethren Publishing House will be between $125,000 and $150,000.

W. R. Funk, agent of the denominational publishing house, was on the job. The Methodist Book Concern by wire and by letter placed their plant at his disposal. So did the United Evangelical Publishing House at Harrisburg, Pa. On April 2 a two-page edition of The Religious Telescope was in the mails, and by April 8 a copy fell into our hands. Nothing short of pluck is what we think of this performance. Doctor Funk writes:

"As to our employees: They are loyal. As I write they are cleaning up downstairs; without a murmur of complaint they have gone into the mud and slush and have been eating a cold lunch each day in order to bring back this institution to its former strength and power. We are pumping water from the basement, with the hope of starting up work within the next few days. With electricity furnished us by the Dayton Lighting Company tonight, we hope to print the Religious Telescope tomorrow and mail it as soon as the government will take it as second-class matter."

Our sympathy, our admiration, our best wishes go out to these brethren, and may our Heavenly Father bless them in every good work.

The Methodists Investigating

The New Jersey Methodist Episcopal Conference is on the heresy-hunt. Bishop Berry, who presided over the conference on March 6, officially appointed a committee to make a searching review of the books and publications gotten out by the Methodist Book Concern. The appointment follows a charge that the literature of this concern is tainted with a "liberalistic and rationalistic tendency." Dr. Howard P. Sloan, a member of this committee, stated to the Associated Press that it would take about a year to complete the investigation. He is reported to have said: "It is our purpose to take particular passages that seem to violate our teachings and cite them." Some have thought that in this day of grace the Index, that mediæval relic of theological sterility, was confined to the Vatican at Rome, but lo! the Methodists of New Jersey propose to have a nice little Index of their own!

Congregational Board of Ministerial Relief

The Congregational Board of Ministerial Relief at its twenty-seventh annual meeting in New York City recently, through its treasurer, announced the total of $108,260.88 as the recorded net receipts for the year of 1912 from all sources. These receipts included donations from churches, individuals, Sunday-schools, women's and young people's societies, associations and conferences, legacies, conditional gifts and interest. The receipts were larger and more churches contributed in 1912 than in any previous year, though the total amount was $362.20 less than the churches gave in 1911. There was added to the endowment fund $72,488.75 and $26,841.73 was paid to 173 families. Fourteen pensioners died during 1912. Appropriations for 1913 amounting to over $25,000 were voted to 156 families, representing over 300 dependent persons, which is an average of about $160 to each family. Heretofore the assets of the society have been reported on the basis of par value. The Board has adopted, however, the method of reporting the securities at their book value. On this basis, the endowment fund on Jan. 1, 1913, amounted to $280,933.75, with a cash balance in all funds of $1,208.53. In addition to this, the Board owns real estate at an estimated value of $1,428. The average income from investments for the year 1912 was about 4¼ per cent. The Christmas fund for 1912 amounted to something over $1,800, and enabled the Board to remember each family on its roll with a check of from five to twenty-five dollars.

Our Readers' Opinions

ANGLO-AMERICAN PEACE AT TORONTO.

Editors Christian Century: Together with others who attended the Louisville convention, I was deeply disappointed that there was no arrangement made for a good old English tea fight. There are many in our ministry who have at one time and another been called to the work in England, and have an irrepressible affection for the mother country, knowing, spite of her provincialism and angularity and insularity, and her inability to appreciate the fine points of our great plea, that she is mighty of vision, gracious in real hospitality, and loyal in supreme friendships. I hope I am as good or even a better American because I learned to appreciate and love old England during my pastorates there. I speak for others who bear like testimony.

All through the summer the cities around the great lakes are trying to remember what great things Oliver Hazard Perry did. Most of them first refreshed their memories at the fount of the public library. The Federal Government, Rhode Island, Kentucky, Ohio, Illinois, Wisconsin, and all the grateful commonwealths are vying in a carefully engineered burst of patriotism, led very largely by naval and military experts who ought to know patriotism when they see it. All hail to the hero, however advancing! All hail to the gospel of true nationalism! But because I appreciate Perry, I can better admire Nelson. And because I love America and felicitate her on the acquisition of the Northwest, I can better regard Britain, and congratulate her on the loss of Chicago. And because of heroism and patriotism, not riot mad, nor suppressed, but elevated and serene, I would cry hail, hail, hail! and also reign, reign, reign! to the century of peace and brotherhood just accomplished.

We wish no benevolent assimilation of Canada. We are glad that the benign Creator did not make everybody just like us. We deplore too, any attempt to justify, to amplify, or to belittle our plea as indigenous in and peculiar to America, and thereby democratic, and true, and sacro-sanct beyond the dreams of kingdoms. I rejoice that we are just once to meet beyond the borders of nationality, at Toronto. May I humbly suggest: That special invitations be sent to our brethren in Britain and in Australia and New Zealand to celebrate with us a century of peace, and pledge ourselves anew to the peace of the spiritual heritage; that special place be made on our program for a recognition of Anglo-Saxon brotherhood, through representatives from Scotland, Ireland, England, Wales and the Colonies; that urgent invitation be made to all who once lived in the old land, or traveled through, to attend in numbers with special gratitude to the Almighty for our common, wondrous possessions; that a social meeting be arranged leisurely, edible, joyous, in which we may renew our troth and plight our faith to the future of the Anglo-American ideal and aspiration.

After the consideration of these amendments, the following preamble and resolution was passed:

Whereas, The undersigned, meeting in informal and unofficial conference upon the subject of church union, have received the text of a proposed agreement between the Church of England in Australia and Tasmania, and the General Assembly of the Presbyterian Church in Australia; and a letter from the archbishop of Melbourne regarding it; be it

Resolved: That, without committing themselves individually to all the resolutions, yet rejoicing in and welcoming such a definite effort to bring about reunion between these portions of the Church of Christ, they express their sympathy with the general purpose of this movement, and the hope that a similar effort may receive the careful consideration of the different communions of this country.

Mrs. Harrison will be glad to receive communications from any of her readers offering suggestions concerning woman's welfare, criticisms of articles or inquiries concerning any matters relevant to her department. She should be addressed directly at 530 Elm Tree Lane, Lexington, Ky.

THE CHILD IN LITERATURE

William Wordsworth may be truly called a prophet of childhood. He published his "Lyrical Ballads," which contain the first of his simple and lovely pictures of child life, about the beginning of the past century, but they attracted but little notice. The text of these poems, and later of his immortal "Ode to Immortality" was the line. "The child is father of the man;" and while it was pronounced puerile then, we now accept it as one of the deep truths of our common human nature.

We have in these ballads pictures of the child and nature—the child chasing a butterfly, finding a vision of delight in a sparrow's nest, musing over a strawberry plant. Who can forget those lovely lines where he tells of nature claiming one of his little ones!

"Three years she grew in sun and shower,
Then Nature said, 'A lovelier flower
On earth was never sown;
This child I to myself will take' . . . .
'The floating clouds shall lend their state to her;
The stars of midnight shall be dear to her;
And hers shall be the breathing balm,
And hers the silence and the calm,
Of mute, insensate things.'"

And these haunting lines,

"Beauty, born of murmuring sound,
Shall pass into her face."

A number of the ballads tell of the tender tie between the child and the animal world. The religious instinct in a child's heart is shown in the "Tale of the Norman Boy." the compensations that come to the forlorn and afflicted in "The Idiot Boy," and "The Blind Highland Boy:"

"For God took pity on the boy,
And was his friend, and gave him joy,
Of which we nothing know."

He tells of the blight of poverty on a young heart in the grief of the little girl at the loss of her ragged cloak. The note of childhood's wrongs, however, is not often found in Wordsworth—though one of the most impressive passages in the Excursion, is an indignant protest against the injustice done to the factory child.

Childhood Reveals Divine.

He saw in childhood, as he saw in nature, something more than outward beauty and sweetness and charm—he saw in it, a revelation of the divine. I truly believe he was the first who really grasped the meaning of those words: "Whosoever receiveth one such child in my name receiveth me; and whosoever receiveth me, receiveth not me, but Him that sent me."

To receive the child is to receive Christ; to receive Christ is to receive God; to receive the child then, is to receive God. In the child we have the divine image before it has been stained and blighted by sin. This vision of the divine in childhood, Wordsworth has bequeathed to us in lines of undying beauty, and if he had written nothing else, he would deserve to be enthroned in our hearts as a poet of poets.

In his lovely sonnet on "Evening," he tells of his impressions of the dying day, and then says of the little daughter who was his companion:

"Dear child! dear girl, that walkest with me here,
If thou appear untouched by solemn thought,
Thy nature is not, therefore, less divine.
Thou liest in Abraham's bosom all the year,
And worship'st at the Temple's inner shrine,
God being with thee, when we knew it not."

After describing a walk with his little son, he says,

"O dearest, dearest boy! my heart
For better love would seldom yearn,
Could I but teach the hundredth part
Of what from thee I learn."

In another place, he speaks, "Of children, who are privileged to hold divine communion."

The Child and Immortality.

But it is when he looks in the child's heart, and sees there something that tells him we are immortal beings, that he strikes his highest note. He gives a child's thought of death in the poem,

"A little child,
That lightly draws its breath,
And feels its life in every limb—
What should it know of death!"

And the simple story, where the brother and sister, who were buried in the churchyard, were as much a part of the home circle to the little maid, as those who were away at work, and away at sea. Death to her was but separation for a while.

"And still
The little maid would have her will,
And said, 'Nay, we are seven.'"

This quaint story is but telling in a low key, what his noble Ode to Immortality voices with fulness and power:

"Our birth is but a sleep, and a forgetting:
The soul that rises with us, our life's star,
Hath elsewhere had its setting,
And cometh from afar.
Not in entire forgetfulness,
And not in utter nakedness,
But trailing clouds of glory, do we come
From God, who is our home.
Heaven lies about us in our infancy!"

And he goes on to tell,

"How earth, the homely nurse,
Doth all she can to make her foster child."
"Forget the glories he hath known,
And that imperial palace, whence he came."

And then,

"How shades of the prison house begin to close Upon the growing boy,"

But he still beholds the light,
The youth continues to be Nature's priest,
"And by the vision splendid,
Is on his way attended,"

But the man, alas!

"Perceives it die away,
And fade into the light of common day."

But though the man is thus bereft, there still come to him "shadowy recollections," which naught can utterly abolish or destroy.

"Hence, in a season of calm weather,
Though inland far we be,
Our souls have sight of that immortal sea,
Which brought us hither;
Can in a moment travel thither,
And see the children sport upon the shore,
And see the mighty waters rolling evermore."

With such a "vision splendid" as this, of the child coming from God, trailing its clouds of glory, with vague voices speaking to it of its immortal origin—it is hard to descend from such a pinnacle to the practical and commonplace; but such we must do, if we follow this quest of the child in modern literature. Wordsworth struck the first note, and the highest note, but it was only the beginning of a rich and varied symphony. I said his viewpoint was not that of the wrongs of childhood, but there arose in his day champions of the child, whose dominant note was the exposing and righting of those wrongs.

—The new college for women that is being erected at New London, Conn., will give more attention to technical training than most colleges of the kind, although it will go hand in hand with culture training. Prof. Frederick H. Sykes, who is to be at the head of the institution, has made a study of vocational training in Europe.

—One thousand girls employed in the Pittsburg Iron Mills went on a strike for more wages recently. "We want to live—and be good," is the message the girls sent to the mill owners. This plea concludes the requests the girls make for an increase of two cents a thousand on threading bolts. The girls say few of them make more than $4.50 a week and some only twenty-eight cents a day. This, they say, is not enough to enable a girl to live decently.

—Guenther Prince von Schoenburg Waldenburg, who is in this country on a hunting trip, says that Carman Sylva is "the greatest woman, the greatest genius, the world has ever known." He admires her work immensely and says that the greatest pleasure of his life has been his acquaintance with her.

—The Swedish authorities have furnished street car conductors with rubber hatpin protectors, which are sold for a half penny, and any woman entering the car with her hatpin protruding will be obliged to buy a protector. Quite young, she has made her own way as a student in astronomy. Miss Chardon undertook to investigate the relative positions of the sun and Venus and succeeded in showing that all calculations were slightly in error. This meant a slight difference in the time of Paris, and on the strength of her discovery all the clocks of Paris were altered.

—Harriet Tubman Davis, who was born in slavery and who before the civil war escorted 300 slaves to freedom by her "underground railroad," died recently in Auburn, N. Rewards of $40,000 by southern planters and $12,000 by the State of Maryland were offered for her capture in the '50s, but she was never caught. She served as scout, nurse and spy in the Union Army.

Down North on the Labrador

The Great Ministry of Dr. Grenfell in the Land of Icebergs

By Grace Dickerson

"Down North on the Labrador." This expression has come to have a familiar sound and to suggest something quite different from that which it used to mean. It no longer calls up merely the picture of frozen bays and icebergs, of snowfields and loneliness; it no longer suggests only a region of sunless winters and bleak summers, of vast uninhabited tracts and huddled, disease-infected hamlets. Doctor Grenfell has changed all our associations. Today when we say "down north on the Labrador," we do not think first of all about frozen bays and icebergs—we think of the hospital ship "Strathcona" which braves those icy waters in order to carry relief and health to those afar; we cannot picture to ourselves the vast fields of snow without instantly seeing the dog-sledge which over the snow carries on the same work during the long winter. We cannot think of the huddled fisherfolk in their poverty and disease without remembering the four hospitals which serve as health-centers along that desolate coast; we think no longer of its desolation and loneliness without being grateful for the warmth and sunshine shed abroad throughout this region by human love and friendliness.

It was only twenty years ago that Dr. Wilfred T. Grenfell came to Labrador as representative of the International Mission to Deep Sea Fishermen, yet in that time he has made a new earth and a new life for the people of the Labrador and Newfoundland coasts. When we read of his daring adventures as captain of the ship, of his hairbreadth escapes from storms and rocks and icebergs, of his heroic struggles as physician against disease, of his dauntlessness everywhere by land and sea, we feel that his personality has transcended this conventional, ease-loving modern life and that we are face to face with an old-time hero. And, as Carlyle says, we are all born believers in heroes. That is—all but Doctor Grenfell. He discounts all the hero-worship, and when he modestly tells his thrilling tale he says he does these things because he likes them—because he would rather do them than do any other things. But we cannot find that his whole-hearted enthusiasm for the life he leads—even for its privations and dangers—makes him any less the hero.

Perhaps it was Norman Duncan who gave us our first vivid conception of life on the Labrador, of its dreary, monotonous winters, its pinching poverty everywhere, breeding sullenness and disease, of its ignorance, its helplessness and its hopelessness. Three hundred thousand persons live in Newfoundland and Labrador, and 200,000 of them—men, women and children—are engaged in catching fish. What does it mean? It means that the livelihood of the entire population, practically, depends from year to year on the season's "catch." To lose the "catch," to have bad luck, sometimes to lose even the wrecked boat—what did that mean? It meant pretty nearly starvation for the unlucky family. They must trust to the uncertainties of trapping and hunting (provided they were not too poor to have traps and guns) in order to subsist at all. For the catch was probably mortgaged for supplies at the trader's store and credit was at an end. And the result? Tuberculosis or some form of disease which comes as the fruit of chronic semi-starvation, with the accompanying dull hopelessness. The people almost never saw cash, and in their exchanges with the trader they were always squeezed. The trader said the men were poor because they did not catch enough to support themselves. Doctor Grenfell discovered that they got enough to support at least thirty traders. These were the conditions which gave Doctor Grenfell texts for some of his most eloquent sermons, and helped him become one of the most versatile of preachers. As he faced these conditions he realized that the gospel message must be spelled out in tangible forms if it were to be a veritable message of cheer and glad tidings. "I am come that they might have life and that they might have it more abundantly" is a wonderful text, but it has never seemed more wonderful in modern times than as Doctor Grenfell has given it practical interpretation along the Labrador Coast. He has literally given life to a people who knew only what we should term a dull existence and he has made it "more abundant."

From the first Doctor Grenfell found inspiration in the people themselves for in spite of untoward conditions there was in them self-respect, and decency, and a love of the real and the true. His physical courage first opened the way into the hearts of these hardy men of the sea. When they saw the Doctor braving seas and storms which made them quail, in order to bring help to the suffering, they were touched into admiration and love. His fame spread abroad, and when his ship could follow the fleet on its summer cruise to the North, small boats swarmed around it in which were brought the sick and crippled from far and near. The new hospital ship, the "Strathcona," the pride of the Doctor's heart, makes this work doubly effective.

And how its coming is looked for each summer in those isolated regions! The children hail it as the bringer of all good things. To some it has meant the bringing of health for sickness; to some straight legs and strengthened backs; to all it has meant a freer, happier child-life and a chance to learn. Yes, many things have followed in the wake of the "Strathcona." The school is one of them and by it Doctor Grenfell preaches wonderfully effective sermons. What it all means to the youngsters is expressed in one teacher's description of the ship's arrival at St. Anthony's Harbor on the Newfoundland Coast:

"The school session opened as usual. The children went quietly to work. One class was deep in thought over arithmetic problems, another busy writing letters to children in the 'States' (that fabulous land where every one is rich and all is bliss), when a strange, shrill whistle broke the stillness.

"'Tis the "Strathcona," Miss,' cried one boy springing to his feet in excitement.

"'The Strathcona, the Strathcona!' came joyfully echoing from throats all over the room. Lessons, law and order were forgotten. With one accord the schoolroom was vacated and positions were sought at the windows in the upper story of the building where we could see our little hospital ship rounding Fishing Point Head and making entrance to St. Anthony Harbor.

"While cannons were booming a 'welcome home' from the shore, and flags were being hoisted at mission headquarters, the children who are the hope of years to come on these bleak shores were marshaled into some semblance of order. Without breaking ranks they broke into a run, waving the 'Red Ensigns' they carried. Such enthusiasm was not to be restrained in a land where stolidity prevails.

"'Thank you,' he said when the shouting and the tumult ceased. 'It's good to be at home and see you all again. How are you, Noah? I'm glad to see you looking so well. Edward, how tall you've grown! Can that be Jimmie? Where's Will? And here's Bertie with that selfsame twinkle in his eye.' With a handshake and a word of greeting for each he passed on, leaving the blessing of his presence visible on their pleased faces for the rest of that day."

Reindeer Feeding Ground in Labrador.

Another of Doctor Grenfell's sermons is the coöperative store by means of which the people are freed from the old system of trading that victimized and kept them forever poor. Eight of these stores are now started at prominent places along the Labrador and Newfoundland coasts. Sometimes combined with them are dispensaries, and at one center coöperative sawmills have been built which give employment to many during the long winters. There have been other sermons of this same practical type—a small schooner-building yard, an industrial room where the women weave home-spun, a shop where men of mechanical skill find employ during the winter. a herd of reindeer which now numbers a thousand, circulating libraries, a children's home and a school.

While Doctor Grenfell is primarily the preacher and physician and knows how to strike at the roots of evil and of disease—his is a gospel of prevention rather than of cure. The hospitals which he has succeeded in building at four points (the one farthest north being open only in summer) might better be called health centers, so much do they accomplish in teaching hygiene and in preventing disease. Meantime they are taxed to their utmost capacity—the little hospital at Indian Harbor, opened each summer for the benefit of the fishing fleet, was so overcrowded that the convalescent patients were some of them put out in the harbor on board the steamer "Yale."

Doctor Grenfell has three surgeons as colleagues and has attracted a number of other able helpers some of whom—surgeons and specialists—leave their own lucrative work during the weeks of summer to have a share in bettering the lot of the needy ones down on the Labrador. Doctor Paddon, of London, has added a new line of activity to his hospital work at Indian Harbor by organizing social gatherings for the native settlers and work for the fishermen of the large fleet in the harbor. The wireless system now makes relief work in the remoter parts much more effective. The Marconi man, a Newfoundlander, is rated a first-class operator, and is also a medical student and enthusiastic mission worker, who, although he is working his way, has volunteered his services as operator in order that the mission may afford to keep the apparatus. Doctor Grenfell's latest log says: "Last week we received a message, 'Come if you can at once, a fisherman here is dying;' we were able to get out to the island, a distance of over fifty miles. We found a poor fellow who had been struck down with paralysis in his boat. We were able to take him to Battle Harbor Hospital, where already he has made sufficient recovery to be able to feed and help himself. This week a wireless strayed into our deck cabin—'Lighthouse keeper Belle Isle seriously ill; come at once if you can.' Again the little 'Strathcona' was promptly dispatched. The poor fellow, a Frenchman and the father of eight young children, was lowered down into the boat on a huge stretcher made from a ladder and canvas. He was swung out by the lever arm, as it was far too rough to land in a boat. We then saluted the island and took our man to St. Anthony Hospital where he is doing well under the care of Doctor Little." One young lady for several years has taken the long journey north in order to carry on a kindergarten and to introduce into the barren, joyless lives of many children the songs and games and stories which more fortunate youngsters enjoy.

One of the Doctor's best gifts to the children of the Labrador is—Christmas. Until his coming they knew nothing of it and most of their elders knew not the reason for keeping it. Few of the children ever possessed a toy or a doll or picture book. Now, during the winter, sixteen Christmas celebrations with trees and gifts are held at various points along the coast—sometimes the most desired present is a pair of boots, or a shirt, or a barrel of flour, but for the children there are, besides useful articles, toys and books and the things they love best. But even with sixteen Christmases the Doctor is not satisfied! He must penetrate to the regions more remote. Usually it is apropos of his medical work that he carries Christmas thither. The Komatik or sled, known as "The Lend a Hand," is brought out, the dogs are harnessed, the medicine chest and bag of supplies are securely packed, some warm things and some delicacies perhaps for the sick are added and—yes, there is room—a pack of toys for the children. Off he starts on his cold journey and at its end he finds the little settlement which has sent for his help. After relieving the patients, the Doctor calls into the largest room fourteen people for a Christmas service. None can read or write, none knows that it is Christmas nor the meaning of that day. But after the Doctor's visit of helpfulness and healing, after his message of hope and cheer, not a soul in that small hamlet can ever forget, as long as he lives, the true meaning of Christmas and of the gift "that can always be given but can never be purchased."

The Struggle

Say not the struggle nought availeth,
The labor and the wounds are vain.
The enemy faints not, nor faileth,
And as things have been, things remain.

For while the tired waves, vainly breaking,
Seem here no painful inch to gain,
Far back, through creeks and inlets making,
Come silent, flooding in, the main.

And not by eastern windows only,
When daylight comes, comes in the light;
In front, the sun climbs slow, how slowly!
But westward, look! the land is bright.

—A. H. Clough.

Flying Days

Our overcoats soon we may pawn, the grass soon will grow on the lawn; for the days rustle past, and the winter can't last, and the spring will be with us anon. The spring, with its sunshine and showers! The spring, with its green shady bowers! With its thrushes and wrens and its fat clucking hens, and its long-legged calves and its flowers! Oh, gee! but the seasons whiz by! They come and are gone like a sigh; they knock at our door and come back never more, and leave us gray hairs as they fly. As older we grow and more sere, the swifter the seasons appear; like fugitives chased they're increasing their haste, so anxious to score a new year. They come with a whoop and a bound, we lose them as soon as they're found; they circle and rip, and go zippety-zip, like kids on a merry-go-round.

Hospital Ship "Strathcona."

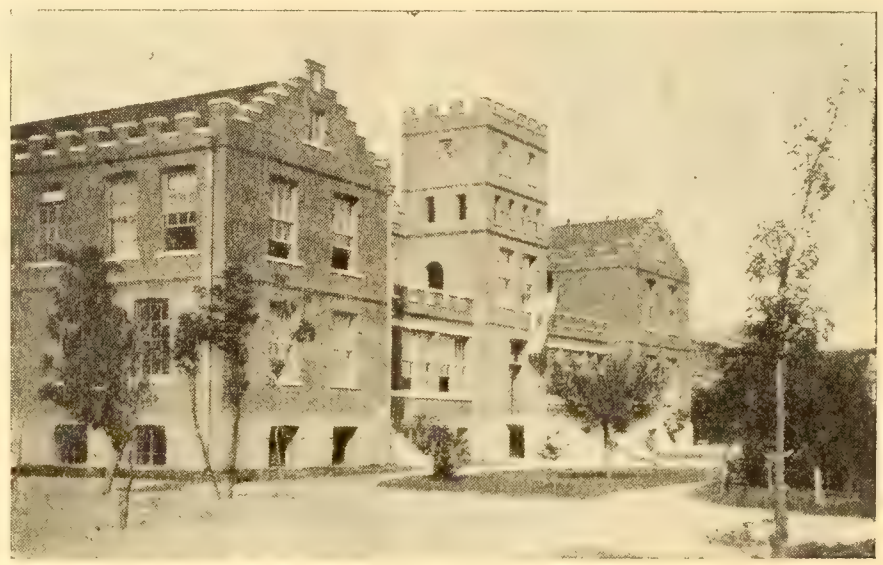
This life is so woundily brief. We reap, and are binding the sheaf, when old Death comes along with his quitting-time gong, and hands us a package of grief. We sow and we reap and we spin and toil with a scowl or a grin; our oats and our rye may be ripe when we die, and the lawyers will gather them in. But, hoots! It is all for the best, the world is a bully old jest; we'll gambol and joke till the time comes to croak, and go like good sports to our rest. (Copyright 1913, George Matthew Adams.)

DR. WILLETT'S MISSION TOUR

Korea and Japan

It is always the misfortune of any small country to be thrust in between two greater ones. It is sure to be overrun by the armies of both in times of war, and in the end is almost certain to be absorbed by one or the other. So Palestine was placed in remote times between the contending powers of the Euphrates and the Nile, and in the Greek age, between the fierce rivalries of Antioch and Alexandria. So Poland found itself between the grasping politics of Germany and Russia. Palestine was the shuttle-cock in the age-long game of antiquity, and Poland has disappeared. A similar fate has fallen upon Korea.

A glance at the map will show that it lies between China and Japan, with Russia lying in wait on the north, ready for any adventure that will open the road toward either Tokio or Peking. It has been raided by the forces of both its neighbors, as when Hideyoshi led his merciless and inglorious invasion in the seventeenth century, to which witness is still borne by the walls of Seoul. And whenever the restless neighbors have fallen out with each other, Korea has usually been the field of their contention, and has in large degree paid the penalty of the innocent bystander.



Kyang Sin School, Seoul, Korea.

The Koreans are not a fighting people. They are simple in their habits, peaceable in disposition, and utterly unable to protect themselves against the stronger forces outside. The result has been a certain lack of coherence in governmental policies, and of weakness in national and local administration. Progress is not easy in such conditions, and ignorance held the balance of power.

A New Age Dawns.

Into this land of simplicity, unawareness and hesitance, Christianity came and gave the people a new vision of life. Into the hearts of the depressed Koreans was brought a new purpose, and the land began to awaken to a new opportunity. The intellectual interests before were few; now they were multiplied by the message of the Gospel. The people that sat in darkness saw a great light. Into "The Land of the Morning Calm" the dawn of a new age made its silent and happy way.

It was just at that moment that a different and more tragic destiny was preparing for the nation. Japan had begun to dream of a larger empire. She had tested her strength with China and found that she need not fear her big neighbor. More than one of the battles of that war was fought on Korean soil. Since Hideyoshi's day she had not ceased to dream of possessing the Korean peninsula. She needed the land for her increasing population. It would afford her an admirable frontier toward China and Russia. Moreover, the weakness of the native dynasty invited just the kind of friendly and altruistic interference which always has been the delight of ambitious and not too scrupulous nations.

The war with Russia opened still wider the door from Japan into Korea. To the chagrin of the Mikado's court no indemnity followed the victorious termination of the struggle. But it was understood that Japan should have her way in Korea. She lost no time in taking possession. Circumstances favored the plan. The emperor of Korea was a fussy old man, with no administrative ability, and without much influence with his people. He resented the presence of the Japanese who made themselves increasingly officious at his court. A crisis was reached when he sent a deputation to the Hague tribunal asking the interference of the powers and the expulsion of the Japanese. The latter were furious, and by devices not unfamiliar in diplomacy of a certain order, "persuaded" the outraged and protesting monarch to abdicate in favor of his son.

Resistance to Japan.

There was an outburst of national feeling, but Japan was ready with a force that overawed resistance. The act of abdication was couched in language which made the emperor confess his inability to preserve order in his realm, and to hope that the young prince who was to follow him, might, with the "help" of his friend and counsellor, the Emperor of Japan, succeed better in the guidance of the state. The Japanese professed to regret the necessity of the change, and insisted that their position was that of the most disinterested sympathy with a people so badly governed as the Koreans.

The Marquis Ito, one of the ablest of modern Japanese statesmen, was made Resident-General of Korea. The story of his murder by a fanatical Korean revolutionary is one of the sad chapters in modern political history. It was now easy to deal in a more summary fashion with the Korean problem, and the young emperor, in a state paper which is one of the most suggestive in the archives of any nation, acknowledged that he was unable to cope with the difficulties which his position had thrust upon him, and begged his good friend, the Mikado, to relieve him of his embarrassment by taking over the complete control of Korea into his hands.

It is the claim of the Japanese that fictions like these are now and then necessary in the progress of the world. They insist that the Koreans are a people of lower type, incapable of self-government, and far better circumstanced under Japanese control. They believe themselves the chosen of the gods to bring about the desirable reconstruction which Korea needs. This is the plausible apology of all successful invaders from the days when Israel conquered the strongholds of Canaan to the spoliation of the American Indians by the white race.

Meantime they are losing no opportunity of bringing their plan to swift and sure success. They are pouring into the land by the thousand. They have changed the names of the country and most of its cities to conform to the new regime. "Korea" has now disappeared from the Japanese map, and "Cho-sen" has taken its place. You look for "Seoul" on the railroad guide, and after a fruitless search you are informed that "Keijo" is the name of the capital. Similarly Pyeng Yang has become "Heijo," and Chemulpo "Jinsen." Every department is now being reorganized with Japanese administrators. Telegraphs, telephones, waterworks, roadways, steam transportation by land and water, a new currency on the basis of the Japanese banks, and post-offices, all of the most modern sort, are included in the new order.

New System of Education.

A wholly new system of education is being arranged, on lines already tested in the home land. One evening at Dr. Underwood's table I sat beside the Japanese Commissioner of Education for Korea, and he spoke with enthusiasm of the reforms he was projecting in the educational work of the country. Of course this will give employment to an army of Japanese teachers, who will thus be provided with a career by the government. Nor can any one doubt that the importation of the Japanese plan of education into Korea will be a long step in advance. Yet of course it will be the same sort of religionless education which Japan possesses, and which is causing so much concern to the best friends of Japan.

The next morning after the dinner party, I received, with the compliments of my friend of the previous evening, an elaborate and handsomely prepared volume containing the report of the Governor General, Count Tereuchi, on the improvements under way in the country. It was a most interesting document, and was manifestly intended to answer any questions as to the propriety of Japanese control in the peninsula.

This is one side of the shield. On the other side are the charges that Japan has been brutally unjust in its dealings with the Koreans. That phase of the contention which most closely concerns the student of missions, and the sentiment of Americans and foreigners in general, relates to the judicial proceedings brought against certain of the Christian leaders in Korea.

Naturally the murder of the Marquis Ito wrought the feelings of both Koreans and Japanese to a high pitch. The men who were implicated in the plot were brought to trial and punished, some with death and others with imprisonment. However deep the hatred of the Korean people against the Japanese, and no one would deny that it is very deep, it would be a manifest injustice to charge the entire nation with the crime.

But two years ago it was affirmed that a plot had been discovered to assassinate the present Governor General. Many arrests were made. Among them were some of the native leaders in Christian work. Not a particle of evidence was adduced to prove that these men had the remotest connection with a plot, and further, it soon became evident to careful inquirers that the only evidence of a plot at all was elicited from some of the prisoners by torture. It is now known beyond any question that torture was employed, and that the victims promptly denied their testimony when given the opportunity of free and unterrorized speech.

Yet in spite of these facts the accused were condemned to various punishments. Against this unjustifiable procedure they made protest in the form of an appeal to the court to grant a rehearing of the case. At the time of this writing that appeal has been heard, but the decision of the court has not been given. It is the firm conviction of men whose opinion is to be counted above bias that there never was any conspiracy, and that the government's measures were high-handed and unjust to a degree. More than this, they believe that the Japanese administrators committed a grave tactical error when they attempted to rush through to a summary conclusion judgments that now seem groundless in the light of the evidence. This is the more surprising as Japan is exceedingly sensitive to the good opinion of the outer world, and dependent upon it for the success of her further plans.

The Japanese Christian leaders professed themselves skeptical as to the use of torture in the treatment of the prisoners. At the time I met these gentlemen in Tokyo I did not have the fuller evidence which the visit to Korea supplied. The missionaries in Japan said they knew but little of the facts, and hoped the reports would prove to be exaggerated. The missionaries in Korea had much to say, though always in measured words. They know that the rapid advance of Christianity in Korea has given no satisfaction to the Japanese. It is not that the latter are hostile to missions. But they wish to have in their own hands whatever goes on in the peninsula. It is even known that active efforts are being made to propagate in Korea a Congregational propaganda, led by Japanese from the mother land, as a means of counteracting to some extent the present rapid development of Christianity under the leadership of the Presbyterian and Methodist boards. The missionaries regard this not as a religious movement so much as political.

Is Modern Civilization Pagan?

A Challenge of the Assumed Christian Character of Present Day Ideals

By Charles A. Ellwood

EDITORS' NOTE: Of the many stimulating papers read at the Disciples Congress at St. Louis none provoked more intense and more various reactions than the address by Dr Charles A. Ellwood, professor of sociology at the University of Missouri, on the subject of pagan elements in our so-called Christian civilization. Dr. Ellwood's opening remark expressing the hope that no one would charge him with "trying to be sensational" did not reduce a degree the sensational effect produced by his keen, calm and unfearing analysis of the tendencies and ideals of modern life. With not the slightest trace of the pessimistic drone in his manner he faced the facts and pronounced judgment upon our modern life. The spirited discussion which followed charged Dr. Ellwood with pessimism, challenged certain statements of fact, brought forth counter-facts and expressed profound gratitude for his illumination of a possible point of view which, because we are accustomed to call our society Christian, it is easy for most of us to disregard. The following is a suggestive though inadequate excerpt from his address:

For nearly twenty years it has been my business to study our civilization behind the scenes, as it were, and I think I am pretty thoroughly conversant with both its good and bad side. If I have learned, through this study, to be thoroughly distrustful of that roseate optimism which we sometimes meet in official circles, in both church and state, it is because I know the facts. No one rejoices more than I do at the recent advances in science, industry, invention, political and legal reform, and social and philanthropic work. I am thoroughly familiar with all of these. And yet I realize what I think some of you may not clearly realize, and that is that "the far-flung battle line" of our civilization is so extended that while we may be advancing on both wings, so to speak, we may be suffering defeat in the center. Now the center of this battle line of civilization is undoubtedly our moral ideals, and so far as I can discover, while we are advancing in many material and practical ways, we are losing our grip on our ideals, at least some of us are. The most striking social phenomenon of our civilization is not our material prosperity, our conquest of nature, or our economic readjustments, but the decay of our faith in the moral ideals which have hitherto produced the best in that civilization.

Temporary Deterioration.

We are in an ebb-tide of our spiritual and moral life, in other words. This does not mean that we are necessarily going on to social decay and dissolution. Temporary deterioration does not necessarily mean permanent degeneration. Many such periods of ebb-tide in moral ideals are observable in history. We cannot, however, come out of this period of temporary retrogression in moral ideals without a general awakening to the danger which confronts us, because nothing is governed by fatality in human society, but everything by the conscious purposes, ideals and efforts of free moral personalities.

There are, of course, plenty of statistics to show this temporary deterioration in American society, which I have just alleged. It is not my purpose, however, to trouble you with these statistics at length tonight. It is possible that some of you may not know that divorce increases in the United States three times as fast as the population; that every year there are 100,000 broken homes in this country; and that while the population gains one per cent, the number of divorces gains three per cent. It is possible, also, that some of you do not know that the consumption of alcoholic beverages in the United States, between 1900 and 1910, increased fifty per cent, while the population increased only twenty-one per cent; that suicide or self-murder, during the same period, increased forty-five per cent; and that during the last six years, in practically every state, there has been a very rapid increase of the more serious forms of crime.

Some of you may not be familiar with these statistical facts, but I do not wish to discuss them specifically, but rather the general evidence of decay in our population of the controlling power of Christian ideals of life. There are those, of course, who say that the present decay of faith in our moral ideals is simply indicative of the fact that we are rapidly gaining better moral ideals than we formerly had. Those of us who believe in the Christian ideal of life, however, have a relatively definite standard by which to measure present tendencies. The question is, "How fares it with the Christian ideal of life?" Is it gaining ground, coming out victorious, or is it suffering defeat among many classes of our American society?

Certain Tendencies Away From Christianity.

The trend of much in our civilization is not toward Christianity, but away from Christianity. Certain influences in modern life are tempting people away from the ideals of Jesus, and are tending to paganize our society. To intelligent people, indeed, it is almost unnecessary to point this out. What does modern civilization emphasize? It emphasizes material progress, individual success, individual power, and individual pleasure or happiness.

What does Christianity emphasize? Christianity emphasizes God, personal righteousness, brotherhood, service, self-sacrifice. Today the great mass of men, more than ever before, have as their first aim in life the getting of money, or the power which money will bring. Another great mass have as their chief aim the getting of pleasure or happiness, while a few exalted spirits seek after fame. These are the three things which hold the men of the present in their grasp. Individual success, especially as expressed by the getting of money and the getting of power, is the standard of all worth. The things which the American worships particularly are success, power, money, although the devotees of pleasure are so numerous that it has been well said that our people are "pleasure-mad."

Material Standards.

The gospel of a selfish individualism and the practical acceptance of material standards of happiness have come to dominate among the masses. Consequently we have today a wealthy class, who are controlled by no standards except their own individual pleasure and happiness. We have growing up in our midst a literature, which, if it does not deride Christianity, at least knows nothing of the Bible or Christian ethics. For over a hundred years we have had a succession of pagan philosophers and scientists who have told us that the highest good was individual happiness or some other form of self-realization; that the world of matter and physical force was the ultimate; and that a belief in a meaning in universal processes, or even in human history, was the sheerest nonsense. Consequently, also, in our commercial, in our political, and in our social life, we have a renaissance of paganism among us today such as the world has not seen since the days of the Renaissance in Italy. The claim that the present trend of our civilization is toward Christianity is based upon the blindest sort of optimism. Rather must we say that decay of faith in the Christian ideals of life is the most striking fact of our civilization. The social problem is at bottom nothing more than this decay of faith in our moral ideals.

There is growing up a literature in western civilization today which is totally regardless of Christianity, which either derides it or ignores it. I do not mean Christianity as a theology, I mean Christianity as a system of ethics. The plays of Ibsen and of Bernard Shaw, the novels of Meredith and Hardy, and of many others that might be mentioned, the whole decadent school of literature and of art, also, regard the ideals of Christianity as the most worthless sort of rot. The traditional morality of Christendom in the family, in business, and in general social relations, they flout. It is not simply a few minor literary men that have no standing, that represent these tendencies, but the foremost men in literature today. In short, the literature of the last few decades bears a striking resemblance to the literature just preceding the French Revolution, and like it, is breeding social and moral anarchy.

Our commercial and industrial life, to look in another direction, is organized upon pagan lines, and therefore it paganizes many who come into contact with it. The newspapers are filled with the details of how little business and big business have not scrupled to do anything, even to the destroying of human lives, in order to insure dividends and large profits to their investors. Either Christianity must dominate our industrial and our commercial life, or else our commercial and industrial life will dominate Christianity, and make its ideals of no effect.

We can no longer continue half pagan and half Christian. We can't allow paganism to rule among our wealthy classes, among our laboring classes, in our literature, science and philosophy, in our commerce and politics, without coming to repudiate Christianity in full. It is time that we see that our society is at the parting of the ways. Within this generation we must decide whether our civilization is to be Christian or to be pagan; we must definitely accept either one ideal or the other. Our civilization must subordinate its pagan elements to the Christian ideal of life, or else its pagan elements will subordinate the Christian ideal.

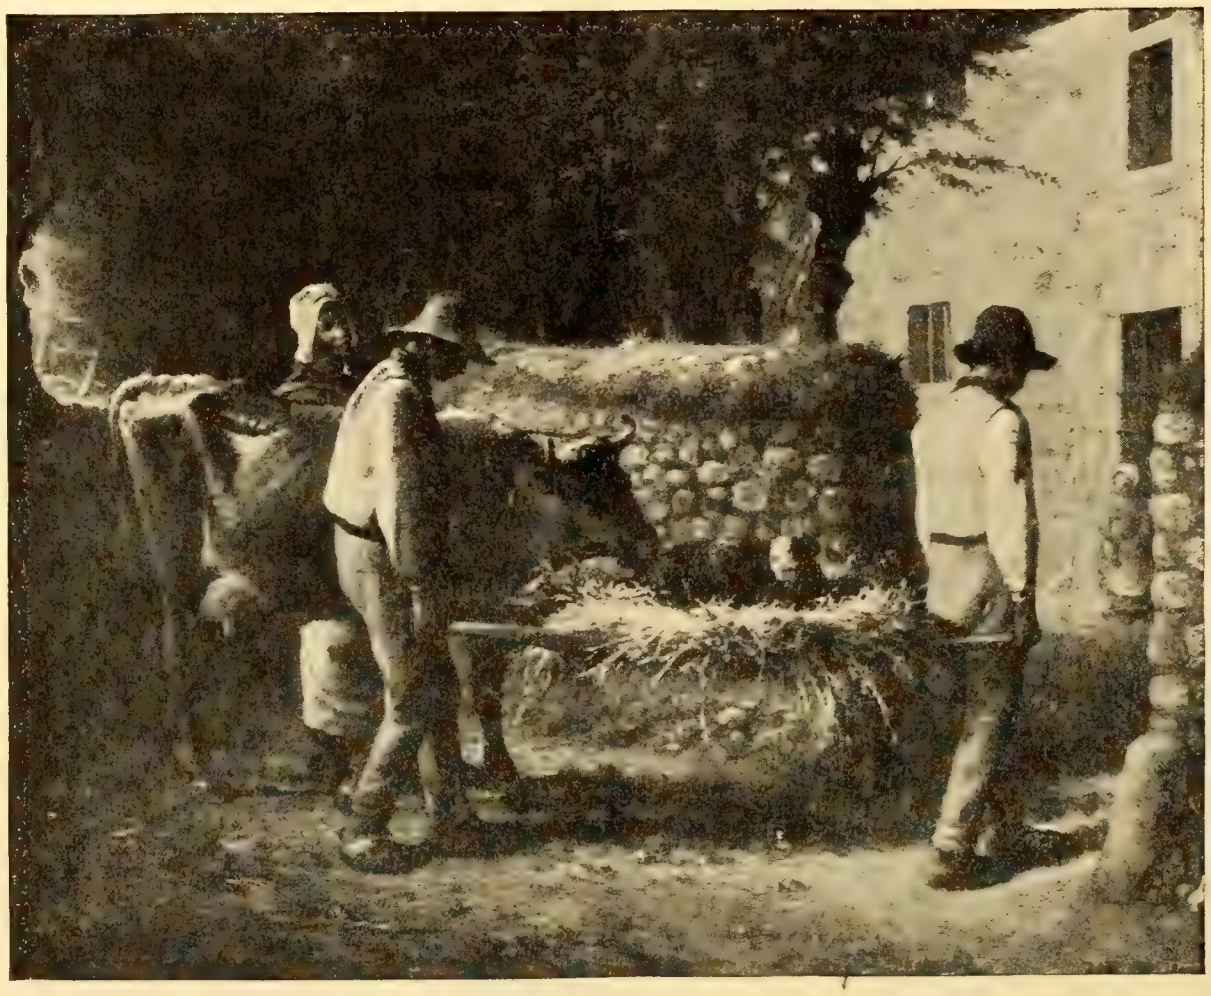
Bringing Home the Calf

An Artist's View of Humble Life

By William E. Barton

A number of years ago the record price for a painting was paid in order to purchase "The Angelus" by Jean Francois Millet. Record prices in art do not appear to last. Fabulous sums are paid now, and generally paid by American millionaires, for the great canvases of the world, but probably no picture was ever sold for so large a sum as "The Angelus" within so short a period after the artist's death. Millet died in 1875, and his paintings, which were not always popular while he was living, grew very valuable after he was dead.

There is something remarkable about "The Angelus." It is a small canvas, two-thirds of it covered by a potato field, and the rest of it by a sunset sky. Two figures in the foreground rising but little above the sky line share with a wheelbarrow, some potatoes and a fork the attention of the beholder. But these peasants are standing in the attitude of prayer, whose call they hear in the sunset bell of a church that can scarcely be seen. It is one of the most touching of Millet's paintings, and unlike "The Man With the Hoe," and certain others, it is lighted up by an idealism and hope which one sorely misses in many of his peasant paintings.



Bringing Home the Calf—Painting by Millet.

The paintings of Millet are in many of the great galleries of the world, and most of them have commanded a large price, though when he was living he sometimes destroyed a painting by putting a new picture on an old canvas because he could not sell the first picture for enough to buy another piece of cloth and stretcher.

One of the tenderest and most sympathetic of his pictures is entitled, "Bringing Home the New-Born Calf." The little bossy has been born out in the field and two peasants are carrying it home on a hand barrow, the proud and anxious mother bossy following. There is nothing of the sombreness in it that characterizes many of his paintings. It is instantly attractive and the homely sentiment expressed in it is thoroughly honest and genuine. This painting hangs in the Art Institute of Chicago, which is richest of all American galleries in paintings of the Barbizon school; indeed, it may be questioned whether any gallery in the world has so many truly notable paintings of these revolutionary Frenchmen of the last third of the nineteenth century.

The picture has been criticised as being too rectangular. The parallel lines of the wall and hand-barrow are framed in by the arms of the two peasants. This frame within a frame has been called an artistic blemish, but it is said that Millet did this with intent and that the first studies out of which this picture grew began in nothing more serious than the attempt to show the anatomical effect of the downward pull upon the arms of the men carrying the burden.

But pictures though made by artists are not made for artists. The people are the final art critics. To an artist the finest thing about this picture may be Millet's admirable knowledge of anatomy, in which he was an acknowledged master; but to the people, the fine thing about it is the tender and delicate sentiment expressed in terms of very humble life.

It is the kind of a picture young people like to see and older people also, a sweet, wholesome and genuine work of art.

Church Life

Ninth Street, Washington, Celebrates.

George A. Miller may well feel proud of the present condition of the Ninth Street Church, Washington, D. C. On April 6 this church observed the 22d anniversary of its organization. "This is the second oldest of our churches in the national capital," Mr. Miller writes. "The beloved F. D. Power, though his own church was not strong, labored and sacrificed to start another congregation on Capitol Hill. About fifty members of the Vermont Avenue Church formed the nucleus of this new congregation. A lot was purchased and a chapel built which was dedicated Apr. 5, 1891. Edward B. Bagby was called to minister to the new congregation and remained with it for more than fifteen years. The church under his able and consecrated ministry made great progress and soon outgrew the small building which had been constructed. A gallery was then built but this also was soon outgrown and in 1897 was begun the erection of the present handsome structure. This was a heroic undertaking as the congregation had no wealth and could raise but about $2,800 to build an edifice which cost completed over $30,000. There was a debt of $26,000 at the time of dedication. This the congregation assumed. Mr. Bagby resigned in October, 1906, and left a church of about 1,000 members and had reduced the debt to $15,000. The present pastor began his ministry Jan. 1, 1907. Last Sunday the two ministers occupied the pulpit and it spoke well for the church that there have been but two ministers during the twenty-two years of its history. There were present in the Bible School 721 and the church auditorium was crowded. There remained but $2,200 of the old debt and over $2,500 was raised to pay this. By the first of July the last of this burden will be entirely removed. In 1911 it became necessary to have more room for the Bible School and an adjoining residence was purchased. This is now the largest church and Bible School on the Atlantic coast. The growth has been remarkable and shows what can be accomplished in the conservative East."

Social Service to the Fore.

That the idea of social service is demanding for itself the attention of the Church, and that the Church has heard the appeal, is indicated by the fact that a standing committee on social service was appointed at the Louisville convention, as a department of the American Christian Missionary Society. This committee is charged with the responsibility of opening up a new and greatly needed department of work in home missions. It is composed of the following brethren: J. H. Mohorter, chairman, who is the General Secretary of our National Benevolent Association; O. F. Jordan, who is a busy pastor in the great city of Chicago and the Secretary of our Chicago Missionary Board and who has had wide experience in city problems; F. E. Lumley, Professor of Social Science and Home Missions, College of Missions; H. H. Peters, pastor of our strong church at Paris, Ill., and Chairman of the Committee on Rural Churches for the State of Illinois; and Professor A. W. Taylor, known far and wide for his interest in social problems as well as his writings on various phases of our missionary work, both Home and Foreign. The latter is the Executive Secretary of the Committee.

The function of this commission will be to co-operate with like commissions of other religious bodies in furthering all those larger forms of Christian work which make for the Christianization of America and to co-operate with the office of the American Society in extending the kingdom of God in all those peculiar ways that are generally denominated social. The saloon, the social evil, divorce, the tenement house, the sweat shop and all kindred sins which afflict modern civilization will receive the attention of this committee. Although funds at its disposal are too limited this year to permit any large undertakings, the committee has outlined for itself some definite tasks, such as to co-operate with like committees from other communions; to make a survey of our own force as a people, seeking to discover how many churches we have in the country, the town and the city and what progress is being made in these various types of churches, together with the social problems that confront them and the methods useful in meeting them; to study the Slavic people of America, which peoples form such a large proportion of the immigration of the day and afford a unique opportunity to the Disciples for extending the simple plea of the Gospel and the New Testament Church; to stimulate the study of social ethics in our colleges and urge a course for ministers dealing with practical church problems along social lines; to promote the study of Biblical teaching on social morals in the Sunday-school and the preaching of the social message from pulpits, as well as its treatment in our religious journals; to make surveys that will promote the cause of Christian union by showing the waste of duplication in over-churched communities and investigate methods of co-operation that point to success in the effort to make the church a more efficient social force; and to secure on convention programs addresses that will cultivate a social conscience among our churches in all possible ways. A liberal offering for home missions, the first Sunday in May, should give encouragement to this new branch of missionary service.

E. L. Powell on Christ's Sovereignty.

"He is either sovereign over the government of America or he is not sovereign over one soul in America," was the statement of E. L. Powell, of Louisville, in a recent sermon. That President Wilson would be in entire accord with Mr. Powell in this declaration would not be denied. "I claim," Mr. Powell said, "that the sovereignty of Jesus Christ is not something that can be narrowed and limited within the province of certain choice so-called activities. It is a sovereignty that has to do with all the civilization of the world and with all the material activities that go to make up that civilization. The sovereignty of Jesus Christ is co-extensive with the pursuits and with the activities of all the men of all tribes and kindreds and places. He is either sovereign over the government of America or He is not sovereign over one soul in America. He either has a right to dictate the spirit in which government shall be conducted or He has not the right to dictate the way in which you must live as an individual man. He either is Lord over all or He is Lord over nobody. The sovereignty of Jesus Christ is co-extensive with advancing civilization, and insofar as civilization advances at all it is God reigning and ruling over the minds and hearts of men, which minds and hearts thus dominated by His spirit and law, are dominating material civilization and making it to go forward along those lines that we call righteousness."

Mustard Seed Development at Grand Rapids.

An effort now being made to raise a fund to pay for repairs on the church building of the Franklin Street Church of Christ, Grand Rapids, Mich., calls attention to an interesting development in this field. The church was born through the efforts of a lad now deceased, who had seventy-five cents in hand which he wanted used for this project. Hence "the Philip Hood fund" is made the nucleus of the present effort. Thomas H. Adams is the pastor. This church furnishes an interesting illustration of the changes in policy through which a church may pass, owing to changes in the pastorate. W. A. Bellamy, now in the local real estate business, was its pastor a few years ago and "a live man" he was. Having a vision of a neighborhood center he organized the boys of the vicinity and for their benefit installed some institutional features, one of which was a cement swimming pool. Certain members, however, differed with the pastor as to this method of saving souls; after his resignation the swimming pool went dry. Mr. Adams, a man of English birth and training, who formerly was connected with the Salvation Army, is a vigorous and direct evangelist and a hard worker, whose chief emphasis is on the distinctly spiritual side of religion. In addition to evangelism in the Sunday-school and all other departments, the pastor, aided by a chorus choir, makes every Sunday night service of the straight evangelistic type, with strong appeals to the unconverted. He has met with gratifying results.

School of Methods Idea Hits the South.

The First Christian Church, Atlanta, Ga., was the scene of a successful school of methods, held by the Sunday-school department of the A. C. M. S., Robt. M. Hopkins, secretary. There was an enrolment of 153, representing twenty-seven schools from three states. Seventeen preachers, six superintendents and thirty-nine teachers were among those who attended. Of those enrolled, thirty-three completed the work required and received the international certificate of merit. The faculty included the following instructors:

J. Randall Farris, Southeastern Bible Superintendent, Dean and Instructor in Missions; W. E. Frazee, State Bible School Superintendent of Kentucky, Instructor in Organization and Management; R. P. Shepherd, Editor Bible School Literature, Christian Board of Publication, Instructor in Old Testament and Religious Pedagogy; W. O. Foster, Pastor of the West End Christian Church, Atlanta, Ga., Leader of Devotional Hours; Miss Hazel A. Lewis, National Elementary Bible School Superintendent, Instructor in Elementary Department; Robt. M. Hopkins, Bible School Secretary of the Disciples of Christ, Instructor in Evangelism and Efficiency.

Calls This "Age of the Soul."

Can this modern day be designated "the age of the soul?" J. R. Perkins, in a recent sermon delivered at the First Christian Church, Sioux City, Ia., declared that it can, as earlier periods might be termed ages of the body and of the mind. "Is this generation, this tense civilization, this apparently money mad hour, the age of man's soul?" he asked. "Indeed so; for this hour is preeminently ethical and moral. It has other features—perhaps must have; but its dominant trait is conduct. In other words men are at last searching for God in their relations to one another. They have come to know that one cannot hold right relations with God and be brutal to men. They are seeking to serve God, not by complimenting him, praising him, and telling him in long winded prayers how wonderful he is, for he knows it better than we do; but men are serving God by serving one another."

Tacoma, First, Asks Questions.

The First Church, Tacoma, W. A. Moore, pastor, is applying the principle of the initiative and referendum at its Sunday evening services. The following questions were submitted by members for answer on a recent Sunday: What is the real business of the church? Should Christians fear death? What about deathbed repentance? Why is the church so set against the saloon? Is there no way by which all men can have one day rest in seven? What should Christians think of Commissioner Mills' proposed Municipal Farm? Would the family of a liquor man be acceptable members of the First Church? Is it not the duty of the pastor to call on all the members of his church? If I live a good life can I be saved without baptism? What does the Bible teach concerning professing Christians who will not speak to acquaintances?

Defends "Billy" Sunday's Methods.

William Asher, personal representative of W. A. Sunday, recently addressed a union prayer-meeting in the First Christian Church at Mishawaka, Indiana, outlining the Sunday campaign to begin in South Bend, April 20. Mr. Asher warned the people against false stories about Billy Sunday which he said were sure to appear and which were already being circulated, he charged, by liquor interests. "William Sunday," he said, "never says smutty things either to audiences of men or women. He uses some very pointed language which cannot be misunderstood." Mr. Asher said some people were giving out the false impression that Mr. Sunday had been guaranteed a certain amount of money. This was not true in any sense, he said. "The last week or so Mr. Sunday receives a popular subscription which usually amounts to not over $2 per convert."

George H. Combs on Sabbath Observance.

"The present complex system of civilization makes some kinds of work necessary on Sunday, but the work of the barber is not included," said George Hamilton Combs, pastor of the Independence Boulevard Christian Church, in his recent sermon on "Observance of Sunday in Kansas City." The topic grew out of the discussion of the closing of the barber shops on Sunday. "Sunday work should be kept at the minimum of necessity instead of being allowed to indulge the maximum of desire. Civilization is so made up that the work of the press, of travel and a few other lines is necessary. Sunday work cannot be confined to the mere necessities of the physical being as it could in the days of primitive man. But there is no excuse for the barber, the actor, the manufacturer or shop worker breaking the Sabbath."

Tries Evening Service as Adult Bible Class.

F. N. Calvin, pastor of the Central Christian Church at Waco, Texas, is transforming his Sunday evening meeting into an adult Bible class session. He takes up the uniform international Sunday-school lessons one week in advance of the schools, thus in addition to a general Bible study giving aid to pupils and teachers in the preparation of their Sunday-school lessons. The plan includes a number of special features, such as pedagogical and psychological training, special music and about forty minutes spent in the study of the lesson.

A GREAT AND POPULAR CHURCH MUSIC BOOK

The New Praise Hymnal

By GILBERT J. ELLIS and J. H. FILLMORE

The New Praise Hymnal comes as near being the ideal church hymnal for the present day as could well be conceived. It is a handsome book, dignified in appearance and make-up. It embraces in its contents as nearly everything demanded to-day as could be gotten into a book of 600 pages.

The New Praise Hymnal is practical in every way; everything in it is available for use in the average congregation. It contains what is used by the most advanced churches. The setting of the hymns and music is engaging to the eye and pleasant to read and sing.

It is a book that grows in favor as it is used. New beauties are discovered from time to time as its pages are tested. The hymns and tunes of the church universal are found in The New Praise Hymnal, also the best available Gospel Songs that the modern church has found to be necessary to its various activities.

The sales of The New Praise Hymnal are larger now than they have ever been. The sales are increasing day by day. This means that it meets the demands better than any other book. Sample Copies mailed for examination.

Prices: Silk Cloth Sides, Leather Back, at $70 per 100; Vellum Cloth, at $50 per 100.

Chicago Quarterly Assembly.

The Quarterly Assembly of the Chicago Disciples of Christ, under the auspices of the C. C. M. S., announces its meeting for April 20, at 3 p. m. Among the speakers on this occasion will be the following: Dr. E. S. Ames, of Hyde Park, who will discuss "Missions and the Local Church;" C. G. Baker, of Douglas Park, who will treat "Our National Problems;" C. C. Morrison, of The Christian Century, who will speak on "The City in the Home Mission Program;" E. L. Dakin, of Memorial Church, who will discuss "The Church Finding Its Own in the City;" and E. M. Bowman, who will give a "just-from-the-field" account of "Missions in the Orient."

La Grange, Oregon, Plans.

The Church of Christ at La Grange, Oregon, has sold the land upon which its building stands and purchased property in the residence district. The building is to be moved within ninety days. During this time a full concrete basement is to be constructed on the new property. When moved, the building will be worked over into an all but new edifice. The structure is only about thirteen years old. During this time the business district has encroached upon it. The transaction will enable the church to free itself of debt in addition to making needed improvements. A. J. Adams is their minister.

A fund raising campaign for the new First Christian Church, at Union Avenue and Dunlap Street, Memphis, Tenn., to replace the Linden Avenue Christian Church at the Mulberry corner, will be launched soon, and actual construction will begin at an early date. This announcement was made on a recent Sunday, simultaneously with one that the pastor, Rev. W. H. Sheffer, would retain the work at Memphis instead of accepting a call from a Los Angeles, Cal., church.

"The City Charter" and "Capital Punishment" were two subjects that were recently discussed before the Men's organization of the First Christian church, of Youngstown, Ohio, by Asael E. Adams, chairman of the charter commission and Judge W. S. Anderson respectively. The occasion was the second annual banquet of that organization. Fully 200 men gathered around the board at the Y. M. C. A. and listened to these addresses from the citizens named.

A unique series of services was held at Newberg, Oregon, recently. It marked the closing of the sixth and beginning of the seventh years of service of George C. Ritchey with the church there. Beginning with Monday and continuing each evening through the week, evangelistic services were conducted. The local ministerial class of six young men did the preaching. The minister conducted the Lord's day services.

A delightful occasion was the reception given by the older members of the First Christian Church, Fresno, Cal., to the more than two hundred new members who have become members within the past eleven months. The pre-Easter evangelistic services, conducted by H. O. Breeden, pastor, and S. R. Shaw, associate pastor, resulted in swelling the membership by 110. The total membership of the church is now between 900 and 1,000.

W. F. Cowden, of Tacoma, Wash., has just given a large portion of his valuable library to Eugene Bible University. Over one hundred volumes have been placed in the main library, and several other volumes in the library of the Girls' College. Mr. and Mrs. Cowden have been devoted friends of the school from the beginning of its history in 1895.

Marooned in New Albany, Ind., on account of the flood, S. M. Martin, evangelist, and Prof. A. J. Carroll, singing evangelist, began a series of evangelistic meetings at Central Christian church in that city April 3. Mr. Martin was expected to begin a revival meeting in Hickman, Ky., last Sunday.

Professor F. E. Billington has resigned as teacher in the department of Religious Education of the Eugene Bible University, and has accepted the position of Sunday-school specialist for Washington and Idaho under the American Christian Missionary Society. He will begin work in his new field about June 1.

The church at Davenport, Iowa, is fortunate in having a magnificent men's Bible class to depend on in the remodeling and enlarging of its building. This class of "Loyal Men" has for its watchword, "Five Hundred Enrolled on the Day of Dedication." The class has a present enrolment of 250.

The congregation at the Jackson Avenue Church, Kansas City, has called S. M. Perkins as its minister for another year, at an advance of $500 in salary. A debt of $5,000 has just been lifted, with $1,000 balance, which will be used to enlarge and improve the Sunday-school department.

At a meeting of the Disciples' Union of Washington and vicinity, held at Vermont Avenue Church, Washington, D. C., on April 8, the subject of Christian union was presented by George A. Miller, of Ninth Street Christian Church, and by Hugh T. Stevenson of Bethany Baptist Church.

In a recent issue the statement was made in these columns that R. E. Elmore had left the work at Walnut Hills, Cincinnati, and accepted the pulpit at New Albany, Ind. This was an error, Mr. Elmore informs us. It is his brother, C. E. Elmore, who has taken the latter field.

Looking forward to the primary elections, a special meeting for men was held at Central Church, Terre Haute, Ind., where George Darsie, ministers. The Sunday-school of this church paid into the church treasury, recently, $1,000 to be applied on the church debt.

Albert R. Adams, pastor at Chillicothe, Ohio, had a trying experience during the flood which wiped out two-thirds of that city. Mr. Adams lost all his household goods, books, clothing and a sum of money, and his family has been cared for by the city.

The lectures recently delivered by Peter Ainslie at Yale University are to be brought out in book form by Fleming H. Revell Company, Chicago. There will be two volumes, entitled, "God and Me," and "My Brother and I."

Mrs. Decima Campbell Barclay, daughter of Alexander Campbell, recently addressed a meeting of a new class of "Loyal Daughters" at Santa Barbara, Calif., where J. Walter Carpenter ministers.

Finis Idleman, pastor Central Church, Des Moines, has been bringing inspiration to many Iowa communities by a practical and attractive lecture on "Realizing Community Ideals."

Home Coming Day was observed at the Douglas Park Church, Chicago, April 6. J. D. Hull, G. C. Campbell and Austin Hunter, all of Chicago, brought messages of congratulation.

Perry J. Rice of El Paso, Tex., and F. W. Burnham, First Church, Springfield, Ill., preached to Knights Templar commanderies in their respective churches Easter Sunday.

The Disciples' Missionary Union, of New York City and vicinity, reports, for the month of February, forty-four added to the membership and $340.97 raised in the field.

The new Main Street Church of Christ, Haverhill, Mass., was dedicated April 6. Professor Hall L. Calhoun, of Transylvania University, delivered the address.

The annual convention of the churches of Christ of the Eighth district of Indiana, was held at Danville, April 3 and 4.

North Side Church, Fresno, Calif., has resolved to build a house of worship costing $40,000.

$150 of the above sum is in the form of a definite pledge to be paid within sixty days.

It is heartening to notice the widespread interest and sympathy. Already there is country-wide representation from the Atlantic to the Pacific. The latest information indicates that the assistance is sorely needed. The State Commission made prompt and sufficient provision for food and clothing but in no less important need is the rehabilitation of the homes, the support of the church services and the repair of the church buildings.

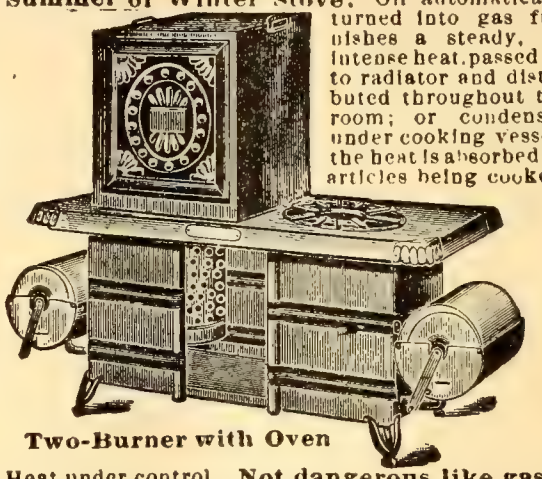
PORTABLE STOVE COOKING AND HEATING

Saves Fuel Bills, Saves Dirt, Work and Drudgery.

SIMPLE IN CONSTRUCTION, DURABLE, AND ABSOLUTELY SAFE

COMBINES ECONOMY, COMFORT and CONVENIENCE

COMBINED COOKING AND HEATING—The Portable Stove will boil, bake, fry, roast—cook anything. Ideal for quick meals, washing, ironing, hot water, hot milk, canning fruit, camping. Summer or Winter Stove. Oil automatically turned into gas furnishes a steady, intense heat, passed into radiator and distributed throughout the room; or condensed under cooking vessels the heat is absorbed by articles being cooked.



Two-Burner with Oven

Heat under control. Not dangerous like gasoline. No valves. No wicks—all parts open—nothing to clog, close up or get out of order.

THE PORTABLE STOVE

is simple in construction. No complicated machinery to get out of order. The oil flows from the reservoir into the open steel burner bowl, where it is converted into a heavy gas. This gas is carried into the open-air cylinder, where it is superheated and given the required amount of air to make combustion and give the greatest amount of heat for the smallest use of oil. As will be seen, all parts are open—the burner bowl, air mixer, the cylinder or chimney. Nothing to clog or close up. The stove furnishes its own heat to generate the gas

CHEAP FUEL

Kerosene or coal oil, is recognized the world over as providing economic fuel. The difficulty has been in securing methods that would use it both economically and satisfactorily. The Portable Stove solves the problem. It furnishes the family need. It burns this common fuel, giving an intense heat, but concentrated under cooking vessel, absorbed by articles being cooked—not thrown out to overheat your kitchen. In every section of country coal and wood are getting higher in price. The continual discovery of new oil fields in different parts of the country has furnished oil in abundance. The Portable Stove is a practical method of using this fuel. It also saves work and dirt. The intense heat provides quickly cooked meals.

EASILY REGULATED

The flow of oil is easily controlled by the adjuster on the end of the reservoir. Each burner has its own reservoir and adjuster. The height of the flame is easily lowered or raised with this adjuster. More oil—higher flame. Less oil—lower flame. No oil—flame shut off.

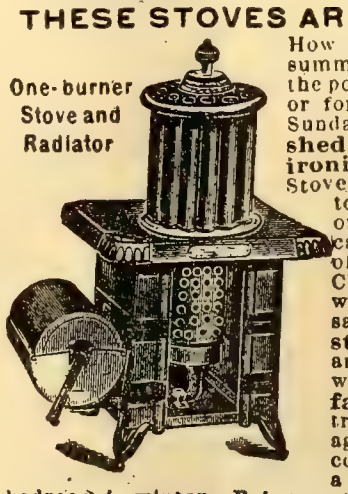
SAFETY

Coal oil or kerosene not dangerous like gasoline. There is no longer excuse for using dangerous gasoline stoves, thus causing mothers and children to run daily the chance of losing their lives. One can hardly pick up a newspaper without seeing an account due to the use of the deadly gasoline. Coal oil burned in the oil-gas stove is a safe fuel. The Portable Stove is safe for every day family use.

CONVENIENCE

Every woman will be glad to get rid of the coal or wood, dirt, ashes and all the nuisance that goes with the ordinary cook stove. The Portable Stove will save trouble, anxiety and annoyance, without any additional fuel.

THESE STOVES ARE PORTABLE



One-burner Stove and Radiator

How convenient on a hot summer day to take out on the porch for a quick meal, or for coffee on a warm Sunday night, or in the shed for washing or ironing. The Portable Stove can easily be carried to a church for a social or to picnics or to camping grounds. One of our customers, Chas. Schaufler, Calif. who is a railroad man, said he used their stove on a caboose and was able to cook with the hard and fast running of the train. We cannot imagine anything more convenient for heating a cold dining room or bedroom in winter. Being portable they can easily be moved to any part of the house and are always ready for instant use. The new Model 1912 contains many valuable improvements, which add greatly to the efficiency of the stove.

DURABILITY

They are made of steel throughout, thoroughly tested before shipping. Sent complete, ready for use as soon as received. Nicely finished with nickel trimming, and they will last for years.

OVENS FOR BAKING

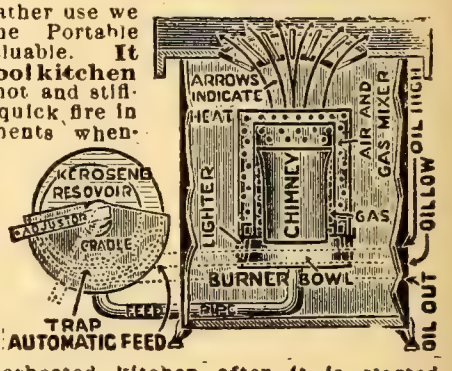
The ovens furnished with the Portable Stove are splendid bakers, handsomely finished throughout, made of sheet steel full lined with tin plate, removable shelves.

RADIATORS FOR HEAT

The radiators are placed over the burner. The heat of the stove is thrown from the surface of the radiator, giving a cheerful heat. It is convenient size and when not in use can be laid to one side.

SUMMER STOVE

For hot-weather use we consider the Portable Stove invaluable. It means a cool kitchen instead of hot and stifling; a hot, quick fire in a few moments whenever you want it. Think of the time wasted in starting the old cook stove before it gets hot enough to cook, and the overheated kitchen after it is started REMEMBER this stove consumes no fuel except when in use. Put this stove in your home—you will find it convenient and a delightful stove to use in summer and winter.



WHAT USERS SAY

"It is so convenient and economical." Rev. P. V. Hawkins, Ohio. "It is clean, convenient, no trouble, burns steadily; perfect baking." Henry Schilling, Ill. "For baking it has no equal." V. E. Bostwick, O. "Bakes pies, cakes, bread; never saw nicer baking done." Mrs. O. Thompson, O. "Never cooked meals so quick and easy." James Newark, Mich. "Baked, cooked, washed, ironed—can do anything my range does." Mrs. M. E. King, Ky. "Cooked for a family of 6 for 5 days with 3 quarts of oil; they are great time and fuel savers." H. M. Irey, Ia. "Heated a room when the temperature was 10 degrees below zero with one radiator." Wm. Baering, Ind. "With the radiator it soon warms up our dining room." J. F. Lisson, Calif. "We are using it to heat our office." McPherson Co., R. I.

ECONOMY—E. N. Helwig, Ont., "Only used a half gallon of oil last week for cooking, baking and ironing" F. G. Boylston, S. C. "Cooked for a family of six five days—only three quarts of oil." Wm. Stapley, Ariz., "Your oil-gas stove was just as expected it to be after reading your description. With one gallon of oil we did the cooking for a family nine persons, six of them grown, for three days and one meal, besides doing the small ironing. The oil cost 35c. Wood cost $6.00 per cord here." Fred Hadder, Wis., "Moved my old cook stove in the wood shed. You won't catch me sawing or carrying any more wood. This is a snap for me."

SAFETY—Mrs. E. R. McClellan, Ills., says "It is safe and clean as a lamp, and children that can be trusted with a kerosene lamp can be trusted with this stove." Mrs. P. P. Leherer, Mich. "Easy to run quick to heat—no danger of explosion. D. L. Dennis, Ind., "Makes no dirt, no trouble to operate; takes very little fuel; no danger possible; makes plenty of heat. H. N. Flora, O., "Perfectly safe, a person can operate them without constant worry of danger.

CLEANLINESS—Mrs. S. R. Croft, speaks of this when she says: "There is no smoke, dirt, or ashes to bother with. It is easy and simple to operate, very clean and safe to handle; is away ahead of coal or wood fire." E. J. Free, Me. "It don't smoke, is easy to operate, and we find it clean." Wm. Irsh, Mo. "A splendid baker and cooker, although we use the cheapest grade of oil. For good work, simplicity, economy and cleanliness, it is simply perfection itself." Mrs. J. F Hascall, Fla. "It does not leak at all; it is a great comfort. The oven is a beauty and bakes fine—not heavy to move from place to place, and convenient in size and shape. W. O. Poe, Mo. says: Can cook a meal in 20 minutes; baked biscuits in 4 minutes." Mrs. Ella Holleman, Tenn., "Takes less oil to cook a meal than is often used to kindle a fire in the old stove. Cooking was a burden because of heat. This oil stove is a pleasure."

DON'T FAIL to write today for full information. The price of these stoves is remarkably low—only $3.25 up, any number of burners. No sold in stores. See catalogue with testimonials from hundreds of patrons, sent free; also full information regarding our Portable Stove.

AGENTS MAKE MONEY Quick, Easy, Sure.

Show stove MAKING GAS—people stop, look, excited—want it—buy. B. L. Huested, Mich. "Was out one day—sold 11 stoves." W. E. Baird, S. C. "You have the best stove on the market; sold 9 in 2 hours; I do not fear competition." (first ordered 1—200 since) Chas. P. Schroeder, Conn., bought 40 stoves one order. Head & Frazer, Tex. write "Sell like hot cakes; sold 50 stoves in our town." J. W. Hunter, Ala., secured 1—tested it—ordered 100 since. J. G. R. Gauthreaux, La., ordered 1; 155 since. So they go. These men MAKE MONEY. You have the same chance. You should make from $10. to $15 a day. Write for our selling plan. Do it today. Send no money.

PLANTING NEW CHURCHES

BY FINIS IDLEMAN

AN IMPORTANT ANNOUNCEMENT

CHICAGO

Disciples Publication Society

THE DISCIPLES PUBLICATION SOCIETY is a corporation chartered under the laws of Illinois. It is organized for the purpose of publishing books, Sunday School literature and a weekly religious newspaper. It has no capital stock. Its profits are not to go to individuals but to be appropriated to advance the cause of religious education, especially the higher education of the Christian ministry. The term "religious education" is regarded as an ideal common to Sunday Schools, missionary societies, colleges, seminaries and universities, and other organizations that promote Christian progress through Christian education. The Society through its trustees has purchased the entire assets and good will of the New Christian Century Company (including the subscription list and good will of The Christian Century; a contract of participation in the interdenominational syndicate for publishing the Bethany Graded Lessons; a contract of membership in the United Religious Press; all books, Sunday School supplies and other stock on hand; all accounts and bills receivable; besides assuming liability for all accounts and bills payable), for $16,000 and has executed its notes to that amount which have been accepted by the stock-holders of the New Christian Century Company in payment for their property. To provide capital for enlarging the business the trustees are issuing 5 per cent bonds in the amount of $50,000, retirable after five years, to be sold to persons interested in the ideals of The Christian Century. It is believed at the present time that not more than $25,000 of these bonds need be sold in order to put the Society on a sound profit earning basis. Subscriptions for the purchase of these bonds are now being solicited by C. C. Morrison and H. L. Willett, editors of The Christian Century. During Dr. Willett's absence in the Orient correspondence may be addressed exclusively to Mr. Morrison. Full information as to all details will be given upon inquiry. The essential purpose of the transaction and proposals herein described is to provide a way for the general brotherhood of the Disciples of Christ to buy The Christian Century and its publishing house and to pay for them by patronizing them. The bonds and notes are to be retired out of the profits earned by the Society. The purchasers of bonds, therefore, will stand, with the holders of notes, in the position of sustainers or supporters of the enterprise while the brotherhood's patronage is paying for it and increasing its value. The question of defining the membership of the Disciples Publication Society is still open, and upon it the organizers will be glad to receive suggestions. It is the purpose to make it thoroughly democratic and representative. The five trustees named by the charter will act for the Society until the basis of membership has been determined and the members elected.

Notes

—General Bramwell Booth, who succeeded his father the late William Booth, as president of the Salvation Army, has been proposed for the Nobel prize on the ground that during the last forty years while he was working in behalf of the salvation of mankind he has been a great factor in behalf of international peace.

—That big meeting of the year for Presbyterians, the General Assembly is to be held this year about the middle of May at Atlanta, Ga. At the same time the General Assemblies of the Southern Presbyterian Church and the United Presbyterian church will meet. It is thought that renewed efforts to bring the Southern and Northern Presbyterians (which separated on the slavery and war questions more than fifty years ago) together, will be made.

—La Semaine Religieuse, a French newspaper, mentions that the hymn, "Nearer, my God, to Thee," sung by the passengers of the Titanic on the fatal night, has aroused great interest in France, and Roman Catholic booksellers have published several editions of it. The Bishop of Dijon has forbidden the use of it in all the parishes and religious houses of his diocese, giving as his reason that the words and music of the hymn are of Protestant origin.

—St. George's Episcopal Church in New York lost not only an important member of the church and parish in the death of Mr. Morgan, but a picturesque and interesting character. He was a regular attendant at church, assisting in taking up the collection on Sunday and manifesting an interest in various members of the congregation. Joseph H. Choate, not long before Mr. Morgan's departure, shared the pew with him. When an unfamiliar hymn was sung Mr. Morgan would glare at the choir and interview the choirmaster immediately after the service.

—The Junior Congregation idea, inaugurated in the First Reformed Church, Brooklyn, is said to be growing throughout the country. The First Presbyterian Church in Auburn, N. Y., has set aside one of the galleries for the use of the children, and during the winter has been making a campaign for the children of the church. The pastor is assisted by the superintendent of the Sunday-school, as well as several members of the church, who are deeply interested. Ushers are distributed through the gallery and confusion is avoided. A three-minute sermon to children precedes the regular sermon. At a recent service 175 children were present.

—The Utah Gospel Mission is doing a great work in fighting Mormonism. To January, 1913, in the West it had made 190,000 calls in homes, held 2,039 meetings with 158,400 people present, and used 13,568,000 pages of special literature. In the East it had provided 567 addresses on Mormonism and used 3,251,000 pages of special literature. All at the cost of only $33,520.09; though double or triple the sum should have been used. There were 144,352 Mormons in the United States by the census of 1890; now about 400,000—increased nearly three-fold in 23 years. Over 16,000 new members "baptized" in 1910. There are at least 30,000 Mormons outside the U. S.—19,971 in Canada in 1911. This fungus growth on the religious body of the land needs the attention of a surgeon.

—The Commission on the Church and Social Service of the Federal Council has called a conference of those organizations for social uplift which appeals to the churches for the observance of special Sundays to be given to their various causes, in order to bring about an adjustment in the calendar. Such Sundays as Child Labor Sunday, Tuberculosis Sunday, Labor Sunday, etc., have rapidly increased during the past year or two and many of the pastors and churches have appealed to the Federal Council Commission to bring about some sort of joint arrangement with these various organizations to avoid duplication and, if possible, by combination to reduce the number of calls for special Sundays. The Conference was held in New York City, April 15.

—The "old guard" of religious journalism, that is, the representatives of the last generation of religious journalists, has again been thinned out, this time by the death on March 24 of Dr. Joseph Newton Hallock, editor of The Christian Work (New York). Only two of this famous generation now survive, Dr. J. H. Garrison of the Christian-Evangelist (St. Louis) and Dr. W. B. Palmore of the Christian Advocate (St. Louis). The Christian Work is nearly 100 years old. Dr. Hallock purchased it in 1880, after a ministry of twenty years in the Congregational churches. Since that time he has edited it. He died at the age of seventy-nine. He was an indefatigable worker, a tireless editor, and an enthusiastic writer up to almost the very last.

—Little by little it develops that Union Theological Seminary of New York City, regarded ever since the Briggs case of fifteen years ago, as "unsound" from a Presbyterian point of view, may return under the wings of the General Assembly of the Presbyterian Church, U. S. A. The General Assembly has a special committee on relations with the seminary. On March 13 this special committee under the chairmanship of Doctor Carson, former moderator, met with a committee of the seminarial trustees. The joint committees were dinner guests of President Brown of the Seminary. A harmonious meeting is reported. But no details were given out. However, it is significant that the trustees of Union Theological Seminary took under advisement the request of the General Assembly that the seminary declare faith in the authority of the Scriptures, the deity of Christ and the resurrection and atonement. Naturally, the public is interested to know whether the seminary will return to the orthodox camp and once more be sealed with the approval of the General Assembly. Union Theological Seminary has an international reputation for its encyclopaedic scholarship. Furthermore, Union's reputation has for the past twenty years been on the side of liberalism. For Union to declare its "faith" as the General Assembly desires would be significant of both a new temper on the part of scholarship and pronounced progress on the part of the Presbyterian church. Certainly Union's faculty is not reactionary, nor tending in a reactionary direction. Its scholars represent the most progressive and independent thinking now being done in the theological world. But the church happily, is coming not only to grant liberty to its reverent scholars but demanding liberty for them. Much has happened in Christian thought since the days of the Briggs trial.

Progress Both Ways

For a generation we have talked about the struggle for existence, and the survival of the fittest. Sometimes we have spoken words of truth, and again we have spoken words of cruel error. For that which constitutes fitness in the struggle does not always constitute fitness for the survival itself. In an address shortly before his death, Dr. Reuen Thomas uttered a warning lest too shallow a view of modern science make us cruel and unfeeling; and directed the mind of those whom he addressed to a deeper and often neglected lesson of brotherhood and the social spirit as taught in nature:

"For a generation we have been almost slaves to two ideas which are associated with the name of the great naturalist Darwin. One idea goes by the name of 'Natural Selection' and the other we know as 'the Survival of the Fittest.' Natural Selection, of course, means that Nature favors some organisms instead of others in consequence of differences in the organisms themselves. The 'fittest to survive' are those which are most adaptable to the surroundings in which they find themselves. These two ideas have had the field and have wrought most disastrously in politics and in the political use of military power. We have had to listen to the horrible dogma that Nature intended and therefore the Author of Nature intended that the strong should subdue the weak. Small nations were intended to be exploited by large nations. 'We that are strong ought to bear the infirmities of the weak, and not to please ourselves"—such apostolic words were laughed out of court. Militarism got a new sanction. The old George III. Toryism lifted up its head in England once more. Nature was Tory. Brotherhood as an ideal and an aim was scouted.

"Recently men have risen who, working along evolutionary lines, have pushed ideas into mental and moral regions, and have shown that such ideas as those by which we have been enslaved, have a larger content than their originators perceived. The physically strongest may be only representatives of a gilded barbarism. The most effective among men (and even among animals) have been those capable of coming into fraternities for mutual helpfulness. There is, if only we will look for it, a Sermon on the Mount embedded in Nature. When once we have got the fine tone and temper of that sermon in ourselves, we shall find it elsewhere. People are ruled by ideas. If our ideas of life and its purpose are wrong our politics will be wrong, our domestic life will be wrong, all our conduct will be wrong in spirit and in tendency. To say 'it does not matter what your opinions are providing your life be right' is arrant nonsense. The last note in evolution is that we are members one of another."

Natural science does not assure us that all progress shall be upward. It assumes that life presses outward from its various centers in every direction, seeking unoccupied space for itself. It often grows downward. The white ghost-flower called Indian pipe was once a true flower, with red petals, but growing in the shade lost the glow from the blossom and the green pigment of the stalk and now grows in the dark glen, hanging its head for shame, the ghost of its former self. It has made progress, and has found a place where it may survive. But its progress has been degeneracy, and the only place it now can live is in the dense shadow of other vegetation that has learned to nourish itself in the sun.

We do well to remember, and it is pleasant and profitable to remember, that the perishing of ancient Greece has left us, not the bickerings and petty commonplaces of her ordinary life, but those monuments to her greatness that stand out in bold relief above all that could degrade them by too intimate a knowledge of the meaner elements in the lives of the men who produced them. But we need also to remember how much good has escaped and how much evil has survived as the years have gone by. Some of the types least desirable have longest lease of life. Aristotle theorized about the origin of certain insect pests; Aristotle died, and his theory is obsolete, but the pests are with us still.

The theory of evolution does not assure us that there shall be no failures, but only that creation as a whole shall not fail. It does not promise that there shall be no loss of type, no experiment not visibly productive of good.

There is sure to be progress, either up or down. Nature is not stationary. The human soul grows better or worse. Let us be sure that our progress is upward. God has a plan for the universe, and in that plan will not be thwarted. It is for us to meet the purpose of God, where it touches our lives, and make that purpose vital within us; else the purpose of God will be wrought without us, and within the sphere of our lives the grace of God will spend itself in vain. We cannot rely on the divine purpose to perform within us and through us what we do not assist. It is for us to work out our own salvation with fear and trembling, while God works in us to will and to do of his good pleasure.

Esther: The Timeliness of Loyalty

Professor Paton quotes Luther as saying of the Book of Esther: "I am so hostile to this book that I wish it did not exist, for it Judaizes too much, and has much heathen naughtiness." Of Esther, Professor Paton says: "The only redeeming traits in her character are her loyalty to her people and her bravery in attempting to save them." Granting that Esther had much in her character that is repugnant to the moral sense of the Christian, we may admire her loyalty. Without loyalty neither family nor church, nor state can exist. And the example of loyalty does not cease to be worthy of consideration because the character in which it is exhibited is not altogether admirable.

Every man needs some one he can be loyal to and on whose loyalty he can depend. When we believe in some one and are willing to make sacrifices for him, we really believe in ourselves. Timely support of another in his fight against the sin of his soul and the sin of his environment, even when we are somewhat confused in our notions of right and wrong, and fight because we desire to please, is enlightening and purifying. "Find some one in need of help and give the help needed," is advice that we ought to give to him who asks us to show him the way of salvation. The knowledge that another is defending us against the attacks of ignorance and viciousness increases our self-respect and zeal for righteousness.

The loyalty of the gang is admirable, although the gang is not always governed by the right aim. It is a good thing for the boys and girls in school to support with spirit their groups and clubs. The problem of the teacher is to distinguish between organizations that aid in cultivating the ethics of democracy and those that foster moral and intellectual foppery. The boys of the street hang together. The city is learning to deal considerately with their clannishness and to use it for the making of good citizens. To turn the spirit of loyalty to the side of crime is about the worst blunder a city can commit. This is easy to do and it has been done for ages. The city that thinks kindly of its boys and provides for them according to their needs, may count on their loyalty.

It is the fool who goes about slandering his town to strangers. The wise man knows what slander is and that it is disloyalty. The fool thinks he must talk about what his neighbors lack. He ridicules their taste for music, their crude notions of literary values, and their rude manners. This he does, not as one who would be a kind teacher, but as one who would exalt himself at the expense of others. He fears that he will be thought to share the ignorance and crudity of his neighbors. The wise man lets it be known that he likes his neighbors and that his interests and theirs are one. If he knows literature and science and philosophy and they do not, he places what he knows at their service. He values his education, not because it makes him different from others, but because it enables him to be of some use in the world.

When the minister preaches a sermon that arouses the opposition of many, when members of the church entertain different views of the doctrine and mission of the church, when a prominent member has fallen into sin, then it is time to be loyal. The causes often assigned for the disruption of churches are not always causes. The unwise utterances of the pulpit do not disrupt churches composed of wise men and women who know their reason for being disciples. It is lack of sense and religion that ruins churches; the foolish preacher merely furnishes the occasion. Differences in opinion are unimportant matters where the fundamentals of the faith are held and the spirit of Jesus prevails. The sin of one man cannot pull down what others have built up unless the sin is augmented by the folly of the church.

The loyal man is often accused of disloyalty. The reason is that he has the larger loyalty. He is accused of denying the faith by those who think the last word has been spoken in the creeds. History shows him to be more of a believer than his enemies, as in the case of Luther, Calvin, Knox, and Campbell. Jesus was loyal to the whole truth and to the human race. His accusers were loyal to a part of the truth and to a small fraction of the race. They wronged their race by trying to exclude humanity from their sympathy. He served his people by serving all men. The Episcopalians and the Disciples

"This may be considered the most important step yet taken in this country looking toward the ultimate reunion of Christians," —these are the measured words with which The Churchman, the New York Episcopal organ, sums up its account of the conference between the Disciples' Commission on Christian Unity and the Episcopal Christian Unity Foundation a report of whose action was published last week in The Christian Century.

Probably the Churchman's estimate of the significance of the resolutions adopted by the conference is somewhat exaggerated, biased no doubt, by the fact that the declarations deal altogether with matters dear to the Episcopalian heart. Whether, on analysis, the resolutions are taken to mean much or little it will at least sound strange to the Disciples' ears to hear their commission speaking with fluency and approval in the language of episcopacy. Those whose religious ideas have been formed wholly within Disciple associations will be somewhat startled to find the signatures of seven representatives of our communion affixed to this series of declarations.

We hope our readers will turn back to last week's issue and re-read the report of the conference as given there. It is our purpose in this article to inquire somewhat into the content and aim of the resolutions subscribed to by the two commissions and to present candidly our opinion with respect to the proceeding as a whole. A bit of editorial autobiography is essential, however, in order to give our readers a suggestion of the spirit in which we write. It was our purpose on first hearing of the resolutions to interpret them as a signal step in advance; to say something like the Churchman's utterance at the head of this article. The gentlemen composing the Disciples commission are of such character and wisdom as to make a strong presumption in favor of any action their commission may take. Besides, our earnest desire is strongly in the direction of interpreting favorably every event that in any degree points toward a better understanding among the followers of Christ.

We therefore essayed to "hail with delight" the apparent unity of sentiment between Episcopalians and Disciples on these seventeen resolutions. But when half-way through the task we looked back over what we had written and found that our pen had hardly finished the opening congratulatory paragraph when it slipped into an analytic and critical interpretation of the resolutions. This will not do, we reflected with self-rebuke. The resolutions may be ambiguous, or empty, or inadequate or even misleading, but the cause of unity will be best advanced by interpreting them charitably, we said. And so, destroying what had been written, we put our pen again to its duty. But again it refused to indite the sentiments we had set for it. The resolutions yielded little to kindle the enthusiasm of a pen accustomed to advocate free, democratic Christian unity as conceived by the Disciples of Christ. And they yielded much that suggested distrust and doubt as to the simple good faith of the Episcopal commission in presenting them.

Thereupon we brushed our incomplete manuscript aside and sat back to study afresh and with candor the document before us. The conclusion to which we came is expressed with complete candor in this article. We believe in the simple, earnest good faith of the Disciple commission. Its members had been making repeated journeys to New York to confer with the brethren of the Episcopal commission, and no doubt felt that something definite must be done to justify these conferences and to serve as a basis for further intimacy. They deeply yearn for the unity of the Church. Like most of us, they have gotten past the stage where they care to press finical distinctions into a discussion of the basis of unity. They do not demand that overtures and resolutions be worded in the vocabulary of Alexander Campbell. It is substance not nomenclature with which they are concerned. They wish to go more than half way to meet any group of Christ's followers.

Our present criticism does not lie against the Disciples' commission but against their Episcopal conferees. Instead of matching their Disciple brethren's irenic and gracious spirit we cannot shake off the belief that they took advantage of it to gain prestige for their own distinctive tenets. The resolutions adopted deal in concepts quite foreign to the Disciples' thinking. There are very slight, if any, signs that they were produced by any degree of collaboration of the two commissions. The Disciple members suggested revisions in a few phrases, "to make the meaning clearer," but they contributed not one positive idea to the entire series. Note the unfamiliar sound of some of the declarations. Here for example is the second:

"We accept the Apostles' Creed and the Nicene Creed as expressing fundamental doctrines of the Christian faith, and as an adequate basis for any further formulated statement of Christian truth which may be needed."

This is a brand new way for Disciples of Christ to be talking. To admit that any other creed may ever be "needed" except the statement of personal faith in Jesus Christ whose classic formulation is preserved to us in the words of Simon Peter at Caesarea Philippi is somewhat revolutionary, is it not?

Resolution number 7 is a declaration concerning the divine authority to perform the act of ordination. This authority "comes from God the Father through Christ the Mediator, by the Holy Spirit as the living agent in the Church," says the resolution. The effect of these words is plainly to place ordination by the side of baptism and the Lord's Supper as an authoritatively established ordinance, making the number of the "sacraments" three instead of two as stated in the third resolution.

This, to Disciples, is a decidedly unfamiliar classification.

"Resolving" Historical Facts.

Resolution number 9 is, in appearance, merely a statement of historical facts concerning the "common succession of orders" "from very early times" and concerning the variety of administration of these orders since the Reformation. Taken literally one wonders why it was thought profitable to solemnly "resolve" concerning historical truisms of this sort. The conference might just as well have passed the following declaration: "Resolved, that Julius Caesar was once emperor of Rome." There is no question that ordinations have been performed in a variety of ways; the question is whether these ordinations are mutually to be regarded as valid and sufficient by the several bodies. If our Episcopal brethren intended to imply that they did so regard Presbyterian, Congregational and Disciple ordinations it seems strange that they did not so word their declaration as to convey that meaning. But if they did not wish to convey that meaning the whole resolution bears a disingenuous aspect and is no less than an insult to the Disciples who innocently subscribed to it.

That the Episcopal commissioners intended to imply any such tolerance of other than their own orders is hardly probable in view of the many expressions of a contrary sentiment emanating from representative Episcopal authorities. And further light is shed upon their subtlety of purpose in proposing these empty historical declarations when one reads the succeeding resolution. It is a strange mixture. Why should American Disciples and Episcopalians be resolving for a union of the church of England and the Presbyterian church in Australia and Tasmania? Is it because certain procedures can be suggested in a resolution applicable to the churches in those far away countries, which probably would not be entertained for a moment if applied to the bodies represented at the present conference? Was the irrelevant and exotic Tasmania and Australia resolution retained in an indigenous context for the sake of planting its germ idea in unfamiliar ground?

It would seem so, for its germ idea could not have found even momentary acceptance in the minds of Dr. Ainslie and his fellow commissioners had it been presented frankly for what it is. The germ idea is mutual re-ordination. "A union . . . in which each church [Anglican and Presbyterian, in Tasmania and Australia] shall confer upon the ministers of the other all the rights and privileges necessary for the exercise of their offices in the United Church, so that . . . all the ministers . . . shall have equal status." These words have the aspect of fairness, of mutuality, of give and take. But looked at the second time the proposal is seen to be onesided, uncompromising, all take and no give.

Neither the Presbyterians in Tasmania nor the Disciples in America have any desire to reordain the Episcopal clergy, and the Episcopalians do not "care a rap" about being reordained by either Disciples or Presbyterians. If they should accept it in exchange for our acceptance of reordination at their hands there would be no little laughter in Episcopalian sleeves. If the gentlemen of the Episcopalian commission inferred from Dr. Ainslie's commission's approval of this resolution that the Disciples could condone the self-stultification implied by participating in a sham procedure of that sort they are laboring under a delusion. To the Disciples any proposition for unity based upon the presupposition of present unequal ministerial status and the necessity for reordination in order to create equality of status is thoroughly repugnant. Nor does our commission itself—we cannot think otherwise—represent its own mind in seeming to tolerate the suggestion contained in this resolution.

Christian unity is not coming by way of putting our necks under the yoke of more dogmas, but by getting our necks out of whatever dogmatic yokes now burden us.

It may be that the united Church shall wish to have bishops and such an organization as the Episcopal church now has—and again it may not—but if it does it will be because that kind of organization does the work, not because it "comes from God the Father through Christ the Mediator," and so forth, and so forth.

This leads us to say frankly to the members of the Disciples commission that, in The Christian Century's opinion, they are looking for Christian unity in the wrong direction. It is not coming in the Episcopalian way; it is coming in the Disciples' way. The Episcopalian way is the ecclesiastical way; the Disciples' way is the sociological way. The ecclesiastical method keeps alive old problems and dogmas and tries to effect an agreement among Christ's people upon them. The sociological method tries to forget the dogma of the episcopate and the dogma of immersion-baptism, and all of the miserable lumber with which the Church is burdened, and strives to create unity through doing Christ's work among men.

The ecclesiastical method takes us backward, the sociological method takes us forward.

Christian unity lies in the pathway along which the modern ideal of service is taking the Church. All the institutions of the Church, and the Church itself, are being translated out of the dogmatic categories of the past into the social categories of the new time. When the churches come to regard their institutions and ordinances as possessing value according to their function, they will not only have a new apologetic with which to displace outlived dogmas, but they will have found a stable ground for freedom and unity.

Some reader may think that we are unduly suspicious in our examination of this document which the shrewd leaders of the Episcopal Foundation persuaded the Disciples' commission to sign. To which we reply by pleading guilty to a considerable degree of suspicion. In addition to the facts which form the subject matter of our present criticism we may be allowed to give two other reasons for being unable to judge the attitude of our Episcopalian brethren with full presumption of their guileless good faith.

One of these is the conspicuous absence of the baptism problem from the resolutions. It will be recalled that at a previous conference of the two groups a paper on Christian baptism was read by a Disciple representative. With certain views set forth in that paper The Christian Century holds sharp disagreement. But it was reported that it elicited the cordial approval of the Episcopalians who heard it. They are said to have expressed their belief that immersion was the primitive mode of practicing baptism, that it, better than sprinking, preserved the symbolism with which St. Paul invested the rite, and they called the somewhat surprised attention of the Disciple commissioners to the fact that in the Prayer Book's baptismal rubric immersion takes precedence over pouring or sprinkling.

In a series of resolutions adopted by Episcopalians and Disciples as a "basis for further procedure" toward unity and intended to do justice to the convictions of both participants it is hard to comprehend how not one matter characteristically vital to the Disciples was touched upon. Fifteen out of the seventeen resolutions deal with things vital to Episcopalians and quite foreign to the Disciples' habits of mind, while the other two deal with points common to all evangelical protestantism. If the cordiality expressed by the Episcopalian group toward the baptismal views of President Kershner was anything more than shrewd courtesy anticipating the occasion when one of their own group should read a paper on the episcopate, why was there not incorporated in these resolutions some declaration of the common ground between the two groups on the baptism question?

Motive of the Episcopalian Group.

At the present moment we can imagine no answer to this question except that the Episcopalian group was more concerned to gain the approval of the Disciples for their own orders than to find a real basis of unity on common ground between both bodies.

But be that as it may, (and we shall be grateful to be shown our error), we give another, and this time an unambiguous reason why we find it difficult to receive Episcopalian overtures for Christian unity with a mind completely disarmed of suspicion:

The Episcopal church cannot consistently and graciously talk with others about Christian unity while it refuses to recognize the equality of status between its ministers and those of the churches whom it approaches with its overtures. Its arrogant claim to superiority of orders, its refusal to allow any save Episcopally ordained clergy in its pulpits, its characterization of itself as "the Church" and others as merely "religious bodies" makes it impossible for these religious bodies to regard its overtures for unity as other than a compound of the pure gold of Christ's passion with a considerable alloy of ecclesiastical guile and ambition.

This is very frank speech, but we are persuaded that Christian unity is advanced by candid expression of convictions and of criticisms more than by unctious courtesies that hide the real problems.

Two things are absolutely indispensable as a guarantee of sincerity in Christian union talk and practice:

One is the outright, unqualified, sincere acknowledgement of the equality of status as members of the Church of Christ of those to whom the plea for unity is made—an acknowledgment not belied by a contrary practice.

The other is the outright, unqualified and sincere acknowledgment of the full ecclesiastical status of the ministry of those churches embraced in the plea for unity—an acknowledgment also not belied by a contrary practice.

No religious body may expect to command the disarmed attention of the Christian denominations for its overtures of unity if it assumes a position of exclusiveness either in respect to its membership or in respect to its ministry or "orders." A church that refuses to receive into its membership a person bearing a credential of membership in another church because he was not baptized by immersion discredits that other church as something less than a church of Christ. A church that refuses to admit to its pulpit a minister ordained by another church discredits that church as something less than a church of Christ. For either of these churches to talk of Christian unity to those whom they thus discredit and disfranchise is an affront. The only unity they can have in mind is the unity of triumph for their dogma or benevolent absorption by their sect.

And we are compelled to say, against the inhibition of strong desire to the contrary, that the meekness of the Disciples' commission in the conference under present review gave occasion for our brothers of the Episcopal church to push their propaganda so far that their lack of gracious consideration for the convictions of their Disciple conferees cannot fail to be discerned by any normally sensitive reader of the resolutions. We hope the Disciples' commission will have other and frequent conferences with the Episcopal brethren. The value and fruitfulness of these conferences is greatly over-rated by many, but they have value nevertheless.

At one of these conferences it might be well to discuss—not baptism nor the episcopate—but the Disciples' plea for Christian unity!

An Important Announcement

In previous announcements of the organization of the Disciples Publication Society it has been stated that the basis of membership and the plan of relating the Society to the general brotherhood of the Disciples remained to be determined in the future.

It was felt that to simply inform our constituency of the fact that the private corporation known as the New Christian Century Company had transferred its affairs to the Disciples Publication Society, a corporation for public welfare—known in legal phrase as "a corporation not for profit"—would enlist the good counsel of our friends, the leaders of the churches, in deciding upon the best form of organization for the new corporation. The main body of the by-laws was therefore not written until several months after the charter was obtained.

Meanwhile through much correspondence and conference the plan of organization has been developed and we find hardly less satisfaction in presenting it to the readers of The Christian Century than in making the original announcement four months ago.

At that time the single characteristic on which the organizers were agreed was that the Disciples Publication Society must be thoroughly democratic and representative. It was felt that perhaps some kind of self-perpetuating group, appointed once for all by the organizers, would prove to be the only practicable plan of constituting the Society's membership. Never wholly satisfied that such a plan was "thoroughly democratic and representative," the organizers have listened to suggestions and labored earnestly to work out a plan by which the churches and Sunday-schools of the brotherhood should truly own and directly control the affairs of the Society.

The plan as finally adopted is very simple.

It puts this enterprise completely in the control of the people.

It gives to the churches and Sunday-schools the power to say what kind of a house this shall be, and who shall manage it.

It puts not only the profits but the property and the policy in the hands of the churches and Sunday-schools.

It brings down to a reality the ideal of a brotherhood publishing house.

The following digest of the by-laws will set forth the wholly mutual and unselfish character of the organization. The reader will bear in mind that the Disciples Publication Society is incorporated under the laws of Illinois as "a corporation not for pecuniary profit." It therefore has no capital stock, no individual owners. Private persons do not benefit by its earnings. According to its charter its profits are to be appropriated to the cause of religious education as represented in the work of missionary societies, Sunday-schools, colleges and other organizations that promote Christian progress through Christian culture.

In lieu of private stockholders members of the Society are named by local churches and Sunday-schools. Any church or school purchasing $100 worth of literature or merchandise from the Society is thereby entitled to name one member.

A church or school is not limited in the number of memberships it may earn, and it is entitled to name one member for each membership certificate held. In every meeting of the Society each member is entitled to cast one vote.

Credit coupons are issued from time to time for all purchases of literature or merchandise amounting to five dollars or any multiple of five dollars. Upon presentation to the Society's office of $100 worth of these coupons a membership certificate is issued.

Membership certificates cover a period of five years, at the end of which period a new series of certificates is issued, based upon patronage then current.

The meetings of the Society are held annually.

The executive management of the business of the Society is committed to a board of directors who are elected by the Society at its annual meetings.

The Society itself at its annual meetings determines to what agencies or institutions its profits shall be appropriated.

The first annual meeting will be held after 200 membership certificates have been issued, at the time and place of the next succeeding General Convention of Churches of Christ.

The directors and other officers will make to the Society at its annual meeting full and complete reports of the affairs of the Society.

Honorary members of the Society may be appointed on account of service or counsel and all who aid in establishing the Society by purchasing its bonds are called supporting members and are entitled, until their bonds are retired, to the same rights and privileges, including the vote, as the regular members appointed by churches and Sunday-schools.

The Society is thus a thoroughly mutual, unselfish and democratic organization, from whose affairs private control and the motives of private gain have been effectually eliminated. Its sole aim is to advance the cause of religious education and serve the Kingdom of God.

With this problem of defining the membership of the Disciples Publication Society finally determined and out of the way, our workers are setting themselves to the constructive task with energy and enthusiasm. Mr. Morrison will at once begin personally to solicit subscriptions to the bond issue to provide the capital needed for adequately promoting the circulation of The Christian Century and the publication of Sunday-school literature. With practically no effort on his part several thousand dollars worth of these bonds have already been subscribed by volunteer purchasers who desired, in this way, to convey their substantial interest in the new enterprise. To all these friends the Society expresses its grateful appreciation. Others not a few have indicated their intention of participating, and need, no doubt, only a personal word. Dr. Willett's long absence abroad has made it, naturally, very difficult for Mr. Morrison to be away from the office on trips of financial solicitation. With Dr. Willett's early return, however, and with his assistance both in editorial service and in "opening the door of opportunity" to our friends, it is believed that the summer months will not have passed before our goal of $25,000 capital is reached. Meanwhile we ask our friends who are prompted to have a part with us to communicate with us on their own motion.

While the capital is in process of being secured actual development of the business of the house is going on. Larger and more adequate quarters, though still modest, are being prepared for the Society in the United Religious Press Building. Into these we will move before May 1. Ampler facilities for handling our enlarging Sunday-school business will then be afforded.

To the Bethany Graded Lessons, which constituted practically the entire stock of Sunday-school supplies handled by the old company, has been added a complete line of Sunday-school literature and merchandise. We wish to call special attention of all Sunday-school workers to this fact. Whereas, heretofore, the patrons of the Bethany Graded Lessons were compelled to purchase other supplies of other houses there is now no reason for dividing their orders. Additional publications are being prepared by the Society, and for those publications which it is not desirable at this time to issue from our own presses we have made selection from the whole field of Sunday-school literature of those materials which are regarded as absolutely the best and most attractive. These publications the Society will provide, thus furnishing our schools with an entire body of literature and other supplies as well as the graded lessons.

A bulletin of the Society's publications is being prepared and will be issued at an early date. Meantime it is hoped that not only pastors but all church workers reading this announcement will call the attention of their superintendents and teachers to this larger service which the Society purposes to render. The summer quarter is a good time to put the best literature into your Sunday-school.

Meanwhile, in simple sincerity we wish to say that as the management looks to the churches and schools for whatever authority it possesses so it looks to them for guidance and support. Nought but feelings of humility possess us as we contemplate the future of this enterprise whose natural working out will bind our churches and schools into an intimate, mutual and unselfish fellowship. We are beginning modestly, humbly. In business policy it is our purpose to move forward conservatively. We wish to draw to us as co-workers in the administration of the task of religious education the finest spirited and most talented men and women of the church. In selecting our colleagues we will not move fast. In this formative period, pending the first meeting of the Society, our management is, of course, based upon our own appointment, but we earnestly desire to so administer the Society's affairs that the report rendered to the first meeting may be an occasion of satisfaction to all the churches.

DISCIPLES PUBLICATION SOCIETY.

The Spring Poet

The Spring poet has become a joke. But Spring is no joke to the poet. If he is to write Spring poetry with any hope of getting it printed he must write it in the Winter and send it to the magazine editor while the men are cutting ice; and then he is likely to get it back because it lacks local color, or because the magazine has Spring poetry enough. "When 'Omer smote his blooming lyre" the Spring poet had no such difficulties. He sang his poem with the note of the returning birds, and passed the hat among his hearers. A new type of Spring poetry is arriving. It is a blasé and sarcastic type. A recent poet has written:

"The Spring has come; I know the sign—
The smell of asphalt in the air;
The gas-pipe men are laying pipes,
And digging ditches in the square."

Where in poetry of this character are the old-time constituent elements of the Spring poem—the birds, and the flowers and the lovers? They are not present. Even the women, some of them, have caught this ironical note. Mrs. Charlotte Perkins Gilman Stetson has it; she had it before. She writes:

"I hear in gray unwelcome dawns
The sordid sparrows sing;
And in the florist's windows watch
The forced and purchased Spring."

We like the old time Spring poetry better. We prefer the birds and bees and flowers and lovers. This new-fangled Spring poetry is written by town inhabitants. But for that matter, so was the older poetry. Poets write of nature, but they keep close to steam heat. A thousand poets have sung of the beauties of nature, but few except Wordsworth ever chose nature voluntarily when they had opportunity to live in town. The poet is born, not made; but he very easily submits to such remaking as is involved in living in town and writing Spring poetry while the thermometer is at zero.

The Dominion of Life

Inertia is a property of matter; but growth is a law of life. Each lifeless thing in all this vast universe will stay where it is placed until something moves it, and remain as it is until something changes it; but every living thing, while molded by forces without, is also shaped by powers within. The inorganic world is static; the organic world is progressive. Moved upon by the forces of vitality, dead matter feels within it the throb and thrill of life, and responds to laws beyond its own domain. This is the perpetual miracle of nature. In the tree that lifts its tons of earth and water high in air, and transforms them into sap and leaf and fruit; in the flower that roots itself in unfeeling soil, and turns it into petals of beauty and of grace; in the bird that eats matter and sings music; in the man who consumes carbon and oxygen and thinks thoughts that soar among the stars and explores the long reaches of eternity, the law is the same. In each and every one of them, life transforms matter by the laws not of matter but of life.

Roman Catholic Figures for 1913

The "Official Directory" of the Roman Catholic Church is out. It is published as usual, by Kennedy & Sons of New York City. According to it, there are 15,154,158 Roman Catholics in the United States alone. Add to this figure the sum of 7,131,989 in the Philippines, 1,000,000 or more in Porto Rico, 11,510 in Alaska, 42,108 in the Hawaiian Islands, and 900 in the Canal Zone, and "it will be found that there are 23,329,047 (Roman) Catholics under the Stars and Stripes." Is there a menace to our institutions in this? The Directory for 1913 tells us that a new Roman Catholic church is built every day. The Inter-Mountain Catholic (Salt Lake City) gives the following abstract:

"There were 373 new churches established during 1912, some of them, of course, being only mission churches. To be exact, there are 244 new churches with resident pastors and 129 new mission churches, that is, served by a neighboring pastor. All told, there are 14,312 churches in the United States, 9,501 having resident pastors.

"According to the publication there are 17,945 Catholic clergymen in the dioceses of the United States, 13,273 being secular clergy and 4,672 being members of religious orders. In addition to the 17,945 priests, there are also hundreds of fathers in distant lands; in fact, there is hardly a civilized or uncivilized land where United States clergy are not to be found. Only a few days ago a United States priest sailed from New York for the Island of Timor, an island away out in the Indian Ocean, inhabited by semi-barbarous Malays and Papuans.

"In addition to the 17,945 clergymen engaged in the United States, there are 6,169 men and youths studying in 85 seminaries, located in various parts of the country.

"There are also 230 colleges and academies for boys and 684 academies for girls, where the higher education of our Catholic youth is given serious attention. The numbers of academies for girls is, of course, larger than the colleges for men and boys, but the number of men and boy students is much larger than girl students.

A table has been prepared showing the distribution of the Catholic population in Twenty-five states having the largest number of Catholics. Thus:

"During the year 1912 Michigan has forged ahead of Wisconsin and Kansas has advanced over New Hampshire, Maine, and Nebraska. The table follows:

"New York, 2,790,629; Pennsylvania, 1,633,353; Illinois, 1,460,987; Massachusetts, 1,383,435; Ohio, 743,065; Louisana, 584,000; Michigan, 568,505; Wisconsin, 558,476; New Jersey, 506,000; Missouri, 470,000; Minnesota, 454,797; Connecticut, 423,000; California, 403,500; Texas, 306,400; Iowa, 266,735; Maryland, 260,000; Rhode Island, 260,000; Indiana, 232,764; Kentucky, 163,228; New Mexico, 140,573; Kansas, 131,000; Maine, 123.600; Nebraska, 118,270; Colorado, 105,000."

North Dakota Welcomes Religious Instruction

North Dakota is interested in something better and higher than its fabulous wheat fields. Its school authorities recognize that man shall not live by bread alone. The North Dakota High School Board has published a Bible study syllabus, according to The Epworth Herald (Chicago). The Board is to furnish questions on the syllabus, and will credit all successful students with one semester unit in their high school course. However, the actual study is not furnished by the high schools themselves. The work may be taken anywhere, at home, under private tutors, in Sunday-school, Christian Endeavor, Epworth League, anywhere. It is enough under the American form of government that the state recognize religious instruction as such as properly belonging to the education of its future citizens. The matter of providing it, of course, cannot be a state function. President E. P. Robertson of Wesley College, Fargo, N. D., has done much toward this achievement.

The Prospect for the Zurich Convention

General Secretary Marion Lawrance of the International Sunday-school Association, recently returned from a flying trip abroad, where he was engineering preparations for the World's Sunday-school Convention to be held in Zurich, Switzerland, next July. The trip was a six-weeks affair, but Mr. Lawrance with his Chicago spirit of hustle did some heroic work during his sojourn. According to the Congregationalist (Boston): "He found the local committee a strong group with seven of its members, including the chairman, representatives of the State church. The complications of the State and Free churches raised, as usual, little problems which required tactful settlement. To entertain the convention the well-arranged Tonhalle will be utilized as well as many of the local churches, both Free and State, although for the latter a small stipend has to be paid to the city authorities. At the present time there is every prospect of a large attendance of delegates. Mr. Lawrance declares that there is little doubt but that all the nations of the continent, except those in the Balkan War zone, will reach their full quota. Reports confirming this view have been received from the delegations representing Switzerland, Sweden, Spain, Denmark and other countries. Great Britain will probably send at least 500 delegates, while corresponding good news comes from Australia, New Zealand, practically all of the Oriental countries and from South America.

John R. Mott in China

Dr. John R. Mott during a missionary conference in Canton, China the other day, addressed the student body of Canton in the Kwong Mo Toi Theatre on the Bund. The seating capacity of the theatre is 4,000. The first evening the theatre was packed. The other two evenings of the conference, the theatre held 3,000 souls. Dr. Mott preached with tremendous power through a Chinese Y. M. C. A. interpreter. At the close of the services more than 800 Chinese young men signed cards, pledging themselves to study the life of Christ, to pray to Him for help and by His aid to live pure and helpful lives. Among the young men were seventeen from the Canton Christian College. No wonder President Woodrow Wilson wants this man to be his Minister to China.

DR. WILLETT'S MISSION TOUR

Through Manchuria

If anyone doubts that Japan is planning to make Korea (Cho-sen) an integral part of the empire he has only to reflect upon the money the imperial government is putting into railway equipment in the peninsula. It would be too much to say that the railroad lines in Korea are equal to those in Japan proper. But very large sums of money are being spent on their improvement, and already they begin to rival the excellent transportation facilities to be found on the Island.

The main line that runs north through Korea from Fusan to Mukden is well ballasted, and sustains a good train service. In addition to the regular daily schedule, three times a week a first-class train is run through to connect with the mail and passenger traffic of the Trans-Siberian route with which close connection is made at Harbin. This Korean train is up to date in all regards. It carries not only the usual complement of first and second-class coaches, but a dining car and a typical Pullman sleeping car. It is probable that this service is run at considerable loss to the government. But no doubt it is deemed a good advertisement of the line, and an aid in the industrial development of the land by foreign capital.

On the morning on which we took this train for Mukden the Korean agent of the line, who had already called on us at Seoul with offers to help us in any manner possible, came to the station, escorted us to the train, took us into the Pullman coach, and with the adolescent pride of the possessor of the latest device for comfort, showed us the manner of operating this perfectly good American car, as if it must be as interesting to us as to most of his clients. I had to compliment the members of the party afterward that they did not betray their amusement, but commented with discreet enthusiasm on the berths, the electric lamps and the inlaid wood-work.

The landscape of Korea cannot be inviting at any season of the year, though no doubt after the spring rains it looks fresher and more attractive than in November. But the combination of cold and bleakness made it seem dismal indeed. The little villages huddled in some nook of the hills seemed hunting for warmth. It was hard to believe that in the little rice fields, with their mud dykes to keep in the needed water of the rainy season, they could ever grow a crop. And the angular, rough-featured people, with their dirty white garments and their heavy burdens, crossing the plains or climbing the mountain sides, exhibited a stolid, pathetic type of life in striking contrast with the usual joyousness of the Japanese, or even the cheerfulness and intelligence of those Christion Koreans we had met.

The Journey to Mukden.

It is a journey of twelve hours from Pyeng Yang to Mukden. Late in the afternoon we came to Antung on the banks of the Yalu River, which divides Korea from Manchuria. Here we stopped for some time to change engines, pass the customs examination, and attend to the hundred other items that seem to offer oriental trains such excellent excuses to linger for unconscionable periods at the stations. But here it was interesting to see the wholly new type of people on the station platform. The Korean was disappearing, and the Chinese took his place. A new railroad bridge was being installed, and the workmen were Chinese. The policemen and soldiers along the station platfrom were Chinese. One did not need to ask what would happen when the Korean came into competition with either the industry of the Chinese or the cleverness of the Japanese.

Of course Korea and China face each other across the Yalu, and on each side of the river there is a town. A considerable military force of Chinese is quartered at Antung, and in these new days of the Chinese republic the soldiers are not always subject to that discipline which prevails in a more settled land. The next week after we were there we heard that on the very next day a company of Chinese soldiers broke out in a semi-riot, refused to obey orders, crossed the river and looted several streets in the Korean town. But that time the government was equal to the emergency, for the rioters were arrested, triad by court-martial, and beheaded on the parade ground.

We reached Mukden late in the evening, and soon found our rooms at the Yamato Hotel, at the station. The city is three miles distant, and to one intending to leave soon it is easier to take quarters near the railroad. It was interesting to be near the station at the train hours. The large waiting room was filled, most of the time, with a miscellaneous crowd of Chinese, waiting to buy their third-class tickets or to pile themselves into their third-class cars, that looked hardly better than cattle pens. Yet there were many Chinese of other classes who traveled in better style and displayed complete acquaintance with the modern and western service.

And besides the Chinese there were Koreans, Japanese, Russians, and travelers from all the lands of the West, who had come up from Japan or down from Siberia or over from China. It was a veritable clearing-house of peoples.

Mukden in History.

The next day we spent in seeing something of Mukden. The memories of the important part it played in the Russian-Japanese war are in evidence on all sides. The fine new memorial to the Russian soldiers who fell at Mukden is one of the first objects passed on the way from the station to the city.

As the ancient capital of Manchuria, Mukden had a prominent role in earlier times. It is surrounded with a wall of considerable strength, pierced with gates on the four sides, each gate being a highly decorative feature of the place, with its three or four stories rising one above the other, each topped with the high peaked roof so characteristic of China. In this city too are the old palaces of the Manchu dynasty, before these rulers took their way to Peking to become the lords of the newly conquered China, over which they were to hold the sway of a foreign race for so many generations.

Out some five miles from the wall are the tombs of the last of the local Manchu kings. One drives out over, or rather through, roads that seem bottomless as the abyss. It was a long, jolty, cold ride. But one beautiful thing we saw on the way. It was the American flag, floating above the consulate. It received the hearty salute of that group of Americans, as it always does wherever we have seen it. We should like to have called on the consul. We have usually done this when we could. Some of these gentlemen we have found it a satisfaction to meet. In the smaller places their position is not alluring. And now and then we have been made to feel that a call from visitors from the homeland is a pleasure to them.

On the way to the royal tombs we passed through an ancient cemetery. It was a great flat, barren tract, dotted all over with little mounds, where the earth had been heaped up over bodies laid on the top of the earth. In some cases a pit is dug, but this is not necessary. No stone or any device marked a single grave. It was a lonely place, but many such we saw in passing through Manchuria and China.

The Tombs of the Rulers.

When we finally approached the tombs of the dead rulers we noted the monuments set along the road leading to the mausoleum. First, there were two columns, whose tops bore a device which reminded one strongly of Roman trophies. It was just a ship beak used to adorn the fronts of the public fora in the Roman towns. Then after entering an inclosing wall through a high and handsome gate, one passed down an avenue on either side of which were pairs of animals in stone, horses, camels, elephants, and beyond them men of priestly or royal class in fitting armor or robes. It seemed almost certain that in these figures one saw the influence of nations further west upon the life and art of this people. Perhaps India and even Europe had contributed to the symbolism of the place.

Then came the great mortuary temple or chapel, which was not the tomb, but the shrine for the sacred tablets with their records of devotion. Then the enclosing wall again at the rear of the great quadrangle, with towers at the rear corners, from which a fine view could be obtained. And outside of the wall, in the heart of a huge mound, probably thrown up for the purpose, rests the body of the prince for whose interment such costly preparations were made. As one walks back through the side avenue of well-kept trees to the spot where the carriages were kept, and where the ragged guardians of the place are sure to be waiting to demand the trifling tip which they have learned to expect, he cannot fail to estimate at something of its value a civilization that could set up such monuments to its dead. Whatever the later weakness of the Manchu, there was a time when he was a warrior, a builder and a ruler of merit. And this is his monument.

The streets of Mukden are interesting to the visitor who comes from Japan and Korea, for he has had no earlier view of the Chinese sort of town. The signs above and before the shops are of the most curious and elaborate sort. Many of them are made after the order of banners or flags, so that the street looks like a holiday scene. And the people are objects of never-ending interest. In this part of China, for Manchuria is a province of the big republic, the queue is still worn by almost all the men. The head is covered with a small round cap, in the center of which there is a little red knot or ball. Then a long-sleeved jacket-coat, and below a skirt, probably lined with some sort of fur.

Mukden's Fur Shops.

And speaking of furs, this is the place to secure them. The best streets in Mukden have almost numberless fur shops, in which the finest skins, worth a fortune in America, are offered for sale. Everyone wears them in the cold weather. They are obtained in abundance in the mountains by the hunters, and are brought in in bundles by the trappers. There were only two reasons why we did not all of us buy the tempting pelts at the seemingly trifling sums asked. First, of course, we didn't have the money. And secondly, we thought apprehensively of New York harbor, with its menacing, uplifted hand of warning which some foolish and ignorant Americans have supposed to be a symbol of "Liberty Enlightening the World," but which the initiated, that is, those who have been bitten, know means, "Think before you buy."

It was still dark in the early morning, when we took the train from Mukden for the Chinese border. For though Manchuria is one of the Chinese provinces, one hardly feels that he has entered China till he has passed the Great Wall. And there are many shrewd observers of events who are willing to prophesy that not for long will Manchuria remain a part of China. For Japan lies at the door. Indeed Japan is already in Manchuria, and has leased from the Chinese government the right to operate the Manchurian railway from Antung to Mukden, this completing the Japanese line straight through from Fusan to Mukden, the heart of Manchuria. How long will it be before Manchuria goes the way Korea has gone?

Japan's Prospect.

And just now China is in no condition to stop the clever Japanese program. For Russia is threatening to take over Mongolia, and England is already more than half in possession of Tibet, with a strong military force at Llassa. China can only watch her three threatened provinces with anxiety, while she gives the major part of her attention to self-preservation at home, in the administration of the new republic which is by no means beyond danger of collapse.

And thinking of the problems which confront China on this very soil of Manchuria, we journey through the day, stopping for long intervals at stations where Chinese soldiers draw up in line to protect the train from the robber bands that have more than once looted trains, mail and express offices in recent days, where small merchants offer food and drink to the travelers, and where Chinese crowds hurry into and out of the little cars, the ingoing ones usually getting located first, and then as an afterthought those who desire to disembark slowly disengaging themselves from the mass of humanity and luggage that threatens every moment to push out the car-sides. It is most diverting to see a husky Chinese with a family of several members, all carrying enormous quantities of personal effects, throw himself and his following into a little compartment in which some dozen people and their impedimenta are occupying the space intended for half the number. And in they go, the last of them, in some remorseless way. Of course they come out again, at least some of them are likely to. You see bits of wreckage dropped out of windows and doors for some time. But in some mysterious fashion they adjust themselves at last, all in the best humor, and the train goes on.

It was after a day of many such sights, and of a multitude of new observations and interests, that we came, after dark, to Shanghai-kwan, and knew that at last we were really on the Chinese frontier. For this is the ancient boundary of the empire, and the beginning of the Great Wall.

Planting New Churches

What Policy Shall the Disciples Pursue?

By Finis Idleman

This theme starts a train of questions. Have the Disciples had a policy which they have followed? If so, what has been its success? Its failure? Can the Disciples of Christ adopt a policy? What agencies can produce it? What give it authority?

We recognize that the general program of the Disciples in planting new churches has been subject to the individual disciple and the local condition. Our policy has consisted in the liberty of each man, whether minister or layman, to do whatsoever was in his heart toward extending the church. If that zeal took him into the uttermost parts of the earth or into the already overchurched hamlet, there has been no restraining hand to forbid. Individual initiative and impulse have determined the program. That program has had some counsel and coöperation from state and home missionary boards in the last half century, but the first half century of this movement was dependent wholly upon the zeal that went everywhere preaching the word. We regard that period of our history as such an open book that its policy is well understood. There is little to indicate that the evangelists of that period regarded any territory as preoccupied. They went alike to the open country and to the overchurched villages. The same spirit of urgency and compassion which drove them into unevangelized parts, compelled them also to proclaim their message to the divided Christendom of their times. That this message usually resulted in the formation of a new church of the Disciples is also open history. It is likewise evident that the sacrificial passion of these men for their newfound truth often led them to exercise a militant spirit which did not always breathe the constraining passion of the Apostle Paul or even the yearning of a Thomas Campbell.

We may summarize this period of the history of the Disciples by saying that the passion for the plea and the individual liberty in the manner and place of its proclamation constituted the policy of the Disciples in planting new churches. The success of this policy lay in its abandoned zeal, in its self-forgetful passion and in its ready response to the call of other Disciples. These are not qualities to be lightly esteemed. Indeed, if they should ever be lost, the Disciples of Christ will be cumberers of the ground. Concerning such a legacy, we may well reply in the language of Naboth, "God forbid that we should sell thee the inheritance of our fathers."

The failure of such a policy is likewise apparent. It lends itself to an unwise zeal that too easily disregards the faith and labor of the religious forces at work in a given community. Too many heralds of this plea entered God-fearing communities in the same spirit in which Jonah entered Nineveh. The prayer life, devotion, Christian culture, all weighed as nothing until such were immersed and came out of Babylon. Now that such days have largely passed it must be evident to us that the Disciples have earned in part the religious ostracism which followed such a policy.

The second mark of failure in such a policy was that it lost sight of our primary impulse and passion, viz., the plea for Christian union. The zeal to "make disciples" overshadowed the plea to unite the disciples. We are accustomed to interpret this change of emphasis as having grown out of our experience which disclosed the fact that disciples could not be united until they were united upon the Bible. This is still to forget that the devotion of other communions to the spirit of the Bible was at least not less than ours, even if in some details they failed to follow the letter of the law. The failure to value properly this common deposit of loyalty to Christ and incarnation of His spirit, made us seem more like keepers of tradition than prophets of a united church. We by so much cut ourselves off from avenues of approach and an open minded hearing.

Again the failure of such a policy was manifest in the heated controversies which nullified a calm and dispassionate consideration of the appeal for the restoration of Jesus' way. This threefold weakness was, in fact, the fruitage of the times and likewise contributed to make the times. It was less unfortunate, however, in the last century than it would be in this.

With all the conditions which have been heretofore observed, and the successes and failures of the program apparent, what new conditions now obtain which affect this general program? Has the so-called policy of the Disciples grown in favor or is it destined so to do?

New Conditions.

Some of the conditions which distinguish our times from those of our fathers may be indicated as follows:

First—We have, in many respects, an overchurched condition. This our fathers did not have. The liberty and zeal which we have indicated as dominant in the earlier program, continued until they resulted in multiplied illustrations of unnecessary church buildings in hamlets and villages themselves destined to slow growth or decline. This policy, therefore, is condemned by this generation as it was not condemned in earlier years.

Second—There is an increasing welcome of truth. The dogmatic temper of religious folk a half century ago did not lend itself readily to new interpretations. Consequently the plea for union did not find a listening ear. It was almost essential that a church should be organized in every community that even this plea might be continually impressed upon its religious life. But that attitude has changed very largely. The open mind is a growing characteristic of our generation. In our political life the charge of party against party is that its truth has been incorporated by its enemies. Very naturally the temper of the church is of an increasing hospitality for any reasonable propaganda brought to its attention. This temper condemns the policy of former years.

Third—There is a growing fraternity among Christian people. The unfraternal attitude of religious people formerly was not one of singular opposition to the Disciples of Christ. The same attitude was toward any other most immediate religious neighbors. But the new sense of universal brotherhood has in it the approachable, teachable qualities. Debates and controversies have almost wholly ceased. The mark of the Pharisee is upon him who remains a controversialist. The deepening acquaintance among all religious peoples through interdenominational conferences and movements, renders it impossible for any man to arraign his religious neighbors with the hope of being largely believed. It would be observed by any intelligent hearer in the language of Charles Lamb when he was asked if he did not hate a certain man, "How can I? I know him." In fact, such growth of the fraternal spirit has come, that it has far exceeded the finest dreams of the prophets of the Kingdom. This growing fraternity condemns the individual liberty and policy of the last century in planting new churches.

Growing Unity of Faith

Fourth—The growing unity of faith. It is easily recognized that the initial impulse of any religious movement is to stress a phase of neglected truth. Surely it is not that all truth has been forgotten but one or more items have remained obscured until that hour. During the course of this propaganda and emphasis there will come consciously or unconsciously a growing appreciation and incorporation of it into all other communions, while the movement itself will gradually return to that great body of truth common to all Christian peoples. This is peculiarly the history of the Disciples of Christ.

The distinct plea for Christian union is scarcely more ours now than of any other religious body. Indeed, we should admit that the Episcopalians have shown a greater passion for union in the last decade than have we. The evidence is in the generous funds set apart for this peculiar task and the appointment of large and representative bodies whose sole duty it is to relate once more the torn and sundered body of Christ. In proportion as it became unnecessary for us to stress the peculiar truth which has been so neglected, have we as a people returned in our thinking more and more to the fundamental themes of Christian belief which never had been in the realm of controversy? This spirit of the unity of faith growing so largely everywhere condemns the former policy of planting new churches.

Growing Social Consciousness.

Fifth—The growing consciousness of social obligation. Modern prophets, like those of Israel, have called us to the wounds of the bruised by the great highway of life. They have pointed to the slum-born, the tenement-dwellers, the needy and poor. They have opened our eyes to the world in which we live. They have laid upon us the burden of Jesus in his first sermon at Nazareth. The trivial differences that have heretofore loomed large in the spiritual horizon receive now only a pitiful glance compared with the urgent pleading of the hurt of our times. The Christian Church as a whole has turned its face to this task and will never turn back again. The man who thinks to win a hearing on proof texts for doctrines will be left pathetically alone. The church which stands calling unceasingly to its peculiar tenets can only gather about it the juiceless life of a body of malcontents and passing Levites. This spirit of the growth of the social consciousness within the church condemns the policy of planting new churches in overcrowded districts.

Sixth—The growing world obligation. Slowly and surely the passion of Jesus for all men is possessing the church. The love of the father for his absent children is dawning upon us. The magnitude of the task is only paralleled by the certainty of its obligation. The experience of a hundred years has come back to us with great assurance and telling condemnation. We are confirmed in our faith that the work can be done, but we are convinced by our experience that it can never be done by a divided church, nor will the non-Christian world have any of our peculiar distinctions. The sin of wasted resources, of duplicated effort at home, is only paralleled by the non-Christian repudiation of such a spirit on the foreign field. This deepening world obligation condemns the policy of the over multiplication of churches and of the unfraternal and un-Christian spirit which plants a new church where another could do the work.
